COLONEL HUGHES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War who is responsible for the delay in Government action upon the Report of the Select Committee as to arsenal workmen, entered before 1870, being entitled to superannuation?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I cannot admit that there has been any delay at all. The Government would have been much to blame if, in a matter of serious financial importance, they had not given careful consideration to the evidence given before the recent Committee.

THE WOOLWICH POST OFFICE.

COLONEL HUGHES: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the reason for the delay in obtaining Treasury sanction for the proposed new Post Office at Woolwich, recommended by the Postmaster General?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer this question. Communications are passing between the Post Office, the War Office, and the Treasury, with a view to seeing whether the necessity for a new Post Office may be obviated by the adoption of measures calculated to relieve the pressure on the present office, which is chiefly due to the large number of Army pensioners requiring to be paid by money orders.

THE WOOLER CHURCHYARD.

MR. F. MACLEAN (in the absence of Sir EDWARD GREY): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the churchyard at Wooler was to be closed by Order of the Queen in Council on 31st July, and that no new burial ground has been provided, he will take steps to see that suitable provision for burials is made in proper time?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The operation of the Order in Council in question has, on the application of the Vicar, and with the approval of the Inspector, been postponed till the 30th of November next. In the meantime, I hope that arrangements will be made for the provision of a new burial ground. I have no power to compel a parish to provide a new burial ground. All that I can do is to call the attention of the authorities to what the law requires when a burial ground is closed by Order in Council, and this I have already done in this particular instance.

IRELAND—ALLEGED OUTRAGE BY ORANGEMEN AT CORKSTOWN.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that on the 29th July an Orange drumming party paraded the streets of Cookstown, County Tyrone, and stopped in front of the Catholic Church, using offensive language calculated to lead to a breach of the peace, and that at the further end of the town they fired five shots in the presence of District Inspector Yates, Head Constable Martin, and a force of Constabulary, at a number of Catholic young men playing football in a field; and, if true, what steps the authorities intend taking in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that the drumming party did not stop in front of the Roman Catholic Church, nor make use of any threatening language whatever in the hearing of the police, who were with them on duty at the time. It is the case that at the further end of the town five shots were fired. They were not discharged at a number of young men playing football, but were fired in the air. The police were unable to identify the person or persons who fired the shots, as it was dusk at the time, and the crowd was a large one.

MR. BLANE: May I ask if the fact that in the party there were several men armed with firearms would not constitute the assembly an illegal assembly liable to be dispersed by force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the fact mentioned by the hon. Member would of itself be sufficient to constitute the assembly an illegal one.

UNPAID CHARITY RENT CHARGES.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, as representing the Charity Commissioners, when the Return of Unpaid Charity Rent Charges, ordered last Session, for six English counties, is likely to be completed?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): So much of the order of last Session for the Return of Unpaid Charity Rent Charges for the six English counties of Cumberland, Derby, Devon, Suffolk, Warwick, and Worcester as relates to the counties of Warwick and Worcester was discharged on the 29th of July last. The Return for the other four counties was laid on the Table of the House on the 8th inst. If a Return for the counties of Warwick and Worcester should be ordered by the House, such a Return can be prepared so as to be ready for presentation early in next year.

EXCEPTIONAL CHILDREN IN PRIMARY SCHOOLS.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to a draft Report on the condition of "exceptional children in primary schools," prepared by Dr. Francis Warner, as Honorary Secretary of a Committee appointed by the Psychological Section of the British Medical Association, to consider this subject, and published in the "British Medical Journal" of 27th July; and, whether, in consideration of the new and important questions in primary education treated of in this Report, he will authorise the publication of the full text of the investigations on which it is founded?

*SIR W. HARTDYKE: The hon. Member has called my attention to the Report in question, and I have no doubt that the intrinsic importance of the medical questions with which it deals will obtain for it a sufficient share of public notice. I have neither the means nor the right to authorise the publication of anything in connection with the inquiry upon which the Report is based.

GOVERNMENT STOCK AND THE POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now prepared to give greater publicity to the fact that Government stock can be purchased through the agency of the Post Office Savings Bank, by means of advertisements or otherwise; whether he can state the amount at present invested through the above agency; and, whether he will cause to be re-issued, and sold at a low price, "Aids to Thrift," originally published during the time the late Mr. Fawcett was Postmaster General?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that I have directed a fresh notice to be issued to all Postmasters throughout the Kingdom, desiring them to exhibit in a more conspicuous place the printed notices with which they have been furnished. The amount invested through the Post Office Savings Bank on the 31st July last was £7,007,767, of which £3,003,157 has at different times been sold, leaving a balance on 31st July of £4,004,610. I have already caused the essential parts of the work called "Aids to Thrift" to be reproduced in the Post Office Handbook, price one penny, which can be obtained at any Post Office, or ordered from postmen.

WESTMINSTER HALL.

MR. DELISLE (Leicestershire, Loughborough): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will engage to have the new additions to Westminster Hall completed, both within and without, before the next Session of Parliament; and whether he proposes to continue the parapet, wrought iron railings, and gas-lamps as far as the St. Stephen's entrance, after the pattern of the existing parapet, railings, and gas-lamps from the Clock Tower to the corner of the new addition to Westminster Hall; and, if so, whether he will engage to have the works completed and the rubbish cleared away as soon as possible?

MR. ROE (Derby): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works how soon the present hoarding on the west side of Westminster Hall will be removed and replaced with a suitable iron railing; and if he can inform the House when the scaffolding, workshops, and one-cutting machinery, which have so long disfigured Westminster Abbey, will be taken away?

SIR H. MAXWELL: The plans for laying out the grounds adjoining the new addition to Westminster Hall, and for the construction of the necessary boundary fence are still under consideration, and until they have been approved it is not possible to begin the work. The cost will be very considerable, and it will be necessary to submit to Parliament an Estimate for provision of funds. It may, therefore, not be possible to complete the works before next Session. The Office of Works has no responsibility in connection with Westminster Abbey, but I have communicated with the rev. Canon in residence, and he assures me that the architect is using all possible despatch in the completion of the work.

IRELAND—COMMISSION OF THE PEACE—MR. JAMES BYRNE

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence between the Lord Chancellor and Mr. James Byrne, of Wallstown Castle, resulting in the dismissal of the latter from the Commission of the Peace for acting as Justice on a charge against the police in an adjoining Petty Sessions District within his own County (Cork); whether the Lord Chancellor, when dismissing Mr. Byrne, had under his notice the decision of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved in England (Queen v. Beckley, 20 Q. B. D. 187), holding that it was distinctly legal for a Magistrate to act within his county outside his Petty Sessions District; whether Lord Coleridge in that case said,

"In dealing with an offence committed in the county the Magistrates for the county have jurisdiction throughout the county," and Baron Pollock held that "The law is very jealous to preserve the jurisdiction of Magistrates, and their authority is not to be cut down without an express provision to that effect;"

whether if this exposition of the law in England was not reported when Mr. Byrne was dismissed, the Lord Chancellor will now reinstate him; whether as all Resident Magistrates in Ireland are allowed to sit everywhere throughout their counties and some of them in several counties, and all English Magistrates can exercise jurisdiction through all their counties, a different practice is to be established for Irish Justices or their Commissions forfeited if they act on the English Law; and whether, in consequence of Mr. Byrne's dismissal, no Catholic Magistrate and no Magistrate who is not a landlord or an agent now sits for his Petty Sessions District?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I stated, in reply to a question put by the hon. and learned Gentleman on March 13th, that the correspondence between the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Byrne, of Wallstown, had been published by Mr. Byrne, and circulated in the Press. The decision in the case quoted in the question does not appear to me to affect Mr. Byrne's case, or the reasons which induced the Lord Chancellor to act as he did. There is no analogy in the present case with the appointment of a Resident Magistrate, whose duty it is to attend, if possible, every Petty Sessions in his jurisdiction. The Lord Chancellor sees no reason whatever for reinstating Mr. Byrne. I am informed that it is not the case that no Roman Catholic who is not a landlord or an agent now sits for the district in consequence of Mr. Byrne's dismissal.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand that the law of England is not to prevail as the law in Ireland in this matter? Can English Magistrates sit where they like; and are Irish Magistrates not being Resident Magistrates to be dismissed if they sit out of their own district?

*MR. MADDEN: The reason for which the Lord Chancellor acted in this matter was not that Mr. Byrne had violated the law by acting without jurisdiction, which was the case in the instance which the hon. and learned Gentleman has quoted. It was that he had been guilty of a reprehensible practice in sitting outside his customary district for the purpose of adjudicating on a special class of cases.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will call attention to this matter on the Estimates.

MR. COX: Will the Lord Chancellor take notice of all Magistrates who sit outside their own district?

*MR. MADDEN: A similar practice on the part of any other Magistrate coming to the notice of the Lord Chancellor will, I have no doubt, be dealt with in a similar manner.

ALLEGED OUTRAGE ON FISHERMEN BY THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the fact that, by direction of Sub-Inspector Bigley, of Lurgan, County Armagh, Acting Sergeant Beyers, and three other constables, fired upon a boat containing three fishermen, named James Robinson,

John Robinson, and John Campbell, on the River Bann, and that, when remonstrated with by the fishermen on their conduct, the Sergeant pointed his rifle at John Campbell, and threatened "to shoot him to hell," if he spoke another word; and whether, since the Magistrate at Portadown has granted a warrant for the arrest of Acting Sergeant Beyers, the Government will take any steps in the prosecution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that District Inspector Bigley gave no such direction as alleged in the question, nor was he present on the occasion referred to. Robinson has alleged that Acting Sergeant Beyers fired at him, but the Acting Sergeant denies the charge. He has been admitted by the Magistrate who issued the warrant to bail in his own recognisance of £20. A summons has been issued by the District Inspector against Acting Sergeant Beyers, which will come on for hearing at the Lurgan Petty Sessions on the 20th inst.

MR. BLANE: Were the cartridges of these men examined when they came in? because they are issued in certain numbers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not profess to have looked into the evidence, nor do I think it would be proper to do so as the case is coming on for trial.

MR. BLANE: Does the right hon. Gentleman know of any case in which a person firing at another was released on a £20 bail?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume that the Magistrate did not think that the constable fired at any particular individual, but I cannot give the hon. Member any other information than that.

THE RIVER LEA.

SIR JOHN COLOMB: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what action has been taken by the Department with reference to complaints made by the Poplar District Board of Works relative to the insanitary condition of the River Lea?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have communicated with the Corporation of West Ham with reference to the allegations of the Poplar District Board of Works, and I am awaiting their reply. I have also directed one of the Engineering Inspectors of the Board, who has made previous inquiry as to the discharge of sewage into the River Lea by the West Ham Corporation, to visit West Ham and to report the result of his inquiries. His previous engagements have prevented his visiting the works until to-day. I expect shortly to have his Report.

THE CARLOW POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON (in the absence of Mr. BYRNE): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is in a position to state what progress, if any, has been made with the new Post Office for Carlow; and, whether he will urge the Department to proceed with the arrangements as quickly as possible?

*MR. RAIKES: I am informed by the Board of Public Works that owing to unexpected difficulties the work of adapting the premises taken for the new Post Office at Carlow has not yet been commenced; but that it will be pressed on as quickly as possible.

THE STARR BOWKETT BUILDING SOCIETY.

CAPTAIN HEATHCOTE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Stoke and Fenton 235th Starr Bowkett Building Society has not sent to the Registrar of Building Societies their returns for 1888, as required by 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 42, section 43; and whether he will take such measures as may be necessary to compel this Society to forward their returns for 1888 to the Registrar?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Registrar of Friendly Societies that the Society in question informed him in December last that, owing to the large number of withdrawals, arrangements were being made for winding up. No formal intimation, however, of the announced winding up has been received, and the Registrar will in a few days send the usual notice requiring a statement of accounts for the year ending July, 1888. It is, therefore, premature at present to say whether it will be necessary to take any action.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the evidence taken upstairs showed that the Registrar has completely neglected his duties as to enforcing the sections of the Friendly Societies Act?

MR. MATTHEWS: asked for notice of the question.

IRELAND—LAND COMMISSION— MR. BABINGTON.

MR. CAREW: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the appointment of Mr. Hume Babington by the Chief Land Commission as Court Valuer to inspect certain holdings near Downpatrick in cases of appeals recently heard there, and in which Messrs. Wrench and Litton have not yet given their decisions, whether he can now state if this Mr. Babington is a land agent in County Armagh; whether he invariably gave evidence on behalf of landlords in fair rent cases in County Antrim and County Derry; and, whether he will direct the attention of the Land Commission to these facts, and also to the desirability of appointing to inspect these holdings some independent valuer who is neither in the employment of the landlords nor the tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question does not appear to be substantially different to the one put down by the hon. Member for South Down on the 30th of July, and I do not think I have anything to add to the reply then given.

MR. CONYBEARE, M.P.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give the date of the medical report which has been received respecting Mr. Conybeare's health; whether it made any, and what, reference to the repeated complaints made by Mr. Conybeare as to the rheumatic affection from which he is suffering, or to the complaints made by Mr. Conybeare respecting the weakness of and pain in his eyes, which he attributes to the whitewashed walls of his cell; whether, inasmuch as Mr. Conybeare complains of suffering constant pain, sometimes so severe as to entirely cripple him and prevent him from walking, he will have further and fuller reports sent as to Mr. Conybeare's condition; whether it is the fact that on Monday last Mr. Conybeare could get only half an hour's exercise, owing to the wet weather, and on Tuesday he and all other prisoners were confined to their cells the whole day, in consequence of the rain; whether, in view of these facts, he will reconsider his opinion that no sheltered exercise ground is needed; and, whether there is any other prison in England or Ireland in which first-class misdemeanants are confined to one small cell similar to that which Mr. Conybeare is compelled to occupy?

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will request the General Prisons Board of Ireland to direct the doctor of Londonderry Gaol at once to make a careful examination into the state of the eyesight of Mr. Conybeare, M.P.?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The notice is insufficient to deal with these questions.

MR. MAONEILL: Well, will the right hon. Gentleman give me the assurance that a special officer will be sent to examine into Mr. Conybeare's eyesight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot do that. The surgeon to the gaol is a most competent man, and I have not the slightest fear that the hon. Member will be neglected.

MR. MACNEILL: But the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the prison doctor is a mere general practitioner, and not a specialist.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: Will the right hon. Gentleman request the General Prisons Board of Ireland to direct the doctor of Londonderry Gaol to at once make a careful examination into the state of Mr. Conybeare's eyesight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board are perfectly alive to the health of every person in the Irish prisons, and I know they are watching this case with great care.

DR. KENNY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give a general order on the question of the colouring of the cells? The matter has been already under discussion amongst the authorities and they are all agreed on the matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that the authorities are agreed on the matter. There has been no evidence brought before me that leads me to believe that the present system of colouring the walls of prison cells is deleterious to the eyesight of the prisoners. However, I will bring the matter before the Irish Prisons Board and take their opinion on it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that when the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) was in Tralee Gaol, and made representations as to the distress caused to him by the white colour of the walls, the Governor of the gaol had the evil remedied in the twinkling of an eye—causing the walls to be brown-washed? I would ask the right hon. Gentleman is it worth while to keep this question open such a length of time when, with so little trouble, the grievance of the hon. Member for Camborne could be removed?

DR. KENNY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter on the Estimates.

PRISONERS AND THE PRESS.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that the General Prisons Board of Ireland have detained a letter from Mr. Conybeare, containing a paper written by that hon. Member for the editor of the Mining Journal; whether the paper contained anything more than a mere expression of Mr. Conybeare's views upon the question of mining royalties, which the editor of the journal had asked him to send, with the object of comparing them with the views of other Representatives of mining constituencies who had already contributed similar expressions of opinion on this important question; whether there was in the hon. Member's paper any reference to controversial topics connected with the causes of his imprisonment, or with Ireland generally; and whether, under the circumstances, he will direct that the hon. Member's letter may be permitted to pass?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that a communication from Mr. Conybeare, intended for the Press was submitted by the Governor of Londonderry Prison on the 31st ult., and in accordance with the established practice of the service he was informed in reply that no prisoner of any class is permitted to write to the Press. It would, in the opinion of the Prisons Board, be wholly incompatible with the maintenance of prison discipline.

Mr. Mac Neill

pline if a contrary course were permitted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask—as the right hon. Gentleman has now made a definite statement that no prisoner of any class can now be permitted to write to the Press—whether the rule has been in existence since January 1, 1883, or whether it has only been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman himself?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board have given me the information which I have given to the House. I know no more about the subject. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will put a further question on the Paper I will endeavour to answer it.

MR. MACNEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that Mr. E. Yates and Mr. Stead were allowed to conduct their respective journals when in prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A question of that kind ought to be addressed not to me, but to the Home Secretary.

MR. MACNEILL: Then I will ask the right hon. Gentleman a question as to prison discipline in Ireland. Does not the right hon. Gentleman know that the late Richard Pigott, when in prison as a first-class misdemeanant in 1866, was allowed to conduct his newspapers?

POST OFFICE APPOINTMENTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that it has been the practice to announce in the Official Postal Circular vacancies occurring in Postmasterships, &c., and the date by which application to fill such vacancy could be sent in; whether such practice has recently been departed from; whether a recent Post Office Circular contains the record of 10 appointments, all made without any previous announcement that a vacancy existed; and whether he will state to the House the reasons for the change?

MR. RAIKES: I am quite aware of the practice to which the hon. Member refers, and no change has been made as regards the general custom. I must, at the same time, say that I am under no obligation to maintain the practice. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that in the case of the 10 appointments to Postmasterships recently made no previous announcement of a vacancy had appeared. The fact is that only four Postmasterships were vacant, and they were all notified in the usual way in the Post Office Circular. The candidates selected to fill these four vacancies were all Postmasters, and with the view of giving as wide and simultaneous a flow of promotion as possible I selected others from among the candidates, several of whom were themselves Postmasters, to fill the posts thus rendered vacant.

OLD CALABAR.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can communicate to the House the substance of the Report of Consul Hewett on the outrage committed at Old Calabar on the 25th of February last; and what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Germany on the subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Satisfactory explanations have been received from the German Government upon the subject; but it is not considered necessary to present any Papers.

RABBIT COURSING.

MR. BUCHANAN: I desire to ask the Home Secretary whether he has received memorials from Bath, Newcastle, and other places as to the continuance of the alleged cruel practice of "rabbit coursing" in enclosed places; and whether he will take into consideration the expediency of amending the Cruelty to Animals Act, so as to deal with this practice?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. I have received such memorials. While greatly disapproving of the cruelty sometimes displayed in rabbit coursing, as described in the memorials, I do not see my way to the possibility of amending the law in the present state of public business.

MR. BUCHANAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a promise, or hold out any hope, that the question will be dealt with by legislation next Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will acknowledge that it would be extremely imprudent on my part to hold out any hope of the kind.

OMNIBUS HORSES.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to complaints that have been made to the police authorities of the bad condition and unfitness of the horses being worked in certain omnibuses in London; and whether he proposes to take any steps towards putting a stop to the practice of using unfit horses in public vehicles by giving the police authorities power to withhold or withdraw licenses from proprietors who do not possess horses adequate, in the opinion of said authorities, for the services they undertake to perform, or otherwise?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that during the year he has received complaints as to the unfitness of horses from six private persons. In consequence of these complaints inspection was ordered by the Commissioner of Police in exercise of the power vested in him by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 33, s. 2, and a veterinary surgeon was called in to report on the studs of three proprietors. In the case of two of these proprietors the inspection showed that the horses were all fit for work. In the case of the third proprietor four horses were reported unfit. If these horses are worked notices as usual will be issued, and if they are disregarded the license is liable to be revoked. The police are fully alive to their duties in this respect, and, in the opinion of the Commissioner, the provisions of the existing law are adequate for the purpose.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that omnibus companies and tramway companies increase their fares by double the amount on Bank holidays?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

H.M.S. SULTAN.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether, since the full Minutes of the Proceedings at the inquiry into the loss of the Captain, in 1870, and of the proceedings at the inquiry into the loss of the Vanguard, in 1876, were laid before Parliament, he would explain in what respect, if any, the inquiry into the loss of the Sultan differed in character and purpose from these inquiries?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In the case of the loss of the Captain and the Vanguard the only inquiry held was under Court Martial. In the case of the Sultan an investigation both by Court Martial and by a Court of Inquiry was held. I am not aware that the proceedings of any naval Court of Inquiry have ever been laid before Parliament. In the present instance the proceedings, both of the Court Martial and of the Court of Inquiry, have been published in extenso through the daily Press, but I must decline to make the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry a Parliamentary Paper.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Has there been an Admiralty Minute prepared as to this inquiry, and, if so, will it be laid before the House?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No, Sir. If the hon. Gentleman will look into the circumstances of the Vanguard inquiry, he will see that that inquiry bears no analogy to the inquiry into the loss of the Sultan, consequently no Minute will be prepared.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): When one of Her Majesty's ships is lost, is it not right that all information concerning such loss should be given to the House of Commons?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Any hon. Member desiring to have full information can obtain it by consulting the published reports of the proceedings.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this subject on the Appropriation Bill.

THE CASE OF MURPHY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that a constable of the X Division of the Metropolitan Police has just been dismissed the service, on the ground that he was "grievously suspected of giving false evidence;" and, whether it was upon the evidence of this constable that a costermonger named Thomas Murphy (who upon his trial set up an alibi) was in December last convicted and sent into penal servitude; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: A constable of the X Division has been dismissed from the service on the ground that he had made false statements with reference to the discharge of his duties as a police officer, and with reference to immoral conduct discreditable to the force; and also on the ground of grave suspicion attaching to the truth of a charge made by him. The case against Murphy rested principally on the evidence of this constable, and after full consideration and consultation with the learned Judge I have thought it right to release Murphy on license.

IRELAND—PRISONERS UNDER THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the directions given by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, under the 14th section of "The Crimes Act, 1887," make any and what provision for counsel and solicitors of persons charged, and where may those directions be found; are those directions distinct from the rules under the 15th section; do the scales made under the latter rules relate to anything but the travelling and maintenance of the accused and their witnesses; would he state specifically whether the Gweedore prisoners to be tried in the Queen's County at a special session of the Assizes in October will receive from the Crown full and adequate aid to enable them to retain and keep the counsel and solicitors engaged and instructed for their defence before the charge of venue; and, whether there is any scale to meet such a case; and, if not, will he see that one is provided as directed by the Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The directions of the Lord Lieutenant, under Section 14 of the Crimes Act, do make provision for counsel and solicitors of persons charged. These directions are embodied in Treasury regulations and are at Dublin Castle. They are distinct from the rules under Section 15. The Gweedore prisoners will, of course, receive from the Crown the same aid as that already given to other prisoners in change of venue cases under the Treasury scale existing.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that that only refers to travelling expenses, and that no person has ever received anything except for travelling expenses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather from the information supplied to me that what is done is this: There has been provision made for the travelling expenses of witnesses and for maintenance, and in addition to that I believe there is provision made for solicitors and for counsel—under Sections 14 and 15. That is the impression I gather.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state where these directions are to be found—in what Treasury Minute?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether there is any objection to make known the contents of the Treasury Minute, but I will inquire into the matter.

"BAD CHARACTERS" IN ENNIS.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give the names of the "bad characters" with whom Martin M'Namara, hon. Secretary Crusheen Branch Irish National League, was associating with in Ennis, which led to his arrest in that town on the 25th ultimo?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the Report received from the Constabulary Authorities it appears that M'Namara was observed to associate with several suspects of the district. I think it would be contrary both to precedent and to the public interest to publish the names of such persons.

MR. COX: I must press this question. The right hon. Gentleman has stigmatised as bad characters some of the most respectable inhabitants of the town of Ennis and the County of Clare, some of whom may be, for aught I know, friends of my own. I want to learn the names of the persons to whom he referred. Will he repeat his cowardly and contemptible elanders outside the House? [Loud cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must know that he is not entitled to use that language.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what is meant by the term "suspects." Is it a term known to law?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not a term known to law. I did not use it in a legal sense.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: What is the meaning of the phrase?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Persons who are under suspicion, I suppose.

MR. COX: I rise to —

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LAND CASES FROM STRANORLAR.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Solicitor General if he is aware that several hundreds of cases, served for hearing before the 1st November, 1887, in the Land Courts in the Union of Stranorlar alone, are still undealt with, and that the tenants are being processed in large numbers at every sessions for the old rents; and, whether he can account for the extraordinary delay in hearing these cases?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there are 484 cases from the Union of Stranorlar unheard, and which were received before November 1, 1887. I am not aware that the tenants are being processed in large numbers for the old rents. But even were such the case, their interests are safe-guarded by the existing statutes. A Sub-Commission has been sitting continuously in County Donegal since September, 1888, and the several unions have been taken up in their turn. The last sitting for the union referred to was in December, 1888, and there will be another sitting early next Circuit for the same district. All the Sub-Commissions have been working continuously throughout Ireland and are constantly engaged. It has not been possible to arrange for more frequent sittings. The Commissioners anticipate that if the Bill introduced this week by the Government becomes law this Session, the disposal of outstanding applications to fix judicial rents will be much expedited.

THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON EDUCATION.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give an assurance that no new Education Code will be laid upon the Table of the House of Commons next Session, nor any fresh educational legislation be proposed by Her Majesty's Government, until the Report of the Royal Commission upon Education has been amply and in detail discussed in both Houses of Parliament?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): We are, I think, accustomed to "ample" discussion in this House, and I do not know what interpretation the hon. Gentleman would give to such an engagement as he desires me to enter into. I am extremely sorry it is not in my power to make him any pledge on the subject.

MR. DE LISLE: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that we shall have an opportunity of discussing this matter early next Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; I cannot undertake to provide a special time for such discussion. The hon. Gentleman is aware that hon. Members themselves are able to raise discussions on questions of this character.

A COURT FOR CRIMINAL APPEALS.

MR. FRANCIS MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill next Session for the constitution of a Court of Appeal in Criminal Cases?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question of the hon. Member is one of great importance; but I am sure he will see that it is not in my power to give him an answer to a question which would have to be considered by the whole Government.

MR. F. MACLEAN: I beg to give notice that as early as possible next Session I will call the attention of the House to the question of the advisability of constituting a Court of Appeal in criminal cases, and move a Resolution.

THE MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT IN THE COLONIES.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies which of our Colonies have adopted the principles of the Merchandise Marks Act, how many have failed to do so, and what steps are being taken by the Colonial Office to secure uniformity in that respect?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Laws similar to the Merchandise Marks Act are in force in the following Colonies:—Canada, Newfoundland, the Cape of Good Hope, Natal, Western Australia, Jamaica, British Guiana, British Honduras, Trinidad and Tobago, Grenada, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, the Leeward Islands, the Falkland Islands, St. Helena, Sierra Leone, the Gambia, the Gold Coast, Lagos, Gibraltar, Ceylon, Mauritius, and the Straits Settlements. The Governments of the following Colonies have promised to introduce similar legislation:—Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, Bahamas, Barbados, Malta, and Hongkong. In Fiji, Heligoland, and Labuan, it has not been considered necessary at present to legislate, but the Governors will be instructed to do so. In Bermuda a Bill has been introduced by the Government, but has been rejected by the Legislature. The Government of New South Wales has not yet signified its intention of adopting the principles of the Act, and the Governor has been recently requested to report on the subject. The Secretary of State has taken the necessary steps to secure uniformity of legislation in Crown Colonies, and he trusts that in those Colonies in which the Crown has no control over legislation (with the unimportant exception of Bermuda) uniformity will shortly be established.

IRELAND—THE RELEASE OF FATHER STEPHEN

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether Father Stephen, the priest of Falcarragh, who was sentenced to six months' imprisonment on account of circumstances connected with the Gweedore evictions, was yesterday discharged from Derry Gaol two months before the expiration of his sentence; and, if so, what are the grounds for his discharge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is true that Father Stephen has been released; the ground of his release is failing health.

MR. MAC NEILL: I have received the following telegram from Father Stephen:—"I have never pleaded ill-health, and my health is still good."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am perfectly aware that Father Stephen never pleaded ill-health, but the doctor, on observing a loss of weight, advised his release.

IMPRISONMENT OF MR. CONYBEARE.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask whether Mr. Conybeare was sentenced yesterday to be deprived for a week of all newspapers, and, if so, on what ground, having regard to the fact that the Irish Estimates are now being discussed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I know nothing about the subject of this question, nor can I for a moment see what relevancy the Irish Estimates can have to the sentence alleged to have been passed.

PROGRESS OF BUSINESS.

MR. W. M. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): May I ask when the Vote for the Dublin Metropolitan Police will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We are now taking the Magistrates' Vote out of its order in deference to the wish of the Irish Members. We propose, however, to take the rest of the Votes in their order.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Is it intended to take the second Order to-night—the Infectious Diseases Notification Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: I should be glad to take it to-night if the Irish Estimates are finished before 12 o'clock.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When the Government bring in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, do they intend to include in it the first section—the Leaseholder's Section—of the Act of 1887, so as to give leaseholders a little additional time to go into Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; it will be included.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Will the Tithe Rentcharge Bill be taken on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes; and we hope to be able to make considerable progress with it. I think I may now refer to the notice I gave last evening with reference to a Saturday sitting. I was under the impression that hon. Members would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity to shorten the Session by a Saturday sitting; but information has been communicated to me from various parts of the House, and especially from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, that a Saturday sitting would be extremely disagreeable to them. Under these circumstances, I do not wish to occupy time by discussion, and will therefore not proceed with the notice which stands in my name. In taking this course I hope I may appeal to hon. Members in all parts of the House to make such reasonable progress with the business as will afford a chance to hon. Members, who, I believe, are generally desirous of returning to the country as early as possible. Of course it is the duty of the Government to remain as long as it may be necessary; but I believe there are very many hon. Gentlemen who would be exceedingly glad to see the end of the Session, and I appeal with confidence to hon. Gentlemen not to prolong discussion beyond what is reasonable and necessary.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Will the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill be the First Order of the Day on Monday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Substantially, the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill will be the First Order on Monday.

MR. COSSHAM: I would ask whether pressing forward the Tithes Bill is not contrary to the statement the right hon. Gentleman has just made, that he desires to save the time of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that the Government feel themselves compelled to take the judgment of the House on this Bill.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Does the Secretary to the Treasury intend to proceed to-night with the London County Council (Money) Bill?

MR. JACKSON: Yes. I do not think there is any opposition to it.

INDIAN TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India recognises the preferential claim of officers who have served a great number of years in the Indian Telegraph Department, and who have entered that Department in its lower grades, to the higher offices in the Department as they fall vacant?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In making promotions in the Telegraph Service the Government of India have regard, first, to personal fitness, and, secondly, to length of service.

Mr. W. H. Smith

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what is the total amount of the pensions now payable in England to members of the Indian Telegraph Department; and what would be the extra cost if those pensions were paid in sterling?

SIR J. GORST: The amount is Rs 89,758 11 annas. The extra cost of paying in sterling would be £2,804 19s. 4d., at the present official rate of exchange.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £84,062, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries, Allowances, and Expenses and Pensions of various County Court Officers, of Divisional Commissioners and Magistrates in Ireland, and the Expenses of Revision."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It might perhaps be in accordance with the wishes of the House that I should make a short explanation, almost in the nature of a personal explanation, with regard to an episode which occurred in the course of my speech last night on this Vote. It will be recollected that one of the subjects that came up for discussion was the conduct of Mr. Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner in declining to subscribe to the Kerry Hunt, and I stated that one of the reasons which I understood to influence these gentlemen was that they were of opinion that the attacks made upon them in the newspaper of an hon. Member who was on the committee of that hunt were of such a kind as to make it impossible for them to continue their connection with the hunt any longer. I read out certain phrases which I had understood afforded some of the grounds on which these two gentlemen had come to their decision. The hon. Member referred to appeared to dispute the general accuracy of the phrases, and I have done my best since then—I have not had much time—to discover how far the view which I understand to be the view of Mr. Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner, is absolutely justified by the contents of the newspaper in question—the Kerry Sentinel. The Kerry Sentinel is in the habit of giving publicity to the resolutions of various branches of the Land League in that part of Ireland—

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman proposes to justify the opinion of the Magistrates by citations from a newspaper. I think that is in-roducing a new element into the Debate foreign to the question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On the point of order, Sir, may I point out this to you? The contention of the two gentlemen in question, Mr. Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner, whose conduct was publicly called attention to in the House, was based on certain expressions which they said, or thought, were used in the Kerry Sentinel. The reply made was that these expressions were not used in the newspaper; therefore, I would ask you, Mr. Courtney, whether it would not be relevant to the Debate to point out that, as a matter of fact, absolutely equivalent expressions have been so used?

*THE CHAIRMAN: That would be wandering into an entirely new controversy. The only question is as to the accuracy of the representation of the views entertained by those two Magistrates. As to going into a justification of the views, I do not think that would be regular.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I do not wish to press the point; but I would ask, is not the accuracy of the representation dependent upon the fact that those quotations did occur in the newspaper in question? If they did occur, the representation of the views of the Magistrates would be correct; if they did not occur, it would be incorrect. In that way would not this matter be relevant?

*THE CHAIRMAN: No, I think not. The point raised last night was, the justification of the right hon. Gentleman in making his statement in which he represented the views of the Magistrates. The point is the justification of the right hon. Gentleman, not of the Magistrates who held these views.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Courtney, the Magistrates were attacked.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Not in relation to this.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then may I not justify myself?

*THE CHAIRMAN: If the right hon. Gentleman proposes to adopt the language last night as representing the views of the Magistrate and wishes to make that language his own, he will in that case be justified in going into this evidence. But I would strongly deprecate such a course as fatal to the conduct of business.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the face of your strongly-expressed opinion, Sir, I shall abstain from going into the matter further.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): On the point of order, may I ask, Mr. Courtney, whether the right hon. Gentleman would be entitled to reply to a question on the subject of the language actually used?

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order is generally preserved by paying deference to the wishes of the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman has elected to do that.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I should be very happy, indeed, if you saw your way to afford the Chief Secretary the facility he desires. The charge last night was that I in my paper did use that language, and I call upon the right hon. Gentleman to substantiate it.

*THE CHAIRMAN: That is not quite what was said last night. But I appeal to both sides of the House after the expression of opinion that has fallen from the Chair to let this digression cease.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I will pass over the incident of last night, merely remarking that the Chief Secretary, through his secretary or his secretary's secretary, may easily manage by letters to the newspapers to fully explain his position. The matter upon which I first wish to ask a question is strictly relevant to this Vote, and has reference to the action of the Government in regard to Resident Magistrates. These Resident Magistrates are allowed not merely to practice in a particular Petty Sessions district, they are armed with powers to sit in various counties throughout Ireland. About four months ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a distinct pledge that a Paper would be laid upon the Table explaining the position of the Divisional Commissioners. I had never seen any Paper explaining under what circumstances these gentlemen were placed in their new position. They started as ordinary Resident Magistrates, and remained so until Mr. Forster issued what was called his "satrap circular" making them Divisional Magistrates, dividing Ireland into six, and placing one man over each Division. It will be remembered that the Auditor General stigmatised the proceeding as "grossly illegal," and it was the subject of discussion during the whole of a night in this House. It shows extraordinary elasticity and suppleness in the law that when Government cannot get the salaries of these gentlemen as Divisional Magistrates, they can elude the Auditor General by turning them into Divisional Commissioners. The Lord Lieutenant shifts the slide, the Lord Chancellor turns on his lime-light, and these gentlemen blaze forth as Divisional Commissioners with judicial functions in 12 counties. Then I come to the Resident Magistrates, and first to Mr. Cecil Roche, of whom I wish to speak with the utmost respect due to him personally, and to his office, or as I may say offices. Mr. Cecil Roche began official life as a Land Commissioner, and in that capacity it may be remembered how he punished Lord Annaly by cutting down his rents. Mr. Cecil Roche had a quarrel with Lord Annaly, and that nobleman got it hot and heavy from Mr. Cecil Roche. To use a common expression, he "wired into" Lord Annaly with equal energy to that he has since displayed against my hon. Friend and the Nationalists of Kerry. For private reasons, into which I will not enter, Mr. Cecil Roche left the position of Land Commissioner and became a Resident Magistrate. As a Land Commissioner he had £1,000 a year and expenses. How it was that he was compelled or induced to become a Resident Magistrate with £450 a year I will not now inquire into. He was appointed to Kerry, and there he carried out the views of the Government so well that they increased his salary and jurisdiction. They made him a Magistrate of the County of Clare. Now the practice of these gentlemen is to travel from one Licensing Sessions to another, and whenever a Nationalist publican applies for a renewal of his license in Clare, Mr. Cecil Roche sails up from County Kerry, and takes his seat on the Bench to secure the refusal of the license. And this brings me to the case of Mr. James Byrne and the manner in which he has been treated. How can the Lord Chancellor defend his action with respect to Mr. James Byrne, a tenant-farmer in the neighbourhood of Mallow and a Justice of the Peace? Mr. Byrne is a moderate politician, but he was an old member of the Tenants' Defence League ten or more years ago. It happened that at the Sessions at Fermoy, which is 10 miles from Mallow, where Mr. Byrne resided, there was a case in which the police were charged with having batoned the people. Mr. Byrne came up from Mallow, and sat on the Bench during the trial, and for thus sitting outside his district Mr. Byrne's name was removed from the Commission of the Peace. At the same time Mr. Eaton, R.M., was brought from Mitchelstown, a distance of 15 miles. It was all right for him to come, and he was paid for it, but because the unpaid Magistrate came a lesser distance he was dismissed from the Commission. This I say is a scandalous exercise of the authority of the Lord Chancellor. How does the law stand as laid down in a case decided as recently as two years ago? The action of the Lord Chancellor is in absolute opposition to the law laid down in England in the case of "The Queen v. Bickley," in which the Queen's Bench, upholding the decision of Quarter Sessions, held that a Magistrate's jurisdiction extends to the whole county, and is not confined to his own Petty Sessional district. Such is the decision of Lord Coleridge and Baron Pollock. Why, then, was Mr. Byrne dismissed?

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a point that does not arise under the Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The point I wish to raise is the difference of treatment of Mr. Eaton and Mr. Byrne.

THE CHAIRMAN: The action of a Resident Magistrate in acting outside his district is another point; the hon. Member was going beyond that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What I urge is that the treatment applied to Mr. Byrne should be equally applied to Mr. Eaton, and all the rest of the noble army. Why is that which is forbidden to Mr. James Byrne conceded to Resident Magistrates in whom nobody has any confidence, and some of whom are in a hopelessly insolvent condition and figure in the pages of Stubbs' Gazette? Many of these gentlemen I allude to are allowed to go about from one district to another, now acting as Resident Magistrates, now, like Mr. Cecil Roche, leading a baton charge of the police, and continuing at Licensing Sessions to deprive Nationalists of licenses. Why should these men be allowed to pack the Bench on such occasions? Why is Captain

Stack, of whom, personally, I say nothing, allowed to exercise jurisdiction over 12 counties? From experience we have had of their conduct, I verily believe that many of these Magistrates would, instead of the plank bed and six months' hard labour, be willing to have the penal laws re-enacted. I am sure that Mr. Cecil Roche would gladly set up a triangle for the purpose of inflicting 100 lashes with his own hand on my hon. Friend the Member for West Kerry. Still, these men have their uses, and when Home Rule is established they may be sent to Belfast, where Inspector Kerr, after being prosecuted for breaking Nationalists' heads, had his own head broken by the Orange rioters. One of these Magistrates, Mr. Hamilton, during the Home Rule Debates, expressed the willingness of himself and his colleagues to serve a National Parliament with as much zeal as they now serve the Tory Government. No doubt they would. Mr. Roche and Mr. Hamilton would do a good deal for £600 a year. Well, if the civil war breaks out as predicted by the military Member for Belfast, these gentlemen may be placed in the forefront of the battle, and display their zeal for law and order. Meantime, I am anxious that Irishmen under this administration and the next should have an equal administration of the law. Among the appointments I find the name of Mr. Bruen, and I ask what are the special qualifications he possesses for the Magistracy? He is the son of a Privy Councillor and of a former Member of this House, and I believe he has shown some skill in cricket. We have the "demon bowler" put on the Bench, and I would suggest that the "demon bowler" should be kept within something like reasonable limits. The other Magistrate who sat with the "demon bowler" was Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald. He, I see, figures in the book of biography—a kind of Magisterial Dodd, I think the Chief Secretary called it yesterday. His qualifications are those of an officer in India. Poor Mr. Fitzgerald. I understand that the heat has a great effect on a certain class of officers in India, and Mr. Fitzgerald, I am informed, has become, what is called in Indian slang, a "gonner," from sunstroke or the heat of the weather. So Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald was sent

day, in consequence of the rain; whether, in view of these facts, he will reconsider his opinion that no sheltered exercise ground is needed; and, whether there is any other prison in England or Ireland in which first-class misdemeanants are confined to one small cell similar to that which Mr. Conybeare is compelled to occupy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The notice is insufficient to deal with these questions.

MR. MAC NEILL: Well, will the right hon. Gentleman give me the assurance that a special officer will be sent to examine into Mr. Conybeare's eyesight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot do that. The surgeon to the gaol is a most competent man, and I have not the slightest fear that the hon. Member will be neglected.

MR. MAC NEILL: But the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the prison doctor is a mere general practitioner, and not a specialist.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: Will the right hon. Gentleman request the General Prisons Board of Ireland to direct the doctor of Londonderry Gaol to at once make a careful examination into the state of Mr. Conybeare's eyesight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board are perfectly alive to the health of every person in the Irish prisons, and I know they are watching this case with great care.

DR. KENNY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to give a general order on the question of the colouring of the cells? The matter has been already under discussion amongst the authorities and they are all agreed on the matter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that the authorities are agreed on the matter. There has been no evidence brought before me that leads me to believe that the present system of colouring the walls of prison cells is deleterious to the eyesight of the prisoners. However, I will bring the matter before the Irish Prisons Board and take their opinion on it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that when the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) was in Tralee Gaol, and made representations as to the distress caused to him by the white colour of the walls, the Governor of the gaol had the evil remedied in the twinkling of an eye—causing the walls to be brown-washed? I would ask the right hon. Gentleman is it worth while to keep this question open such a length of time when, with so little trouble, the grievance of the hon. Member for Camborne could be removed?

DR. KENNY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this matter on the Estimates.

PRISONERS AND THE PRESS.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that the General Prisons Board of Ireland have detained a letter from Mr. Conybeare, containing a paper written by that hon. Member for the editor of the Mining Journal; whether the paper contained anything more than a mere expression of Mr. Conybeare's views upon the question of mining royalties, which the editor of the journal had asked him to send, with the object of comparing them with the views of other Representatives of mining constituencies who had already contributed similar expressions of opinion on this important question; whether there was in the hon. Member's paper any reference to controversial topics connected with the causes of his imprisonment, or with Ireland generally; and whether, under the circumstances, he will direct that the hon. Member's letter may be permitted to pass?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that a communication from Mr. Conybeare, intended for the Press was submitted by the Governor of Londonderry Prison on the 31st ult., and in accordance with the established practice of the service he was informed in reply that no prisoner of any class is permitted to write to the Press. It would, in the opinion of the Prisons Board, be wholly incompatible with the maintenance of prison discipline pline if a contrary course were permitted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask—as the right hon. Gentleman has now made a definite statement that no prisoner of any class can now be permitted to write to the Press—whether the rule has been in existence since January 1, 1883, or whether it has only been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman himself?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board have given me the information which I have given to the House. I know no more about the subject. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will put a further question on the Paper I will endeavour to answer it.

MR. MACNEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that Mr. E. Yates and Mr. Stead were allowed to conduct their respective journals when in prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A question of that kind ought to be addressed not to me, but to the Home Secretary.

MR. MACNEILL: Then I will ask the right hon. Gentleman a question as to prison discipline in Ireland. Does not the right hon. Gentleman know that the late Richard Pigott, when in prison as a first-class misdemeanant in 1866, was allowed to conduct his newspapers?

POST OFFICE APPOINTMENTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that it has been the practice to announce in the Official Postal Circular vacancies occurring in Postmasterships, &c., and the date by which application to fill such vacancy could be sent in; whether such practice has recently been departed from; whether a recent Post Office Circular contains the record of 10 appointments, all made without any previous announcement that a vacancy existed; and whether he will state to the House the reasons for the change?

*MR. RAIKES: I am quite aware of the practice to which the hon. Member refers, and no change has been made as regards the general custom. I must, at the same time, say that I am under no obligation to maintain the practice. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that in the case of the 10 appointments to Postmasterships recently made no previous announcement of a vacancy had appeared. The fact is that only four Postmasterships were vacant, and they were all notified in the usual way in the Post Office Circular. The candidates selected to fill these four vacancies were all Postmasters, and with the view of giving as wide and simultaneous a flow of promotion as possible I selected others from among the candidates, several of whom were themselves Postmasters, to fill the posts thus rendered vacant.

OLD CALABAR.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can communicate to the House the substance of the Report of Consul Hewett on the outrage committed at Old Calabar on the 25th of February last; and what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Germany on the subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Satisfactory explanations have been received from the German Government upon the subject; but it is not considered necessary to present any Papers.

RABBIT COURSING.

MR. BUCHANAN: I desire to ask the Home Secretary whether he has received memorials from Bath, Newcastle, and other places as to the continuance of the alleged cruel practice of "rabbit coursing" in enclosed places; and whether he will take into consideration the expediency of amending the Cruelty to Animals Act, so as to deal with this practice?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. I have received such memorials. While greatly disapproving of the cruelty sometimes displayed in rabbit coursing, as described in the memorials, I do not see my way to the possibility of amending the law in the present state of public business.

MR. BUCHANAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a promise, or hold out any hope, that the question will be dealt with by legislation next Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will acknowledge that it would be extremely imprudent on my part to hold out any hope of the kind.

OMNIBUS HORSES.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to complaints that have been made to the police authorities of the bad condition and unfitness of the horses being worked in certain omnibuses in London; and whether he proposes to take any steps towards putting a stop to the practice of using unfit horses in public vehicles by giving the police authorities power to withhold or withdraw licenses from proprietors who do not possess horses adequate, in the opinion of said authorities, for the services they undertake to perform, or otherwise?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that during the year he has received complaints as to the unfitness of horses from six private persons. In consequence of these complaints inspection was ordered by the Commissioner of Police in exercise of the power vested in him by 16 and 17 Vict., c. 33, s. 2, and a veterinary surgeon was called in to report on the studs of three proprietors. In the case of two of these proprietors the inspection showed that the horses were all fit for work. In the case of the third proprietor four horses were reported unfit. If these horses are worked notices as usual will be issued, and if they are disregarded the license is liable to be revoked. The police are fully alive to their duties in this respect, and, in the opinion of the Commissioner, the provisions of the existing law are adequate for the purpose.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that omnibus companies and tramway companies increase their fares by double the amount on Bank holidays?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

H.M.S. SULTAN.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether, since the full Minutes of the Proceedings at the inquiry into the loss of the Captain, in 1870, and of the proceedings at the inquiry into the loss of the Vanguard, in 1876, were laid before Parliament, he would explain in what respect, if any, the inquiry into the loss of the Sultan differed in character and purpose from these inquiries?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In the case of the loss of the Captain and the Vanguard the only inquiry held was under Court Martial. In the case of the Sultan an investigation both by Court Martial and by a Court of Inquiry was held. I am not aware that the proceedings of any naval Court of Inquiry have ever been laid before Parliament. In the present instance the proceedings, both of the Court Martial and of the Court of Inquiry, have been published in extenso through the daily Press, but I must decline to make the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry a Parliamentary Paper.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Has there been an Admiralty Minute prepared as to this inquiry, and, if so, will it be laid before the House?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No, Sir. If the hon. Gentleman will look into the circumstances of the Vanguard inquiry, he will see that that inquiry bears no analogy to the inquiry into the loss of the Sultan, consequently no Minute will be prepared.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): When one of Her Majesty's ships is lost, is it not right that all information concerning such loss should be given to the House of Commons?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Any hon. Member desiring to have full information can obtain it by consulting the published reports of the proceedings.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to this subject on the Appropriation Bill.

THE CASE OF MURPHY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that a constable of the X Division of the Metropolitan Police has just been dismissed the service, on the ground that he was "grievously suspected of giving false evidence;" and, whether it was upon the evidence of this constable that a costermonger named Thomas Murphy (who upon his trial set up an alibi) was in December last convicted and sent into penal servitude; and, if so, what action he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: A constable of the X Division has been dismissed from the service on the ground that he had made false statements with reference to the discharge of his duties as a police officer, and with reference to immoral conduct discreditable to the force; and also on the ground of grave suspicion attaching to the truth of a charge made by him. The case against Murphy rested principally on the evidence of this constable, and after full consideration and consultation with the learned Judge I have thought it right to release Murphy on license.

IRELAND—PRISONERS UNDER THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the directions given by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, under the 14th section of "The Crimes Act, 1887," make any and what provision for counsel and solicitors of persons charged, and where may those directions be found; are those directions distinct from the rules under the 15th section; do the scales made under the latter rules relate to anything but the travelling and maintenance of the accused and their witnesses; would he state specifically whether the Gweedore prisoners to be tried in the Queen's County at a special session of the Assizes in October will receive from the Crown full and adequate aid to enable them to retain and keep the counsel and solicitors engaged and instructed for their defence before the charge of venue; and, whether there is any scale to meet such a case; and, if not, will he see that one is provided as directed by the Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The directions of the Lord Lieutenant, under Section 14 of the Crimes Act, do make provision for counsel and solicitors of persons charged. These directions are embodied in Treasury regulations and are at Dublin Castle. They are distinct from the rules under Section 15. The Gweedore prisoners will, of course, receive from the Crown the same aid as that already given to other prisoners in change of venue cases under the Treasury scale existing.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that that only refers to travelling expenses, and that no person has ever received anything except for travelling expenses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather from the information supplied to me that what is done is this: There has been provision made for the travelling expenses of witnesses and for maintenance, and in addition to that I believe there is provision made for solicitors and for counsel—under Sections 14 and 15. That is the impression I gather.

MR. O'DOHERTY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state where these directions are to be found—in what Treasury Minute?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether there is any objection to make known the contents of the Treasury Minute, but I will inquire into the matter.

"BAD CHARACTERS" IN ENNIS.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give the names of the "bad characters" with whom Martin M'Namara, hon. Secretary Crusheen Branch Irish National League, was associating with in Ennis, which led to his arrest in that town on the 25th ultimo?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the Report received from the Constabulary Authorities it appears that M'Namara was observed to associate with several suspects of the district. I think it would be contrary both to precedent and to the public interest to publish the names of such persons.

MR. COX: I must press this question. The right hon. Gentleman has stigmatised as bad characters some of the most respectable inhabitants of the town of Ennis and the County of Clare, some of whom may be, for aught I know, friends of my own. I want to learn the names of the persons to whom he referred. Will he repeat his cowardly and contemptible slanders outside the House? [Loud cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must know that he is not entitled to use that language.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what is meant by the term "suspects." Is it a term known to law?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not a term known to law. I did not use it in a legal sense.

believe that it is even a delusion. I believe the Chief Secretary is far too clever a man to nurse or hug any delusion of that kind. His position is this, as I apprehend. He is like Prometheus: he is chained to his post. His friends will not allow him to leave. They say—"You have been such a success in the Irish Office." He wants to be somewhere else; he would like to have some other work than that of promoting Resident Magistrates, and looking after the interests of the Irish landlords in Gweedore and elsewhere; but he has been so great a success that he cannot be spared; and having entered upon this false and foolish policy he is bound to see it to its end. His predecessor was wiser: he got out in time. He knew what was coming. While I admire the courage and ability of the right hon. Gentleman in carrying out the Coercion Act in the way he is doing, I cannot but think that he is only actuated by a false and foolish pride. It is to my mind a miserable thing that the two nations should thus be kept divided, and that our nation should be crucified—not between two thieves, but among seventy-two of them—for I believe there are 72 Resident Magistrates operating from one end of the country to the other. I say it is a miserable thing if this state of things is to be allowed to continue, and that if you are reasonable men you will appoint Magistrates of character and substance, who will administer the law with discretion, who will examine into the state of the people and do something for them that will be better than sending them to a plank bed. We have had announcements made that never was there a period of greater prosperity in Ireland than now; that never were there more amicable relations between the Resident Magistrates and the people than those which exist at the present moment. Does any one believe this? Do we believe it? And we, after all, are the best judges. If our country were only content, should we not be delighted? What have we to gain by a contrary course? I put it to you whether the fact that the representatives of five-sixths of the Irish people are against the present system of administration ought to count for something; and in view of all the follies and mistakes these Magistrates have made I ask you why can you not begin a new life, and do something to earn the gratitude of a people over whom you now insist on ruling?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): When the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Healy) condescended from the region of general denunciation of the follies and mistakes of the Resident Magistrates, and from the sallies with which he has diverted the Committee, and came to the regions of fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman was not, I think, very happy in the illustrations he employed in order to enforce his general accusations. He has spoken of the qualifications of these Magistrates, and asked who are they? He also drew a picture of a Court composed of two Resident Magistrates, one of whom he described as a "Demon Bowler," and of another, whom he alluded to as a retired Indian Official; but I would point out that the very case which had been decided by this Demon Bowler and the retired Indian Official was discussed in this House, when three learned Gentlemen, Members of this House, undertook to lay before us their version of the law upon the subject. The three hon. and learned Gentlemen who undertook to give their opinions on the legality of the sentence of the Court referred to and criticised by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford were men of whose legal competence the Lord Lieutenant might fairly have been satisfied. They were the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Western Division of Durham, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfriesshire, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockton, who was formerly Solicitor General; and they all took the same view of the law, and pronounced against the legality of the decision of the Resident Magistrates in ordering the Member for Mid Cork to find securities of good behaviour. But when I look at what took place before the Court of Exchequer, I find that that Court decided that the action of the Magistrates was perfectly legal, and that those learned Gentlemen were wrong. This, I think, is a very significant fact; and an incident of this kind brought home to the Committee is worth a good deal of denunciation. I can hardly suppose that the three hon. and learned Gentlemen to whom I have referred came down to enlighten this House upon that case without having looked into the law on the subject, or for the mere purpose of making an attack on their political opponents. I do not believe it; and it only serves to show the enormous room there is for differences of opinion on questions of this kind. Now, when we are told to look at the qualifications of the Magistrates I would wish the Committee to turn to see the extent to which their decisions have been questioned; and what do we find? for this, I say, is the broad and proper way of looking at the question. Whether this or that man acquired his experience or legal knowledge by study and practice as a barrister, or by practical experience as a Magistrate, is not the point; the question is, whether the magistrates have acquired legal knowledge and experience sufficient to enable them to discharge their duties in a satisfactory manner. I say, therefore, that when you find it recorded that there are only 9 per cent of successful appeals against their decisions, and when you find in the case of the hon. Member for Mid-Cork that only on one point, and that a purely technical one, was the order of the Magistrates reversed, the ground being that one Magistrate had not the power to adjourn the hearing, I do not think a case can be made out against the Magistrates by discussing their antecedent qualifications for office. We are not now discussing the Crimes Act, but the allegation that the Government have worked that Act by improper means, and by the employment of inefficient and incompetent men. Well, how are we to bring charges of this nature to the test? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford has said there is no appeal in certain cases, but I say that there is, under the Crimes Act, the same appeal as in cases under the ordinary law in Ireland. Where points of law are involved there are means of having any questions decided by the Superior Courts. Now, I ask the Committee to look at the results. It seems to me that the most conclusive answer to the accusations of incompetency brought against these gentlemen is the fact that so remarkably small a number of appeals against their decisions should have been successful. It has been found that the decisions of these Magistrates, whom the Committee are asked to condemn as a class, have on the whole, with a remarkably small number of exceptions, been upheld, whether by the County Courts on appeal or by the Superior Courts. But the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Longford has asked the Committee to believe that the appeals which go before the County Court Judges are not fairly heard. We have been told that a certain Judge has a son who is a Resident Magistrate. Now, I put it to the Committee, is that a serious way of dealing with such a question? And, again, I ask the Committee to look at the broad facts. What is the position of the 22 or 23 men who are County Court Judges in Ireland? Who are they, how are they appointed, and what is their tenure of office? I challenge any one to say that, as a body, they do not fairly represent the practising Bar of Ireland—I do not say those very first flights; but they are men who have all won their way to their present position by sheer merit. When we are told that one of these gentlemen has a son who is a Resident Magistrate, I ask whether that can be regarded as a serious criticism of such a body? Can it, for one moment, be considered a ground on which we are to discuss the action of the two, or three and twenty Irish County Court Judges? And here I hope the Committee will not, for one moment, understand me to suggest that it is a ground which ought to be put forward even against the individual Judge to whom reference has been made. Well, I have shown what is the class of men of whom the County Court Judges of Ireland are composed; and when I say that their tenure of office is such as to render them absolutely independent of the Executive, I think I have placed the position they hold in a light which the Committee will be able to appreciate. Complaint has been made, and an explanation demanded, of the statement made by a certain County Court Judge to this effect, as it is suggested, that he would not entertain appeals in Crimes Act cases. Now I have had that statement before me, and I deny it is of the nature which has been suggested by the hon. Member.

I have been asked to explain the position of Divisional Magistrates under the new rules. The action of the Government with reference to the substitution of Divisional Commissioners for Divisional Magistrates has been very simple. Divisional Magistrates are not Magistrates in the sense of acting judicially; they are always Executive officers, and I think that the name was an unfortunate one. This class of appointment was first made, I believe, in 1882, in the time of the late Mr. Forster. Those gentlemen who were appointed Resident Magistrates under an Act of Parliament had a fixed salary, and as long as they held that appointment it was held—and rightly held—by the Committee of Accounts, that the only salary they could draw was the statutory salary of a Resident Magistrate; but it was never doubted that the Government could appoint Executive officers, and so instead of being appointed Resident Magistrates they are now appointed Executive officers, with a fixed salary, and that salary will have to be voted by Parliament. Reference has been also made to the fact of these Magistrates being put upon the Commission of the Peace to enable them to discharge the duties of their office. That is by no means an unusual proceeding, and as to its legality and conformity with precedent, I do not think that there can be any doubt. The point has been raised that it is allowable for Resident Magistrates to reside in a different Petty Sessions district from that in which they act, whereas ordinary Justices of the Peace must not habitually reside out of their own district. The cases, however, are totally different. Resident Magistrates are paid for going round to assist the ordinary J.P.'s in carrying out the law; that is the purpose for which they are appointed. They are to be experts and competent practised Judges, to discharge duties in various Petty Sessions districts, and not confine themselves to one district as an ordinary Magistrate, but go on service as they are required from one district to another. Do hon. Members opposite by their ironical cheers mean to suggest that this statement is inaccurate, and that it is the duty of a Resident Magistrate to adhere to a single Petty Sessions district during his tenure of office? Such a contention would be absurd. Reference has been made to a recent decision with regard to the power of a Justice of the Peace; but that decision has no bearing upon the subject now under discussion. It merely amounts to this—that the Commission of the Peace gives jurisdiction in every part of the country; for my own part, I only wonder that such a proposition has ever been seriously doubted. With regard to the occurrence at Naas where it is stated that the Magistrate turned the counsel in a case out of Court, I have the report of what occurred on that occasion, and I find that the learned counsel in the case used language which the Court regarded as improper. He said the conduct of the Bench in regard to the cross-examination of a witness was a scandal. The Resident Magistrate, Mr. Fitzgerald, asked him to withdraw the expression. He refused to withdraw it, and said that he had used it deliberately, and the Court refused to hear him unless he withdrew it. The learned counsel had spoken of scandalous conduct—

MR. J. REDMOND (Wexford, N.): That is not a true report of what I said; it is substantially accurate as far as it goes; but without a full report the matter cannot be fairly judged. I will supply the hon. and learned Gentleman with a report of the exact language which I used.

*MR. MADDEN: I should be very glad if the hon. and learned Member would correct me if the report before me is inaccurate; but I am bound to deal with the question as it has been brought forward. No explanation, however, can remove the fact that on being called upon to withdraw his language the hon. and learned Gentleman refused to do so, and said that he had used it deliberately. If an incident of that kind had occurred in any Court, high or low, in England, and counsel had used words similar to those which the hon. Member admits to be substantially correct, I think that precisely similar action would have been taken. With regard to the solicitor, I am informed that at a later period he addressed the Court, and dared the Magistrate to put him out.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is a most inaccurate report.

*MR. MADDEN: In the opinion of the Court the proceedings were systematically disturbed, and as a matter of fact I am informed that Mr. Brown was not turned out.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He was taken out by two policemen.

MR. J. REDMOND: Does the Solicitor General derive his information from the newspaper reports, because they are entirely different from each other?

*MR. MADDEN: My information is derived from official sources, not from newspaper reports. As an instance of the recklessness with which assertions are made, it has been stated that Mr. Cecil Roche gave a sentence of six months' imprisonment to a person for waving his hat for Mr. O'Brien. As a matter of fact, Mr. Roche did not adjudicate on that occasion at all, and never gave the sentence; it was given by a different Magistrate altogether.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have got the deposition of Mr. Cecil Roche, signed at the police barrack, stating what had occurred on that occasion.

*MR. MADDEN: The sentence attributed to Mr. Roche was not passed by Mr. Roche; it was passed by Captain Walsh; and that was rather an important fact when Mr. Roche is being attacked for that particular sentence. The hon. Member for Stockton asked me in this House upon what evidence Captain Walsh acted, and whether he had anything before him except the deposition of Mr. Roche; and the answer I gave was that Captain Walsh acted on the evidence of his own senses. A Magistrate in requiring securities for good behaviour is entitled to act upon his own knowledge of what is occurring in his presence, or, in other words, the evidence of his own senses. Mr. Stock did not go to gaol for an hour, because he gave sureties to be of good behaviour. These Magistrates perform their duties in the full light of day. "The fierce light that beats upon a throne" is darkness compared with the glare of publicity in which they discharge their duties. This I do not complain of, and the Government have no reason to complain of it. I am certain that the Resident Magistrates have no reason to complain of it. Is there a single act of the Resident Magistrates during the last 20 years that has not been carefully looked into? Looking at the whole record, looking at the proportion of successful appeals, looking at the isolated cases that have been taken up, I believe the Committee will think that the Resident Magistrates have come out of the ordeal to which they have been subjected with every credit to themselves.

MR. J. REDMOND: I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman has tried to prove too much. Whatever else the Resident Magistrates may be they are not competent and practised Judges. It would have been more to the purpose to show that they were an average body of men who have been entrusted with functions of a very difficult character. Although there is reason to complain of the conduct of individuals, I cannot treat the question apart from the policy of the Coercion Act they are administering. No matter what body of men are employed to administer it, they cannot give satisfaction in carrying out its provisions. I object to the method in which the Magistrates are selected, to the method in which they are instructed and inspired, and to the manner in which they do their work. No men could satisfactorily discharge the duties of Judge and jury that are cast upon them. No law is more complex and difficult than the Law of Conspiracy; and one of the most competent Judges resigned rather than take upon himself the administration of that law without the assistance of a jury. Yet in administering that law the Resident Magistrates have to act as both Judge and jury. It is generally held that the liberty of the subject would not be worth a moment's purchase unless it were safeguarded by Judges independent of the Executive, and by juries indifferently chosen; but as Judges the Resident Magistrates are not independent of the Executive, and as jurymen they are not indifferently chosen. Coming to individuals, it is impossible to avoid giving expression to strong feelings of resentment at many things which have occurred. It is irrelevant to compare the qualifications of Members of Parliament with those of Resident Magistrates, as the Chief Secretary has done, because Members of Parliament have not to try charges of conspiracy. Recently I was interested in an intricate case of conspiracy tried by Mr. Bodkin and Mr. Macleod. Mr. Bodkin is said to have been, before his appointment, a civil engineer, a farmer, and a Militia officer; and Mr. Macleod had been for some years a Constabulary officer, and these are the men supposed to be qualified to deal with a difficult question of law. It is monstrous that such enormous powers should be entrusted to men with these qualifications. A power committed to them is that of instituting secret inquiries, by examining witnesses in the presence of no one but a shorthand writer. Mr. Justice Stephen, in his history of the criminal law, deals with secret inquiries, and he says:—

“The substitution of secret interrogation for an open investigation would appear to us to be poisoning justice at its source. An English Judge would feel himself degraded if he were required to extort admissions by elaborate cross-examination.”

Yet this is the system which is at work under this Crimes Act. In these secret inquiries no rules of evidence guide or fetter the discretion of the Magistrates. A secret inquiry was held recently in the County of Wexford, and presided over by a gentleman named Considine. He summoned people before him, and in secret questioned and cross-questioned them, so as to extort admissions from them. As to his qualifications for the exercise of legal functions at all, I find it stated that he served as High Sheriff in County Limerick in 1881, and that he kept all his terms for the Bar, but for family reasons was not called. The other day Mr. Considine admitted in evidence that years ago he kept all the summer terms at one of the English Inns, but never attended a lecture or attempted to pass an examination. It seems to me, therefore, that the description of this Magistrate is a dishonest one. Now, the Solicitor General's argument, that the charge of incompetence brought against the Magistrates is negatived by the number of appeals in which the convictions have been confirmed by the County Court Judges, was prima facie, no doubt, a strong one. But when we look into the facts we can see what this confirmation is worth. One County Court Judge who has jurisdiction over three counties—I refer to Judge Darley—has declared that he will not interfere in any of these Crimes Act cases with the discretion of the Magistrates, unless he is satisfied they have made a mistake in point of law.

Mr. Madden

What did that mean? It meant that appeal, which by law should be a rehearing of a case, was absolutely taken away from every man who was within the jurisdiction of that County Court Judge. Take another instance. The Solicitor General was indignant at the suggestion that these County Court Judges could be anything but independent and impartial administrators of the law. I should like the hon. and learned Gentleman to state whether he seriously considers that County Court Judge Webb is a gentleman entirely independent of the Executive Government. We know how County Court Judge Webb got his preferment. We know that Judge Webb was the pamphleteer for the Conservative Party in Dublin and was engaged in the preparation of articles for which he was paid by a certain political association, and which in another shape formed the origin of the Times' articles on ‘Parnellism and Crime.’ Although Judge Webb may have had at one time some practice, I deny that he ever had such legal professional work as to justify his appointment as County Court Judge. I say his promotion was the payment for the political service he did to the Party opposite. To ask us to have confidence in a gentleman of that kind is about as absurd as to ask us to have confidence in the legal knowledge of Mr. Cecil Roche and men like him. I hope the people will notice to-morrow that the Solicitor General thinks that Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald and Mr. Civil Engineer Bodkin are competent and practised Judges. One of the Judges of the Supreme Court—Mr. Baron Dowse—has said there are several things he has never been able to understand, and one of them is the mind of these local Justices: bear on to und Justices: Lienter case th as well a Greel selves. Courts said he which l all the Courts and Mr

"If you wish that to be of any use you must collect all the Magistrates together and give them a good grind in it."

These are the practised and competent Judges the learned Solicitor General said are quite fit to administer the law of conspiracy and other official powers vested in them by the Crimes Act. I notice there has been a recent development in the action of these Magistrates; they have recently taken to tacking on to their sentences under the Crimes Act further sentences in default of finding bail. I do not believe that when the Legislature limited the imprisonment to be inflicted to six months, it contemplated that it might be extended to nine or 12 months under an Act of Edward III. Had such a thing been thought possible, I believe that the House would have introduced a provision to prevent it. It is all very well to say that a man need not be imprisoned because he has only to give bail for good behaviour. The way that Irishmen look at that is shown by what Chief Baron Palles said the other day—namely, that if he were asked to give sureties for good behaviour, he would sooner die first. I should like to refer to an incident in which Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald took part; but before I come to the particular point let me say that there is only one barrister practising in Ireland who has succeeded in appearing before Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald without being turned out of Court, and, as far as I have been able to ascertain, there is not a single solicitor in the district, except the Crown Solicitors, who has not been removed from Court by this Magistrate's order. Some time ago I was engaged at the Winter Assizes in the town of Maryborough, where Lord Chief Justice Morris was trying cases. Some of the prisoners were defended and others were undefended, and I was greatly struck by what I saw and heard. If a prisoner was undefended the Judge allowed him in statement and in cross-examination the most enormous latitude. I left the Court and went into the Court of Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald. There were eight or ten defendants in the case in which I appeared, but I appeared for only one of them. The Magistrate did not interfere with my discretion, but the moment one of the undefended prisoners rose in his place in the dock and commenced—perhaps incoherently, perhaps irrelevantly, but certainly not with any intention to be disrespectful to the Court—to cross-examine one of the witnesses, Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald at once interfered, and said, "You cannot ask that question," "That is irrelevant," "If that is the kind of question you have to ask, sit down; if you do not, I will order you to be dragged down by policemen." I turned to my solicitor and said, "This interference with the cross examination of witnesses by undefended prisoners is the most scandalous thing I ever saw." Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald's ears are somewhat long, and he caught my observation, although it was not addressed to him, and he asked me if I said that. I said I did. He asked me to withdraw it; but I, remembering what I had just seen in the Lord Chief Justice's Court, refused to withdraw the expression. For that offence I was ordered out of Court. My solicitor remained, and what occurred in his case was this: The Magistrate was writing down the depositions himself. Mr. Brown, the solicitor, complained that a certain answer was not correctly taken down. The Magistrate said, "Sit down, sir, and hold your tongue," and Mr. Brown answered, "I will not; I am discharging my duty to my client, and I insist upon that answer being taken down correctly." For that Mr. Brown was seized by two policemen and dragged out of Court. This is the kind of thing that is constantly occurring when cases are tried before Mr. Fitzgerald. Reference has been made to the fact that his action in the case of Dr. Tanner has been upheld. But it was reversed upon one point, which was a very simple one—namely, that a Court not properly constituted to hear a case could not adjourn it; and as to the second point, with regard to the holding to good behaviour or committing for three months for contempt of Court, it is a strange thing that the brilliant idea of falling back on his alternative jurisdiction under the Act of Edward III. should strike Mr. Fitzgerald—an ex-Civil servant of India—whereas it has never occurred to any of his colleagues, some of whom do possess some legal knowledge. Mr. Baron Dowse, in alluding to the warrant on which Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald

and further on the learned Judge said—

I am free to express my opinion that Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald did not act on his own initiative in the matter, but that he was inspired by the legal advisers of the Government in Dublin Castle. The Chief Secretary denies that there is any fusion between the Executive and the Judicial functions of Magistrates; and he added that one of the reasons why Magistrates move about so frequently is that the Government desire that those who exercise Executive functions should not preside over Courts. But there are Judges in many parts of Ireland who are every day in the week combining Judicial and Executive functions. It is only the other day that I appeared before a certain Magistrate in a Crimes Act Court, and that within two hours of the close of the Court I witnessed the Magistrate leading a body of baton men in the dispersal of a meeting. Colonel Miller is constantly exercising both Judicial and Executive functions in my own county; therefore, it is not true for the Chief Secretary to say that the Executive and Judicial functions are kept distinct. The action of these Magistrates is going very far indeed to intensify the contempt in which the administration of the law is held in Ireland. The Irish people have got into their heads that what Erskine said long ago is true—namely, that where the administration of the law is left in the hands of the deputies of the Executive Government, there can be no liberty except such as is convenient to the Executive Government. Under present circumstances a sentence of imprisonment inflicted by one of these Courts is regarded not as a stigma, but as a title to honour. These Courts are not engaged in punishing crime, but in attempting to break down combination on the part of the people. As an instance of this, I may point to the fact that the Crimes Act is being vigorously put into operation in the County Wexford

—a county in which within the memory of living men there has not been a single serious agrarian crime, where at the last Assizes the business for the whole county, with a population of 150,000 persons, only lasted one hour and a half, and consisted of one case of petty larceny. Yet this county is being singled out for the most thorough and whole-hearted administration of the Coercion Act. This is the county where secret inquiries are being held right, left, and centre. This is the county where some of the Priests who have preserved the public peace for half a century are being prosecuted under the law of criminal conspiracy, which law is administered by ex-civil engineers and ex-Indian political officers. The object of these prosecutions is to put down what the Chief Secretary regards as illegal combinations on the part of the people. There are in the county only three estates in which the Plan of Campaign is at work; on all the other estates the tenants have come to terms with their landlords. Wherever the Magistrates are exercising their sway, wherever they are sending the local leaders to prison, public opinion is indignant at the system of Government. Public opinion justifies the action of the local leaders who may have made use of such extreme expressions or assisted the tenants in their action against their landlords. These combinations are defying the Coercion Act and defying the action of the Resident Magistrates, and, so far as crime is concerned, the action of the Coercion Act is absolutely unneeded. Let me say I attribute more to faults in the system than to faults in individuals. I do not deny that there are individuals among the Magistrates utterly unfitted by training and utterly unsuited personally for the performance of Magisterial functions; but still it is more to the system and policy that I attach fault than to individuals. The right hon. Gentleman is degrading the law; he is destroying whatever remains of confidence in the minds of the people in the administration of the law. He is postponing, so far as in him lies, the approach of that day, the arrival of which I and my colleagues ardently desire, when the law will be impartially administered between man and man in Ireland, will be regarded with confidence and respect by the people, and will cease to be an instrument in the hands of the rich and the few to be used against the poor and the many; when it shall be no longer true, in the words of Sir Redvers Buller, that there is no law on the side of the poor man in Ireland; when the law shall be administered with firmness, discretion, and justice between man and man. When that day comes, I believe the British Empire will have in no part of its vast dimensions a more loyal or more law-abiding people than in Ireland.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): The Chief Secretary last night repudiated with considerable heat the assertion made that there is collusion between Dublin Castle and the administrators of the Coercion Act. The assertion that sentences were prepared in Dublin Castle and sent down to the Courts he repudiated in the most emphatic manner, and denied that the statement had any foundation in fact. Well, we must accept that statement of his, but while we do so, it must be admitted that there are peculiar coincidences in the administration of the Coercion Act that to our, perhaps, prejudiced minds seem to require some explanation. I may refer to one of these coincidences in relation to my own case. It may be within the recollection of the Committee that I was arrested under the Coercion Act here in London, the first Irish Member so arrested in England. I was taken across to the capital of my county and brought before Mr. Cecil Roche and Mr. Hodder. The case lasted two days, and my hon. and learned Friend who has just eloquently addressed the Committee defended me on that occasion. To prove the charges against me it was necessary to bring up no fewer than 85 policeman; I think that was the number present. As I was, on the second morning of the trial, being escorted in this way from the prison to the Court-house there occurred one of these coincidences to which I have alluded. As I was passing into the Court a Government official whispered to me—"Cox, you'll get four months to-day for your speech at Ennis. Of course you will appeal, and you will be re-arrested and then you will get one month for your speech at Kildysart." This was in the morning, and the case proceeded through the day. At the end of the proceedings, as was predicted, a sentence of four months' imprisonment was passed upon me. I should have mentioned that, to the communication whispered in my ear, was added, "Orders have come down." Whether the orders came from Heaven or from Dublin Castle was not stated. I appealed of course, and upon leaving the Court I was re-arrested, brought before the same tribunal, and committed back to prison, bail being, as in the former case, refused. On the Tuesday following I was brought up for trial at Kildysart, where scenes occurred at which I shall have to refer later on. The charges and allegations against me on both occasions were word for word, letter for letter—in every respect identical. My first offence was my speech at Ennis, and there there might be supposed to be some excuse for me. I advised the people to stick to the constitutional agitation of the National League. Portions of that speech were read to the Committee last night by the hon. Member for York (Mr. A. Pease). There might have been some palliation of my offence on that occasion, because the proclamation of the National League in Clare had only appeared in the Gazette the day before. But my second offence was the delivery of a speech ten days afterwards, and then there was no excuse of absence of knowledge of the proclamation; and so I submit the second offence was the graver of the two, and the sentence should, therefore, have been heavier. Well, I was tried, and, of course, found guilty, and for this second offence, word for word, letter for letter, in every respect identical with the first, I was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. Against this sentence there is no appeal; it was pronounced to fill up the period of time between the one imprisonment and the other. We will suppose this is merely a coincidence, but what I would like to ask is, how was it that the Government official was able to learn what the sentences were going to be? Well, so much on the question of complicity between the Castle and Resident Magistrates in the exercise of their judicial functions. I now come to their executive functions. I was taken, as I said, to Kildysart under strong escort, and at the entrance to this small village of 30 or 40 houses I was placed in the centre of a square, and Mr. Cecil Roche, his famous blackthorn in hand, led the way. In the street, at the entrance with the decrees pronounced by the Resident Magistrates. Because it was known that Justice Waters was a man who, on the rehearing of a case, gave equal weight to the evidence of the witnesses for the accused and the police witnesses, appeals were not referred to him but to Mr. Justice O'Brien, a legal luminary who can be relied on to give thumping sentences whenever a packed jury find a verdict of guilty. Now there is one case upon which I wish to put a question to the Chief Secretary. The case of the hon. Member for Mid-Cork (Dr. Tanner) has been before the Court of Exchequer in Dublin, and we have had a very strong expression of opinion from the Judges, chiefly from Chief Baron Palles, of whose legal knowledge I hope the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary are satisfied. The Chief Baron expressed the strongest opinion as to the state of the law which enables Resident Magistrates to deal with the offence of contempt of Court under the Statute of Edward III. I am no lawyer, but every citizen knows that that Statute was introduced for a totally different purpose than for dealing with persons guilty of contempt of Court, and I want to know why it is that this musty old Statute is used for this purpose. Was a hint sent from Dublin Castle that this was the best method of dealing with contempt of Court when it was found that the Coercion Act was rather deficient in dealing with this offence, though Heaven knows its net was sufficiently widely spread to include most offences; was there a hint, I say, thrown out that this was a convenient method of dealing with inconvenient political adversaries, to bind them under greater stress and duration than under the ordinary powers of the Court in dealing with contempt?

"It is a strange thing," said the Chief Baron, introducing a very significant phrase, "it is a strange thing that the industry of the learned gentleman who represents the Crown has not produced a single case where a person has been held to peace for words spoken in Court."

The Chief Baron went on to say that in Ireland until within the last two or three years the respect for the Courts must have been such that no case on the subject could arise. That is perfectly true. At Petty Sessions before these tremendous powers were given to peripatetic Magistrates under the Coercion Act, a rough and ready kind of justice was administered, and there was no punishment for contempt of Court, because there was none necessary. The Chief Baron said also that the defamation was not that of an individual but of justice itself, and that he conceived that the words of Dr. Tanner though unmannerly might be regarded as having some relation to his defence. The hon. Member for Mid Cork was first deprived of his defender by the action of the Court, and then, being left to his own defence, because he uses language which somewhat goes beyond the normal limits of propriety, he is dealt with without warning and without caution in the most offensive manner. Why could not these gentlemen have dealt with him at once for contempt of Court? Why could they not have cautioned him? It is true, as Chief Baron Palles remarked, that it was not incumbent on them to do so. The learned Judge said he himself certainly thought that before being committed for contempt the person should have an opportunity of being heard, but the doctrine of the common law that no one should be condemned unheard, did not apply to our law, at least since the time of Edward III. Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to carry out the sentence against my hon. Friend in face of the fact that this oppressive procedure was used against him—does he intend, in face of the declaration of one of the highest Courts in Ireland, to carry out a sentence which is infamous in its character, and which ought never to have been pronounced? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will also let us know whether he has any intention of amending the law next Session in this particular direction. What is the position of the hon. Member for Mid Cork at this present moment? He committed the alleged contempt of Court when there was being passed on him a sentence which has been quashed. For expressing his contempt for an absolutely illegal decision he is now being imprisoned for three months if he does not give them sureties, which I think he ought not to give, and which I hope he will not give. There is another case which, as far as I know, has not been alluded to—namely, that of Mr. Powell, the editor of the Midland Tribune. That gentleman has been up twice before under the Coercion

Dr. Kenny

Act, and he edits a paper that does not find favour with the powers that be in Ireland. The case appears to me to be on all fours with that of the hon. Member for Cork. It illustrates, first, the oppressive nature of this proceeding for contempt of Court, and secondly, the fact that the Resident Magistrates are the creatures of the Executive. Mr. Powell published a Report in his paper, and he was charged with having used intimidation towards Her Majesty's subjects, and endeavoured to set Her Majesty's subjects against each other. The prosecution was instituted by County Inspector Ross. The counsel for the defendant asked the Resident Magistrate, Mr. Waring, whether he would state a case. Mr. Waring said at first that he saw no objection, but he had scarcely spoken before the gentleman of whom we have heard a great deal of late, Mr. Bolton, said "I object." Mr. Waring said there was no case to state. Mr. Bolton said the stating of a case intimated that in the opinion of the Court there was something to be argued. Mr. Waring then said, "Then I will not do it." Now, I wish to know whether in this case the sentence is to be carried out. I protest most strongly against Courts of Summary Jurisdiction in Ireland, which are endowed with enormous powers—powers of a character admittedly never before conferred on Courts—being allowed now to use at their pleasure the Statute of Edward III. It is notorious that these Magistrates are not thoroughly competent, and that they act from anything but the highest possible motives. I will give a little instance of the even-handed justice which these gentlemen mete out. In Macroom on September 29th, last year, Mr. O'Shea, the secretary of the branch of the League, was convicted of writing a letter inviting a man to explain his conduct, and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour, without the option of a fine. All Mr. O'Shea did was to write a letter just as the secretary of a club would write to a member asking him to give an explanation before the committee of something which was supposed to be an offence against the members of the club. Two days later the Magistrates who passed his sentence on Mr. O'Shea had to adjudicate upon a charge against a clerk to the firm of Hussey and Townsend, the well-known land agents, of having assaulted a common prostitute on a Sunday morning. He had got the woman into his office, and the police, assisted by some corporate officials, had to come and rescue her. Evidence was given to the effect that they found the woman lying on the floor in the hall, looking very faint and with tears in her eyes. The Magistrates convicted the person, and said the justice of the case would be satisfied with the infliction of a fine of £5. No doubt the character of the person assaulted might cast some suspicion on her testimony, but the man was convicted not on her evidence, but on that of the police-sergeant, and yet the Magistrates who two days before gave Mr. O'Shea four months' imprisonment for writing a letter inviting an explanation of a man's conduct, let this man off with a fine of £5. That, Sir, is the even-handed justice of the Resident Magistrates. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary what he has to say about the proceedings of Major Cadell in turning Canon Keller off his own premises during the Ponsonby evictions. The Canon was at the time standing in the churchyard, which, as is customary in Ireland, is absolutely vested in him. There is no allegation by the police that there was stone-throwing where he was standing. The police ordered him out of his own premises, and used a certain degree of force in ejecting him. I want to know by what right they did this. Is there any common law right in Ireland which enables the police to enter on private premises where no felony is being committed and violently to remove the owner? I want to know also whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to keep Mr. Powell in prison? There is one fact which ought to weigh with the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. Powell has been previously in prison, and, in consequence of his imprisonment, has lost the sight of one eye. This is no exaggeration, but is a well ascertained fact. Of course when the sight of one eye is lost, there is always extreme danger of the sight of the other going by sympathy, and if Mr. Powell now remains in prison, he is in a much worse position for standing the effects of the imprisonment. I say that if by a system of imprisonment you endanger the life, or seriously impair the physical well-being of a person, you are giving that person more punishment than the tribunal before which he appeared had rightly or wrongly given. When you give a man four months' imprisonment, plus the loss of an eye, you give him more than the tribunal intended to give him, and there is a gross violation of every principle of justice.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I am sure we have heard with interest the speech delivered by the Solicitor General for Ireland, who is honestly opposed to us, but who always recollects that he is speaking to his own countrymen, for he never acts in a way to provoke irritating or hostile personal comment. I will endeavour to follow his example. I may say, in all sincerity, I was astonished when the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of the Resident Magistrates as a body of competent practised Judges. In what does their competency or practice consist? It consists of being well versed in all the significance of the nods and winks of the Castle officials, and their competency lies in their power and ability to convict. The Resident Magistrates have merely the courage of convicting at the beck of the Government. I think it would be useful for the House to consider the enormous powers given to Resident Magistrates. Cecil Roche and O'Neill Segrave have a power and influence over the fortunes and liberties of their countrymen which is not possessed either by the Lord Chief Justice in England, or by the Lord Chief Justice in Ireland. The highest magistrate in the land cannot try a case of conspiracy without the intervention of a jury, but Cecil Roche and O'Neill Segrave have been able to. The Lord Chief Justices I have named hold, I believe, the Commission of the Peace in every county, and if they both, or either of them, were to enter a Coercion Court in which two Resident Magistrates were trying a case of conspiracy, they could not interfere, because the Coercion Act has taken away from ordinary Magistrates the power of sitting in these Courts, and has entrusted the administration of the Act to removable Magistrates paid by the Government, and liable to dismissal without notice and without explanation. These Magistrates hold their Commission by the influence of one man, for the Second Reading of the Coercion Bill was carried only through the influence of the publication of Pigott's forged letters in the Times. The Solicitor General endeavoured to discount the value of certain extracts, quoted from a Judge's charge by my hon. Friend, by eliciting that the charge was delivered before Resident Magistrates came into existence. It is certainly true that they did not exist in Ireland at that time, but as we go on we find fresh means of tyranny. The hon. and learned Gentleman must remember perfectly well the late Archbishop Whateley, who was not a partisan, for he kept aloof from Irish political parties; yet he said in 1852 that the Lord Lieutenant's time was largely occupied in deciding what ruined gambler should have this or that Stipendiary Magistracy. Again, Lord Rosse, the Chancellor of Dublin University, whose son stood against the hon. Gentleman as an independent Conservative, and whose election I did my best to promote, said the men selected for the position of Resident Magistrates were generally elderly renés with broken fortunes and damaged reputations, who were made stipendiaries because their patrons dare not venture to make them anything else. He goes on to say that the Government appoint only those who are absolutely dependent on them. Some are habitual drunkards, and more than half unable to show themselves except on Sundays. They are called "Sunday birds." There was, I believe, one whose body was seized by his butcher after death. I have here some of the characters written for applicants for these posts of "competent and practised judges," by their relatives to the Lord Lieutenant of the day. They were read in this House on the 1st April, 1887. I will only read one of them. It was addressed to Lord Carlisle, and the writer applied on behalf of his brother, "who had been leading an idle life and contracting habits injurious to his health as well as distressing to his family." The letter continued—

"He has latterly, I rejoice to say, been leading a different life; he has recently formed an attachment to an interesting Scotch lady, one who in point of deep religious belief is all that could be wished for. Their union is only delayed by financial reasons, and under these circumstances I venture to ask your Excellency to procure for him a situation as Stipendiary Magistrate, for which he is extremely well qualified, as he regularly and efficiently discharges his duties as J.P. in this parish."

Later on the writer adds that "some post of less value would be acceptable." This letter is signed, "P. Fitzgerald, Knight of Kerry." Now, that letter was written 25 years ago. But is this system of appointing Resident Magistrates still continued? What about O'Neill Segrave? How is it possible that that man, who was discharged from an inferior regiment for embezzlement of public and private funds—for frauds of a wantonly heartless nature, because he embezzled some money given him by a private soldier to take home to his mother—I ask how comes this man to be a competent and practised Judge? I fancy his head was filled with bad law, and his stomach with good whisky. What a Solon for the Government to place on the judgment seat! What a Daniel come to judgment! It was Dr. Tanner who first brought the case of Mr. Segrave before the House, and who first gave the House information, which the Government could easily have got through the Colonial Office. And now Dr. Tanner is punished, possibly by the exercise of an illegal and certainly an unusual jurisdiction, because he has unearthed that gentleman and stamped the character of the Resident Magistrates by giving Mr. Segrave as a specimen of the order. If the Irish Government did not know Mr. Segrave's antecedents when they appointed him, their negligence was in the highest degree culpable. If they did know them their conduct was wicked in the extreme. But is it to be believed that they did not know his antecedents? Credat Judeus Apella. I might freely translate that as "You may tell that to the Chancellor of the Exchequer." And now I come to the case of Dr. Tanner. He is at present serving three months' imprisonment. He was brought before a tribunal on a false and fictitious charge; he was charged under the Coercion Act, and if he misbehaved himself in Court the men who took him there were largely responsible for his misbehaviour. Of course, wonders never cease, but I want to know how it comes to pass that the two Resident Magistrates had a miraculous knowledge of the antique and obsolete Statute of Edward III., which was not possessed by the Law Officers of the Crown in this House, or even by an ex-Attorney General for England? Who suggested it to these men? How did they find it out? Who drafted for them that elaborate and legal document of process for contempt, which they brought with them into Court? Was it done by inspiration? Where did it come from? Did it come from the recesses of the Cabinet? When the appeal was being heard one very interesting observation was made by the Attorney General for Ireland. He said—

"I have given my opinion that this jurisdiction exists in this case, whether justly exercised or not."

Why did he go the extreme length of giving that opinion? I am certain that that document came from Dublin Castle. There is nothing new under the sun. A similar act of discovering musty and obsolete laws was once done in England in the days of the Stuarts, and all I can say is that a man who would dig down and exhume old statutes which everybody has forgotten for the purpose of doing an injustice, or what is worse, for the purpose of political calumny, is a person of whom no Administration need be proud. I regret that the Chief Secretary is not in his place. He has again and again reproved me for the tone of my references to these Magistrates. Of course I only laugh at his reproof. I again say that they are underground and secret agents carrying out the behests of the Chief Secretary. They are in a position of inferiority, they are dependent upon him. The "able and experienced judges" called Resident Magistrates are manufactured at Dublin Castle at round table conferences between them and the Chief Secretary for Ireland called to discuss the political situation. Otherwise what is the meaning of the paragraph recently published to the effect that Colonel Turner, Mr. Cecil Roche, and another Magistrate, who has been in attendance on the Chief Secretary during the last two days at the Castle, have returned to their districts. That is the way in which you manufacture your competent and experienced Judges. You have a conference between the starving Judges and their paymaster. When the Coercion Act first came into operation the right hon. Gentleman's minions thought they would best curry favour with him by inflicting the heaviest possible sentences under the Act, and consequently we had quite a crop of sentences of six months' imprisonment. This, of course, led to appeals, and pending the hearing of these the convicted Members went about the country repeating the so-called offences. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking in Manchester, in November, 1887, said that Resident Magistrates ought to give one month sentences, so that there would be no fear of appeal or of the men who were charged going about the country promoting disorder and confusion before the appeal was heard. For three months after the delivery of that speech I noticed that sentences for one month, accompanied with hard labour, were given, and the persons convicted were thus robbed of their right of appeal. The right hon. Gentleman made a comical excuse about the peregrinations of the Resident Magistrates. I asked him how it came to pass that, although these Magistrates were travelling all about the country, we were refused statistics in reference to the number of cases tried by each of them under the Coercion Act? Why are they sent all over the country? Is it not because men like Hamilton and Cecil Roche and Segrave could be relied upon to convict? I was reading last Sunday the Book of Job, which I will recommend the Members of the Government to peruse. A question was put to one, who was certainly not an angel, whence he came. The reply was from going up and down in the earth and from going to and fro in the land. That is exactly the motto of the favorite Resident Magistrates, and I have no doubt that when these gentlemen have finished their careers they will receive from the right hon. Gentleman the commendation, "Well done thou good and faithful servants." Now, I think no accusation against the Government would be complete unless we brought in a touch of the Times. I find that Captain Plunkett, the "don't-hesitate-to-shoot" man, was away from his duties 56 days in London, and Mr. Slack was absent 60 days. Three other Resident Magistrates volunteered to help the Times in tabulating returns for the Special Commission, and the Government, which out of its generosity gave the services of its Attorney General, has given rapid promotion to these men. Mr. Cecil Roche is promoted, and why?

Mr. Swift Mac Neill

"Because," says the Chief Secretary, "he richly deserves it." At the risk of being a little out of order I may say I wonder whether that gentleman is a far-away cousin of an interesting family, because the country is being governed at present by a family party. In conclusion, let me say that Resident Magistrates in Ireland bring justice into contempt, and they are the chief priests in the blasphemy of justice which at present characterises Irish administration.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I believe that the Statute of Edward III. has been used against the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), Mr. Powell, and the rest simply for the purpose of depriving them of the right of appeal, and at the same [time inflicting on them a longer term of imprisonment than can be inflicted under the Crimes Act without an opportunity of appealing being afforded. The case of the hon. Member for Mid Cork is by no means an isolated one. There is also the case of Mr. Powell, of the Midland Tribune, the case of Mr. O'Reilly, of County Tipperary, both of whom were sentenced under the Act of Edward III. I find also that, on Tuesday last, two Magistrates in County Cork sentenced one of the tenants on the Ponsonby Estate under that Statute. The young man was cited for one of the usual offences under the Coercion Act, and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The defendant said, "I accept the sentence, and I would do the same in the morning." The Bench then reconsidered their sentence, and ordered the defendant to find bail for his good behaviour for 12 months, or to go to prison for a further term of three months. Besides these cases, there are six others, of tenants on the Leader Estate in County Cork, who were sentenced under the same Act. The fact is, that there is what I think I may call a wholesale application of the Act of Edward III., so as to deprive the people of the right of appeal. We have seen, in the case of Dr. Tanner, that no right of appeal exists. I denounce this as a conspiracy between the right hon. Gentleman and his Removable Magistrates to effect the same purpose with regard to Coercion Act prisoners as he originally tried to effect by consecutive sentences of one month's imprisonment. The apologists for the Government say say, as the Attorney General for Ireland said in Court the other day, that this is no punishment at all, because a man can escape going to gaol if he gives bail to be of good behaviour. The Chief Baron of the Exchequer said the other day, "For my part, if I was ordered to give bail for good behaviour, nothing in the world would induce me to do so." The Irish people have taken the very same view of this indignity. It is of course on the calculation that they would take that view that this policy is being adopted. It is known that in no single instance would any of these men, who are not criminals, consent to give bail to be of good behaviour and thus place a brand and stigma upon themselves. I trust the point will be dwelt upon by other speakers, and that public opinion will be so brought to bear upon this attempt to deprive the intended victims of the Coercion Act of the right of appeal, which even this House of Commons had the intention of giving them, that the scheme will be exploded as was that of giving consecutive sentences of one month's imprisonment. Now, Mr. Courtney, there is one very important matter to which I wish to refer in regard to the Resident Magistrates. One of the most important and prudent of these executive officers in Ireland is Colonel Turner. I wish to draw attention to some of the recent proceedings of that gentleman, and to call upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say whether, in his opinion, Colonel Turner is a fit and proper person to hold the position he does hold. Colonel Turner is a Divisional Commissioner for the district of Clare, Kerry, and other counties, and I wish to refer particularly to his conduct in connection with the Vandaleur Estate, which has been the scene of some of the most striking eviction episodes that have taken place in Ireland, and which has been still more recently before the notice of the public as one of the most important instances in which the struggle of the Plan of Campaign has ended in securing justice for the tenant, and in bringing to reason a landlord who originally was mistaken enough to deny the just claims of his tenants. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) told me the other night that the battering ram had only been used in a couple of instances. Why on this very estate when the evictions began there the battering ram was used under the active superintendence of Colonel Turner in the cases of some twenty tenants, and the whole district was devastated by its operations. Numerous evictions took place, and a number of houses were levelled with the battering ram. The result was that the peace of the district was disturbed, and Clare became one of those counties which the right hon. Gentleman was able to quote at the head of his Coercion statistics. Colonel Turner was not content with superintending and aiding in the operations for the clearance of the estate, but he actually wrote letters to the Times describing what ought to be done, and was one of the first of those to suggest that which was known some time ago as the plantation policy. He suggested that the farms of the evicted tenants should be given to people imported from the North of Ireland and elsewhere, and stocked with the cattle of the Landlords' Association. Well, a few months ago a change came over the spirit of the scene. The landlord was reasonable enough; and I give him every credit for his action. I think it was a course of action which the landlords through the West of Ireland would have been wise to follow. Colonel Vandaleur had the good sense and feeling to think that a war with his tenants under these circumstances was a great mistake, and he declared he was willing to submit the quarrel between them to arbitration, if the tenants were also willing. Of course the tenants were willing, as the tenants on every estate in Ireland are willing, to accept the principle of arbitration. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) was chosen by the landlord as arbitrator, and the tenants hailed his appointment with the utmost satisfaction. His award was made in a few days. It was carried out in the most whole-hearted spirit, and peace was restored to the whole district. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been asked just before this whether he would interfere, and had declined. What the Government of the country, who are charged with maintaining peace and order, had neglected was carried out by the landlord himself and by the hon. and learned Member for Hackney, and the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton),

and further on the learned Judge said—

I am free to express my opinion that Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald did not act on his own initiative in the matter, but that he was inspired by the legal advisers of the Government in Dublin Castle. The Chief Secretary denies that there is any fusion between the Executive and the Judicial functions of Magistrates; and he added that one of the reasons why Magistrates move about so frequently is that the Government desire that those who exercise Executive functions should not preside over Courts. But there are Judges in many parts of Ireland who are every day in the week combining Judicial and Executive functions. It is only the other day that I appeared before a certain Magistrate in a Crimes Act Court, and that within two hours of the close of the Court I witnessed the Magistrate leading a body of baton men in the dispersal of a meeting. Colonel Miller is constantly exercising both Judicial and Executive functions in my own county; therefore, it is not true for the Chief Secretary to say that the Executive and Judicial functions are kept distinct. The action of these Magistrates is going very far indeed to intensify the contempt in which the administration of the law is held in Ireland. The Irish people have got into their heads that what Erskine said long ago is true—namely, that where the administration of the law is left in the hands of the deputies of the Executive Government, there can be no liberty except such as is convenient to the Executive Government. Under present circumstances a sentence of imprisonment inflicted by one of these Courts is regarded not as a stigma, but as a title to honour. These Courts are not engaged in punishing crime, but in attempting to break down combination on the part of the people. As an instance of this, I may point to the fact that the Crimes Act is being vigorously put into operation in the County Wexford

—a county in which within the memory of living men there has not been a single serious agrarian crime, where at the last Assizes the business for the whole county, with a population of 150,000 persons, only lasted one hour and a half, and consisted of one case of petty larceny. Yet this county is being singled out for the most thorough and whole-hearted administration of the Coercion Act. This is the county where secret inquiries are being held right, left, and centre. This is the county where some of the Priests who have preserved the public peace for half a century are being prosecuted under the law of criminal conspiracy, which law is administered by ex-civil engineers and ex-Indian political officers. The object of these prosecutions is to put down what the Chief Secretary regards as illegal combinations on the part of the people. There are in the county only three estates in which the Plan of Campaign is at work; on all the other estates the tenants have come to terms with their landlords. Wherever the Magistrates are exercising their sway, wherever they are sending the local leaders to prison, public opinion is indignant at the system of Government. Public opinion justifies the action of the local leaders who may have made use of such extreme expressions or assisted the tenants in their action against their landlords. These combinations are defying the Coercion Act and defying the action of the Resident Magistrates, and, so far as crime is concerned, the action of the Coercion Act is absolutely unneeded. Let me say I attribute more to faults in the system than to faults in individuals. I do not deny that there are individuals among the Magistrates utterly unfitted by training and utterly unsuited personally for the performance of Magisterial functions; but still it is more to the system and policy that I attach fault than to individuals. The right hon. Gentleman is degrading the law; he is destroying whatever remains of confidence in the minds of the people in the administration of the law. He is postponing, so far as in him lies, the approach of that day, the arrival of which I and my Colleagues ardently desire, when the law will be impartially administered between man and man in Ireland, will be regarded with confidence and respect by the people, and will cease to be an instrument in the hands of the rich and the few to be used against the poor and the many; when it shall be no longer true, in the words of Sir Redvers Buller, that there is no law on the side of the poorman in Ireland; when the law shall be administered with firmness, discretion, and justice between man and man. When that day comes, I believe the British Empire will have in no part of its vast dimensions a more loyal or more law-abiding people than in Ireland.

Mr. COX (Clare, E.): The Chief Secretary last night repudiated with considerable heat the assertion made that there is collusion between Dublin Castle and the administrators of the Coercion Act. The assertion that sentences were prepared in Dublin Castle and sent down to the Courts he repudiated in the most emphatic manner, and denied that the statement had any foundation in fact. Well, we must accept that statement of his, but while we do so, it must be admitted that there are peculiar coincidences in the administration of the Coercion Act that to our, perhaps, prejudiced minds seem to require some explanation. I may refer to one of these coincidences in relation to my own case. It may be within the recollection of the Committee that I was arrested under the Coercion Act here in London, the first Irish Member so arrested in England. I was taken across to the capital of my county and brought before Mr. Cecil Roche and Mr. Hodder. The case lasted two days, and my hon. and learned Friend who has just eloquently addressed the Committee defended me on that occasion. To prove the charges against me it was necessary to bring up no fewer than 85 policeman; I think that was the number present. As I was, on the second morning of the trial, being escorted in this way from the prison to the Court-house there occurred one of these coincidences to which I have alluded. As I was passing into the Court a Government official whispered to me—"Cox, you'll get four months to-day for your speech at Ennis. Of course you will appeal, and you will be re-arrested and then you will get one month for your speech at Kildysart." This was in the morning, and the case proceeded through the day. At the end of the proceedings, as was predicted, a sentence of four months' imprisonment was passed upon me. I should have mentioned that, to the communication whispered in my ear, was added, "Orders have come down." Whether the orders came from Heaven or from Dublin Castle was not stated. I appealed of course, and upon leaving the Court I was re-arrested, brought before the same tribunal, and committed back to prison, bail being, as in the former case, refused. On the Tuesday following I was brought up for trial at Kildysart, where scenes occurred at which I shall have to refer later on. The charges and allegations against me on both occasions were word for word, letter for letter—in every respect identical. My first offence was my speech at Ennis, and there there might be supposed to be some excuse for me. I advised the people to stick to the constitutional agitation of the National League. Portions of that speech were read to the Committee last night by the hon. Member for York (Mr. A. Pease). There might have been some palliation of my offence on that occasion, because the proclamation of the National League in Clare had only appeared in the Gazette the day before. But my second offence was the delivery of a speech ten days afterwards, and then there was no excuse of absence of knowledge of the proclamation; and so I submit the second offence was the graver of the two, and the sentence should, therefore, have been heavier. Well, I was tried, and, of course, found guilty, and for this second offence, word for word, letter for letter, in every respect identical with the first, I was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. Against this sentence there is no appeal; it was pronounced to fill up the period of time between the one imprisonment and the other. We will suppose this is merely a coincidence, but what I would like to ask is, how was it that the Government official was able to learn what the sentences were going to be? Well, so much on the question of complicity between the Castle and Resident Magistrates in the exercise of their judicial functions. I now come to their executive functions. I was taken, as I said, to Kildysart under strong escort, and at the entrance to this small village of 30 or 40 houses I was placed in the centre of a square, and Mr. Cecil Roche, his famous blackthorn in hand, led the way. In the street, at the entrance and another. In fact, the whole letter is one of the most disgraceful and abominable revelations of the state of mind fostered by the judicial and executive functionaries, which the present Administration has enabled us to become acquainted with. There is but one more matter with which I have to deal. I have described to the Committee the restoration of the evicted tenants on the Vandaleur estate. Every one of the farms on which evictions had taken place, had been in the possession of emergency men with a special guard of policemen to themselves. Each of these policemen helped to swell the number ordinarily employed in the Clare District, and served to enable the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to draw lurid pictures of the state of that county. It was only the other day at the Clare Assizes, that Colonel Turner presented a Report to Judge Harrison, in which he stated that, owing to the operation of the Crimes Act, he had been enabled to withdraw 47 extra policemen from County Clare. These 47 men were the police who had been guarding the emergency men on the farms from which the tenants had been evicted. This is how the right hon. Gentleman fabricates his visionary statements as to peace being brought about by the administration of coercion. And yet, in spite of the exertions of the right hon. Gentleman, in spite of the most persistent, extraordinary and unparalleled exertions on the part of Colonel Turner, Captain Walsh, and other persons charged with the preservation of the peace in that District, the peace of the neighbourhood has only been restored by the action of private individuals. Nevertheless, here we have Colonel Turner addressing to the Judge of Assize a statement which I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman has docketed for the purpose of quotation on some future occasion in order that he may show that owing to the way in which the Coercion Act has been administered, 47 of the extra police employed in maintaining the peace of that county have been removed, and that the peace of the district has been restored. The whole case is as apt an illustration of the way in which the right hon. Gentleman employs the services of his Divisional Commissioners and Removable Magistrates as could well be adduced; and it will be seen that it is not a system for the preservation of the peace, and the maintenance of law and order; but a system deliberately carried on for the provocation of disturbance, the prevention of peace, and the undermining of all respect for the administration of the law. I ask the right hon. Gentleman either to refute my statements as to Colonel Turner, and not to attempt this by a merewave of the hand, or by an assertion based on nothing, except it be the statements of Colonel Turner himself, but by something in the shape of tangible fact; or else to tell the Committee the reason why he retains in the responsible position held by that Gentleman in county Clare, and several other counties, a man who has proved himself unworthy of his office, and who, instead of being the friend of law and order, has been the enemy of both, and a constant disturber of the public peace. I earnestly urge the right hon. Gentleman to offer some reply to me upon this matter, and I would appeal to the Committee to say whether what I have brought forward is not sufficiently serious to call for an answer. At the present moment Colonel Turner holds the position I have described, and I say it is a monstrous thing that a man should be retained in such a post who has been shown to have acted in the manner I have narrated.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL (Ince): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, has spoken of Colonel Turner having changed his colours in regard to political matters; but the hon. Gentleman seems to forget that there is such a thing as a process of slow conviction, and it is by that process that the opinions of Colonel Turner have been changed. I may add that it was entirely due to Colonel Turner declining to support the landlord that the compromise we have heard of was effected on the Vandaleur estate. I have this on the very best authority, and I would recommend the hon. Member for South Louth to ascertain for himself whether this is not the fact.

*MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in his place, not so much because I have risen to address the Committee, but because of the facts I desire to bring before him; facts which I hope he will not endeavour to meet or refute by vague and general statements, without any satisfactory basis or foundation. In speaking of these matters the right hon. Gentleman usually winds up by paying a high tribute to the value of those officers who are discharging very troublesome duties at a period of great difficulty and danger with patriotic zeal and ability. I desire at the outset of my remarks to assure the Committee that in attacking the action of the Resident Magistrates and in mentioning some of them by name, we do not wish to be understood as attacking individuals; what we do is to attack the system they assist in administering. We look on them only as the miserable tools of a wicked system; as so many automatic machines into which the Crown Prosecutor or the district inspector shoves a copy of the Gazette, in some disturbed district, whereupon out rolls a conviction under the Crimes Act, as readily as a cigarette from the boxes with which we have latterly become so familiar throughout the country. We desire to assail the system under which these officials are appointed, and in order to do this terrible examples, which cannot be gainsaid by the other side, have been brought forward. A few days ago in anticipation of this debate, I asked for a very simple Return, but failed to obtain it. A Return has been in the hands of hon. Members since last March, but it does not contain what we wish to ascertain. In asking for the Return I have referred to, I regret to say that I did not meet with even the commonest of courtesy which the very youngest man of this House has a right to expect from any minister, however powerful or high in office. That Return would have needed very few headings, and I feel sure that it could have been made out in Dublin Castle, probably in ten minutes. It was to have been a Return showing the seniority of those persons who hold these appointments, and, had it been presented, the Committee would have been enabled to see, by reference to the salaries and dates of appointment, who among the total number, amounting, I believe, to 76, had been promoted over the heads of others; what increase of salary they had received, and the amount of class promotion they had obtained.

But although this Return was refused, I have, through another source, managed to get particulars as to the extraordinary manner in which the promotion of these Resident Magistrates is brought about. The right hon. Gentleman, the chief Secretary has told us that seniority is not the only consideration in regard to questions of promotion; but at the same time he cannot gainsay the fact that under a normal state of things seniority is a valuable consideration in matters of promotion. I find that certain individuals who have been conspicuous and notorious in the administration of the Coercion Act, are exactly those who have been recently selected for promotion over the heads of others, and that they have been promoted in a manner that cannot be looked upon as otherwise than extremely suspicious. I find that a certain Mr. Horne, about whom, when we come to discuss the Times case, we shall no doubt hear something, and who was most active in working the Times case up, has been promoted over the heads of thirty of his colleagues, from the third to the first class, and that his salary has been increased by £250 a year. This may be a coincidence, but it is one of a number that go to build up a solid superstructure of fact which no hon. Gentleman in this House can explain away. Then we find that Mr. Harvey has been promoted from the second to the first class, with a rise of £125 a year, while Captains Walsh and Pearce and Mr. Maine and Mr. Irwin have also been promoted over quite a number of superior officers from one class to another. But what most concerns the argument in this connection is that the notorious Mr. Cecil Roche, whose name has so often been heard in this and in former Debates, has been promoted over the heads of at least 11 of his colleagues. Now, I say that the task of ascertaining these facts ought not to be left to the industry of any private individual. I ask, is the right hon. Gentleman ashamed of this system, or is he not. [Cries of "No" from the Ministerial Benches.] Then why does he refuse to present the simple Return that was asked for last Monday. Such a Return has always been issued to this House up to June, 1887, and I ask why has a change been made in the form in which it has hitherto been presented?

The reason can only be that the Committee would more easily be able to ascertain the modus operandi by which these men are promoted for the performance of their duties to the Executive. A great deal has been said of the want of qualification on the part of many of the Resident Magistrates, and I think we may divide the qualifications they possess into two classes, the negative and the positive. The negative qualifications belongs to the type represented by the Redmonds, the Gardners, the Segraves, the Warburtons, the Cecil Roches, and some others; and the positive qualification is that whereby they exhibit on every possible occasion a complete contempt for the public opinion of Ireland, and a stern antipathy to the Nationalist Party, whenever the opportunity offers itself. The right hon. Gentleman quoted with great glee last night—he seemed as proud of it as a woman of a new bonnet—a remark made by Chief Baron Palles, in reference to the case of the hon. Member for Mid Cork; but the same learned Judge and Mr. Baron Dowse, not long ago, in a celebrated case, delivered as crushing a judgment on a decision given by two of these Magistrates, Messrs. Redmond and Gardner, as any two Judges were ever called on to deliver on the action of inferior officials in Ireland. Besides this, I may remind the Committee that last November my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork brought under the notice of the House and the Government the conduct of Captain Segrave, and within a week of that time the Government were fully cognizant of facts that would have justified them in suspending Captain Segrave at once; but notwithstanding this, he was allowed to retain his office, and three months after he was in receipt of a salary of £435 a year. Then we have the case of Mr. Warburton, who was looked upon as an experienced Magistrate, in addition to being a well-informed and learned man. He is now dead and—de mortuis nil nisi bonum—I do not wish to say anything derogatory to his memory. Still, I may point out that Baron Dowse, in connection with a very ordinary case on which Mr. Warburton had adjudicated, characterised an act done by him as most ridiculous. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary never seems at all abashed by the most positive and incontrovertible statements of facts, which are public property and known to every man, woman, and child in Ireland. He denied last night what is a notorious fact. He denied that there was a combination of the Judicial and Administrative or Executive functions in the case of the Irish Resident Magistrates. Many extraordinary statements have been made as to matters of fact; but this statement of the right hon. Gentleman is not only utterly bewildering, but has not the slightest foundation. It is within my own knowledge, and that of my Friends near me, that the same Magistrates do discharge both Judicial and Executive functions in the same town and district—aye, and very frequently on the same day. There is nothing like reducing this statement to the closest possible issue. Take the case of Captain Gardiner, the Resident Magistrate in Cork. The fact of his performing magisterial functions in Cork does not prevent his adjudicating in the Counties of Limerick and Kerry, and besides this, I have seen him charging at the head of a troop of lancers and going out at the head of a large number of police. I have, scores of times, seen him at the head of constabulary armed with baton and bayonet keeping order—or rather promoting disorder—in the streets of Cork and other places. I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, therefore, if he will be candid enough to withdraw the statement he made last night with regard to the allegation that Captain Gardiner is to be seen one day adjudicating in the City of Cork and another day heading a battle charge. Captain Segrave was another Resident Magistrate who combined Executive with administrative functions whilst stationed at Kanturk. He sat in judgment upon myself and several priests, and on other occasions was in charge of constabulary. In April, 1888, when I, accompanied by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy), went down to test the accuracy of the statement of the Chief Secretary that the National League was a thing of the past, I saw Captain Segrave charging at the head of the constabulary. I will give another case—that of Mr. Cecil Roche of Tralee. Not satisfied with adjudicating on the Bench in the Petty Sessions district of Tralee and at Killarney, we find him actually leaving the Bench to put himself at the head of the constabulary in order to beat the people, men, women, and children. Is that a mixing up of judicial and administrative functions, or is it not? I could give similar cases from almost every Petty Sessional district in Ireland, and I hope the Chief Secretary will now have the candour to withdraw the statement he has made if it is at all possible for him to do anything consistent with veracity.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must know that that language is not permissible. He must withdraw the expression he has used.

*MR. FLYNN: I withdraw the word "veracity."

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must withdraw in a suitable manner.

*MR. FLYNN: I withdraw, Sir, and apologise for using the word. What I wished to convey was that the right hon. Gentleman does not give an accurate idea to the House in his narrative of affairs that occur in Ireland, but brings forward and maintains as facts what we know to be absolutely without foundation. With regard to Captain Slacke, Divisional Commissioner, who was in command of the forces on the occasion of the painful evictions at Luggacurran a few months ago, I should like to know whether he was paid for doing the landlords' work or not? He and an Inspector of Constabulary, whom he had with him, brought forward from the rent-office particulars of the valuation and the rent and arrears due from all the tenants. They furnished the landlords' version of the dispute to all who wished to know it, in particular to the gentlemen of the Press; and, if these officials were paid for doing the work of the landlord, I think it ought to be known to the Committee. In connection with Captain Slacke, I have to complain of a most contemptible and discreditable breach of faith, for which, however, I do not hold Captain Slacke personally responsible. On the occasion of certain evictions, I was in attendance for the purpose of obtaining some information from the tenants, and Captain Slacke came up to me and two or three representatives of the Press, with whom I was in conversation, and said, "Mr. Flynn, in case you may have business in Dublin or elsewhere, I feel it right to tell you that to-morrow these evictions will not be proceeded with." I and my friends accordingly returned to Dublin, and the next day I received a telegram saying that a large force of police had marched out from their encampment, accompanied by soldiers, and had evicted a number of families. Whoever was responsible for this I do not know; but it was a most contemptible and discreditable transaction. Whether it was done to withdraw the remainder of the evictions from the light of public criticism—to ensure that they should be effected in the absence of the gentlemen of the Press—I do not undertake to say, but to me it looks suspiciously as though that were the case. I will now only draw attention to one or two little matters which I think have, up to the present, escaped the notice of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, as well as the Solicitor General for Ireland, have referred in terms of triumph to the small number of cases on appeal in which the sentences of the Magistrates have been reversed. I think the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) has pretty effectually disposed of that portion of the case, and I trust right hon. Gentlemen will not have the temerity to refer to it in the same spirit again. I would ask the attention of the Committee to this significant fact—that, from the commencement of the proceedings under the Coercion Act, there has been no recorded instance in which two Resident Magistrates on the Bench have differed in deciding a case. Chief Baron Palles, and Baron Dowse, and Mr. Justice Andrews may differ as to most important questions of law, and as to questions of fact, and the most learned and experienced Judges may differ. Ordinary unpaid Magistrates may differ, but there is no instance on record, so far as my observation goes, where Resident Magistrates have differed as to the cases which have come before them; and there has only been one case in which Members of the Nationalist Party brought before them has been acquitted. Another thing which shows the animus of the Resident Magistrates is this. They have power, under the Coercion Act, to make persons whom they con-

of a person, you are giving that person more punishment than the tribunal before which he appeared had rightly or wrongly given. When you give a man four months' imprisonment, plus the loss of an eye, you give him more than the tribunal intended to give him, and there is a gross violation of every principle of justice.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I am sure we have heard with interest the speech delivered by the Solicitor General for Ireland, who is honestly opposed to us, but who always recollects that he is speaking to his own countrymen, for he never acts in a way to provoke irritating or hostile personal comment. I will endeavour to follow his example. I may say, in all sincerity, I was astonished when the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of the Resident Magistrates as a body of competent practised Judges. In what does their competency or practice consist? It consists of being well versed in all the significance of the nods and winks of the Castle officials, and their competency lies in their power and ability to convict. The Resident Magistrates have merely the courage of convicting at the beck of the Government. I think it would be useful for the House to consider the enormous powers given to Resident Magistrates. Cecil Roche and O'Neill Segrave have a power and influence over the fortunes and liberties of their countrymen which is not possessed either by the Lord Chief Justice in England, or by the Lord Chief Justice in Ireland. The highest magistrate in the land cannot try a case of conspiracy without the intervention of a jury, but Cecil Roche and O'Neill Segrave have been able to. The Lord Chief Justices I have named hold, I believe, the Commission of the Peace in every county, and if they both, or either of them, were to enter a Coercion Court in which two Resident Magistrates were trying a case of conspiracy, they could not interfere, because the Coercion Act has taken away from ordinary Magistrates the power of sitting in these Courts, and has entrusted the administration of the Act to removable Magistrates paid by the Government, and liable to dismissal without notice and without explanation. These Magistrates hold their Commission by the influence of one man, for the Second Reading of the Coercion Bill was carried only through the influence of the publication of Pigott's forged letters in the Times. The Solicitor General endeavoured to discount the value of certain extracts, quoted from a Judge's charge by my hon. Friend, by eliciting that the charge was delivered before Resident Magistrates came into existence. It is certainly true that they did not exist in Ireland at that time, but as we go on we find fresh means of tyranny. The hon. and learned Gentleman must remember perfectly well the late Archbishop Whateley, who was not a partisan, for he kept aloof from Irish political parties; yet he said in 1852 that the Lord Lieutenant's time was largely occupied in deciding what ruined gambler should have this or that Stipendiary Magistracy. Again, Lord Rosse, the Chancellor of Dublin University, whose son stood against the hon. Gentleman as an independent Conservative, and whose election I did my best to promote, said the men selected for the position of Resident Magistrates were generally elderly renés with broken fortunes and damaged reputations, who were made stipendaries because their patrons dare not venture to make them anything else. He goes on to say that the Government appoint only those who are absolutely dependent on them. Some are habitual drunkards, and more than half unable to show themselves except on Sundays. They are called "Sunday birds." There was, I believe, one whose body was seized by his butcher after death. I have here some of the characters written for applicants for these posts of "competent and practised judges," by their relatives to the Lord Lieutenant of the day. They were read in this House on the 1st April, 1887. I will only read one of them. It was addressed to Lord Carlisle, and the writer applied on behalf of his brother, "who had been leading an idle life and contracting habits injurious to his health as well as distressing to his family." The letter continued—

"He has latterly, I rejoice to say, been leading a different life; he has recently formed an attachment to an interesting Scotch lady, one who in point of deep religious belief is all that could be wished for. Their union is only delayed by financial reasons, and under those circumstances I venture to ask your Excellency to procure for him a situation as Stipendiary Magistrate, for which he is extremely well qualified, as he regularly and efficiently discharges his duties as J.P. in this parish."

Later on the writer adds that "some post of less value would be acceptable." This letter is signed, "P. Fitzgerald, Knight of Kerry." Now, that letter was written 25 years ago. But is this system of appointing Resident Magistrates still continued? What about O'Neill Segrave? How is it possible that that man, who was discharged from an inferior regiment for embezzlement of public and private funds—for frauds of a wantonly heartless nature, because he embezzled some money given him by a private soldier to take home to his mother—I ask how comes this man to be a competent and practised Judge? I fancy his head was filled with bad law, and his stomach with good whisky. What a Solon for the Government to place on the judgment seat! What a Daniel come to judgment! It was Dr. Tanner who first brought the case of Mr. Segrave before the House, and who first gave the House information, which the Government could easily have got through the Colonial Office. And now Dr. Tanner is punished, possibly by the exercise of an illegal and certainly an unusual jurisdiction, because he has unearthed that gentleman and stamped the character of the Resident Magistrates by giving Mr. Segrave as a specimen of the order. If the Irish Government did not know Mr. Segrave's antecedents when they appointed him, their negligence was in the highest degree culpable. If they did know them their conduct was wicked in the extreme. But is it to be believed that they did not know his antecedents? Credat Judæus Apella. I might freely translate that as "You may tell that to the Chancellor of the Exchequer." And now I come to the case of Dr. Tanner. He is at present serving three months' imprisonment. He was brought before a tribunal on a false and fictitious charge; he was charged under the Coercion Act, and if he misbehaved himself in Court the men who took him there were largely responsible for his misbehaviour. Of course, wonders never cease, but I want to know how it comes to pass that the two Resident Magistrates had a miraculous knowledge of the antique and obsolete Statute of Edward III., which was not possessed by the Law Officers of the Crown in this House, or even by an ex-Attorney General for England? Who suggested it to these men? How did they find it out? Who drafted for them that elaborate and legal document of process for contempt, which they brought with them into Court? Was it done by inspiration? Where did it come from? Did it come from the recesses of the Cabinet? When the appeal was being heard one very interesting observation was made by the Attorney General for Ireland. He said—

"I have given my opinion that this jurisdiction exists in this case, whether justly exercised or not."

Why did he go the extreme length of giving that opinion? I am certain that that document came from Dublin Castle. There is nothing new under the sun. A similar act of discovering musty and obsolete laws was once done in England in the days of the Stuarts, and all I can say is that a man who would dig down and exhume old statutes which everybody has forgotten for the purpose of doing an injustice, or what is worse, for the purpose of political calumny, is a person of whom no Administration need be proud. I regret that the Chief Secretary is not in his place. He has again and again reproved me for the tone of my references to these Magistrates. Of course I only laugh at his reproof. I again say that they are underground and secret agents carrying out the behests of the Chief Secretary. They are in a position of inferiority, they are dependent upon him. The "able and experienced judges" called Resident Magistrates are manufactured at Dublin Castle at round table conferences between them and the Chief Secretary for Ireland called to discuss the political situation. Otherwise what is the meaning of the paragraph recently published to the effect that Colonel Turner, Mr. Cecil Roche, and another Magistrate, who has been in attendance on the Chief Secretary during the last two days at the Castle, have returned to their districts. That is the way in which you manufacture your competent and experienced Judges. You have a conference between the starving Judges and their paymaster. When the Coercion Act first came into operation the right hon. Gentleman's minions thought they would best curry favour with him by inflicting the heaviest possible sentences under the Act, and consequently we had quite a crop of sentences of six months' imprisonment. This, of course, led to appeals, and pending the hearing of these the convicted Members went about the country repeating the so-called offences. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking in Manchester, in November, 1887, said that Resident Magistrates ought to give one month sentences, so that there would be no fear of appeal or of the men who were charged going about the country promoting disorder and confusion before the appeal was heard. For three months after the delivery of that speech I noticed that sentences for one month, accompanied with hard labour, were given, and the persons convicted were thus robbed of their right of appeal. The right hon. Gentleman made a comical excuse about the peregrinations of the Resident Magistrates. I asked him how it came to pass that, although these Magistrates were travelling all about the country, we were refused statistics in reference to the number of cases tried by each of them under the Coercion Act? Why are they sent all over the country? Is it not because men like Hamilton and Cecil Roche and Segrave could be relied upon to convict? I was reading last Sunday the Book of Job, which I will recommend the Members of the Government to peruse. A question was put to one, who was certainly not an angel, whence he came. The reply was from going up and down in the earth and from going to and fro in the land. That is exactly the motto of the favorite Resident Magistrates, and I have no doubt that when these gentlemen have finished their careers they will receive from the right hon. Gentleman the commendation, "Well done thou good and faithful servants." Now, I think no accusation against the Government would be complete unless we brought in a touch of the Times. I find that Captain Plunkett, the "don't-hesitate-to-shoot" man, was away from his duties 56 days in London, and Mr. Slack was absent 60 days. Three other Resident Magistrates volunteered to help the Times in tabulating returns for the Special Commission, and the Government, which out of its generosity gave the services of its Attorney General, has given rapid promotion to these men. Mr. Cecil Roche is promoted, and why?

Mr. Swift Mac Neill

"Because," says the Chief Secretary, "he richly deserves it." At the risk of being a little out of order I may say I wonder whether that gentleman is a far-away cousin of an interesting family, because the country is being governed at present by a family party. In conclusion, let me say that Resident Magistrates in Ireland bring justice into contempt, and they are the chief priests in the blasphemy of justice which at present characterises Irish administration.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I believe that the Statute of Edward III. has been used against the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner), Mr. Powell, and the rest simply for the purpose of depriving them of the right of appeal, and at the same [time inflicting on them a longer term of imprisonment than can be inflicted under the Crimes Act without an opportunity of appealing being afforded. The case of the hon. Member for Mid Cork is by no means an isolated one. There is also the case of Mr. Powell, of the Midland Tribune, the case of Mr. O'Reilly, of County Tipperary, both of whom were sentenced under the Act of Edward III. I find also that, on Tuesday last, two Magistrates in County Cork sentenced one of the tenants on the Ponsonby Estate under that Statute. The young man was cited for one of the usual offences under the Coercion Act, and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The defendant said, "I accept the sentence, and I would do the same in the morning." The Bench then reconsidered their sentence, and ordered the defendant to find bail for his good behaviour for 12 months, or to go to prison for a further term of three months. Besides these cases, there are six others, of tenants on the Leader Estate in County Cork, who were sentenced under the same Act. The fact is, that there is what I think I may call a wholesale application of the Act of Edward III., so as to deprive the people of the right of appeal. We have seen, in the case of Dr. Tanner, that no right of appeal exists. I denounce this as a conspiracy between the right hon. Gentleman and his Removable Magistrates to effect the same purpose with regard to Coercion Act prisoners as he originally tried to effect by consecutive sentences of one month's imprisonment. The apologists for the Government may say, as the Attorney General for Ireland said in Court the other day, that this is no punishment at all, because a man can escape going to gaol if he gives bail to be of good behaviour. The Chief Baron of the Exchequer said the other day, "For my part, if I was ordered to give bail for good behaviour, nothing in the world would induce me to do so." The Irish people have taken the very same view of this indignity. It is of course on the calculation that they would take that view that this policy is being adopted. It is known that in no single instance would any of these men, who are not criminals, consent to give bail to be of good behaviour and thus place a brand and stigma upon themselves. I trust the point will be dwelt upon by other speakers, and that public opinion will be so brought to bear upon this attempt to deprive the intended victims of the Coercion Act of the right of appeal, which even this House of Commons had the intention of giving them, that the scheme will be exploded as was that of giving consecutive sentences of one month's imprisonment. Now, Mr. Courtney, there is one very important matter to which I wish to refer in regard to the Resident Magistrates. One of the most important and prudent of these executive officers in Ireland is Colonel Turner. I wish to draw attention to some of the recent proceedings of that gentleman, and to call upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say whether, in his opinion, Colonel Turner is a fit and proper person to hold the position he does hold. Colonel Turner is a Divisional Commissioner for the district of Clare, Kerry, and other counties, and I wish to refer particularly to his conduct in connection with the Vandaleur Estate, which has been the scene of some of the most striking eviction episodes that have taken place in Ireland, and which has been still more recently before the notice of the public as one of the most important instances in which the struggle of the Plan of Campaign has ended in securing justice for the tenant, and in bringing to reason a landlord who originally was mistaken enough to deny the just claims of his tenants. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) told me the other night that the battering ram had only been used in a couple of instances. Why on this very estate when the evictions began there the battering ram was used under the active superintendence of Colonel Turner in the cases of some twenty tenants, and the whole district was devastated by its operations. Numerous evictions took place, and a number of houses were levelled with the battering ram. The result was that the peace of the district was disturbed, and Clare became one of those counties which the right hon. Gentleman was able to quote at the head of his Coercion statistics. Colonel Turner was not content with superintending and aiding in the operations for the clearance of the estate, but he actually wrote letters to the Times describing what ought to be done, and was one of the first of those to suggest that which was known some time ago as the plantation policy. He suggested that the farms of the evicted tenants should be given to people imported from the North of Ireland and elsewhere, and stocked with the cattle of the Landlords' Association. Well, a few months ago a change came over the spirit of the scene. The landlord was reasonable enough; and I give him every credit for his action. I think it was a course of action which the landlords through the West of Ireland would have been wise to follow. Colonel Vandaleur had the good sense and feeling to think that a war with his tenants under these circumstances was a great mistake, and he declared he was willing to submit the quarrel between them to arbitration, if the tenants were also willing. Of course the tenants were willing, as the tenants on every estate in Ireland are willing, to accept the principle of arbitration. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) was chosen by the landlord as arbitrator, and the tenants hailed his appointment with the utmost satisfaction. His award was made in a few days. It was carried out in the most whole-hearted spirit, and peace was restored to the whole district. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been asked just before this whether he would interfere, and had declined. What the Government of the country, who are charged with maintaining peace and order, had neglected was carried out by the landlord himself and by the hon. and learned Member for Hackney, and the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sexton), in Ireland, that he would refuse under similar circumstances to give bail as Dr. Tanner refused, I ask do the Government mean to keep the hon. Member for Mid Cork in gaol? When we debated Dr. Tanner's sentence on a motion for adjournment a few days ago I thought we had too much of the legal argument whether the Magistrates had the legal right to bind Dr. Tanner or not. It appears to me the important thing to keep in view, is the fact that—whether the Magistrates acted legally or not—remains, and no one will venture to dispute it, that no Bench of Magistrates in this country would dare to rake up this musty old Statute of Edward III. in order to arrogate to themselves powers that the people of this country would not allow to be used. That this statute was deliberately dug up for the purpose is abundantly proved by the Magistrates coming to Court with a long warrant carefully drawn out, which they had not time to draw out in Court nor the legal knowledge either. The warrant was prepared for them by some one with very superior knowledge, and within a few weeks similar warrants were used in other Courts in Ireland, and there are now several persons in gaol because they refused to do what the Chief Baron on the Irish Bench has said he under similar circumstances would refuse to do, namely, to give bail for good behaviour under this musty old Statute of Edward III.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I do not wish to oppose the Vote being taken to-night, but I think we are entitled to a more definite answer as to when we are to have the papers which were promised some four months ago, in reference to the transformation of Divisional Commissioners or Resident Magistrates into ordinary Justices of the Peace. We understood these Papers were shortly to be presented, and I hope we shall have them before the Report stage of this Vote is taken.

*MR. MADDEN: If I recollect aright, when the Motion for a Return was put down by the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Government said they were prepared to assent to a Motion extending over the last 10 years, but the right hon. Gentleman did not move for this Return.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the Government give us what Papers they are prepared to present?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will look into the matter, and shall be glad to give such information as can be given.

MR. GILL: I have felt it my duty to bring very serious charges against Colonel Turner, and I beg to say that on the Report Stage I shall again bring the conduct of this gentleman under the attention of the House.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to say that the Motion I put down for Paper, was in the form in which I thought it was necessary to have the information. I think we are entitled to the whole correspondence between the Government and the Lord Chancellor, in reference to the extraordinary manoeuvre by which these gentlemen were removed from the position of Resident Magistrates to Justices of the Peace appointed by the Lord Chancellor. The Motion was blocked by the Government, though it is true when my patience was well-nigh worn out I did receive an intimation that the Government were willing to give the Papers in a less complete form, and I communicated to the Solicitor General for Ireland my view that, as proposed, the information would be of little use. I expected that the Government would relieve me from the responsibility of moving for Papers which I had said would be of little use, and would put down a Motion in the name of one of their officials. I trust now on reconsidering the subject the Government will give us a full and frank explanation on the subject. I will just add that I hope on the next Stage of this Vote the Chief Secretary will be prepared to offer some explanation in reference to the conduct of Colonel Turner and Mr. Walsh, whose interference in a dispute between landlord and tenants in a troubled district prevented the effectuation of a settlement when that was about to be arrived at.

MR. O'DOHERTY: There is an item of £448 for the examination of newspapers and hire of rooms, and it appears this expenditure is on account of a kind of Press censorship. It is very distinctly marked out, and is evidently an arrangement by which officers are engaged in various centres to which newspapers of the district are sent and examined, on a kind of press censorship. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us any information upon this item?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, the hire of rooms has nothing to do with a press censorship, which, as the hon. and learned Gentleman should be aware, does not exist in Ireland. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton) I have to say, I shall be quite prepared to consider the allegations against Colonel Turner and Mr. Walsh. I feel sure these gentlemen have no desire to prevent settlements, and I believe the occurrence alluded to is quite capable of satisfactory explanation.

MR. O'DOHERTY: May I ask why the hire of rooms is associated with the item for newspapers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Rooms are not hired for newspapers. The grammar of the entry leaves something to be desired, and I will endeavour to correct the English when the Vote next comes before the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

PREFERENTIAL PAYMENTS IN BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.
(No. 319.)

Read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL MONEY
(No. 2) BILL. (No. 356.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. H. W. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I wish to enter a protest against the underhand and even treacherous way in which, in connection with this Bill, the Government have behaved.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I rise to a point of order, Sir. I appeal to you, is it right that the hon. Gentleman should term the action of the Government "underhand and treacherous."

*MR. SPEAKER: The word "underhand" is certainly not Parliamentary.

*MR. H. W. LAWSON: I at once withdraw the word, Sir. I think the right hon. Gentleman entirely misunderstood the meaning I meant to convey, which was certainly not directed against him personally. I wish to explain to the House exactly what happened in regard to this Bill. This is not the original London County Council Money Bill. It is a supposititious Bill introduced by the Government after withdrawing the other without notice to the Council, and the difference between the two is this, that the eighth clause of the former which gave the Council power to pay any costs with respect to an inquiry into the water supply of London by the Council, has been withdrawn. It is, to say the least, open to doubt whether this Bill should be introduced at all. When the Local Government Bill was in Committee last Session we moved a clause placing London in exactly the same position as Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester, with respect to the manner in which money should be raised, but the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board insisted that the County Council should only raise money after application to Parliament. It was then understood that this Bill should be settled between the County Council and the Government. The original Bill was so settled. There were conferences between Sir Reginald Welby, representing the Treasury on the one hand—I am not bringing him into the matter ad invidiam—and Lord Rosebery, Lord Lingen, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee on the other. This clause was agreed upon, and the Bill was introduced into this House by the Government. Lord Rosebery went abroad, and without the Council receiving any intimation, the Bill was suddenly withdrawn owing to the opposition of persons connected with the water companies, and another Bill was introduced from which the clause objected to was omitted. I think that in this matter the people of London have been hardly used. They wish—and justifiably so—to obtain more information as to the water supply which they have to put up with. It does not follow that they will spend excessive sums to supplement inquiries which have already taken place, but they want power to make use of them which the original clause gave them. We have reason to complain that by a sort of back-stairs intrigue the clause has been spirited out of the Bill, and I hope the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will be able to give us some satisfactory explanations on the subject. If the Treasury approved the Bill in the first place, why did they not adhere to it; why did they cut out this clause? The water supply of London is a matter of intense importance to the people; they have reason to complain of the defects, costliness, and impurity of the present system of supply, and they ought to have a right of inquiry. I shall, therefore, try to re-insert the clause on the Committee stage.

MR. A. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I think the Treasury have done wisely and well in cutting out this clause. I think it would be a monstrous thing if the County Council of London had been allowed to conduct a fishing inquiry into the capital of the water companies at the expense of the ratepayers, especially as there exists on record a very complete account of an inquiry into the water companies held not many years ago, and the members of the County Council can find out all about the water supply by consulting the evidence given before Sir W. Harcourt's Committee. Now, there are two things I should like to know. How long is the practice going to be continued of a Government official rising in his place without any explanation and introducing a Bill, of the details of which he knows nothing, and without affording any opportunity for discussing it? If the House of Commons is to exercise any effective control over the expenditure of the London County Council, Bills such as this ought to be introduced by some member of the Council who could make the details of the clauses plain to the House. Under this Bill the ratepayers of London will be called upon to supply £1,760,000, and I say that before passing it we ought to have full information given us. I do not know whether on the Motion for the Second Reading I should be in order in referring to clauses of the Bill, but there are some in respect of which we are surely entitled to demand some explanation. Under a sub-section of Clause 5, for example, the County Council asks for £350,000, nothing being said as to the purposes for which that sum is wanted. The House is surely entitled to know what the money is wanted for. Under another sub-section of the same clause the Council seek to obtain power to borrow money with the object of acquiring a site for a chamber. No sum is specified, however, and if the clause is agreed to in its present form they will be able to borrow any amount and to build themselves a "lordly pleasure house" indeed. I have heard of a sum of £3,000,000 being spent on such a purpose, and I do not believe that the ratepayers wish that so very large a sum should be spent on the construction of an Hotel de Ville for London. Again, under the Metropolitan Board of Works Act, 1881, and the Metropolitan Board of Works Bridges Act, 1884, power is given to borrow a sum of £791,000, and this Bill gives the Council power to borrow a sum of £17,000, provided that all the money borrowed and expended under these Acts does not exceed £791,000. But it seems to me that £1,100,000 has already been borrowed, and I should therefore like an explanation of these figures. Considering that the rate levied under the régime of the County Council has already reached 12d. and a fraction in the pound, I think that the representatives of the ratepayers in this House have a right to ask that the details of the Bill under consideration should be fully explained either by a Government official or by a representative of the London County Council.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I will leave to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the task of explaining to the Member for Peckham his responsibility for introducing a Bill of the details of which he knows nothing. But I think this discussion will lead the House to realise the unenviable position in which it is placed in trying to retain control over the expenditure of London. It is the result of attempting to keep London in a "go-cart." If we had been successful in our Amendment last year, we should have relieved the House of Commons of the necessity of being parties to this Bill. London ought really to be in the same position as the large Municipalities throughout the country, and I say it is impossible for Parliament to keep control over it by means of a Bill like this. Whether the expenditure is too great or not is a question which must be left to the Council's constituents. If the Council does not fulfil its stewardship honestly the ratepayers can call it to account. We in London are suffering from the present system of water supply. We want, not to rush into any scheme for buying up the water companies, but power to thoroughly investigate the sources of supply, and to ascertain whether a cheaper supply than the present cannot be obtained. Those Members of Parliament who have objected to the presence in the Bill of a clause which would have enabled the County Council to effect their purpose in this respect are either directors of existing water companies or relatives of directors. If hon. Members look at to-day's papers they will see an account of an action between a City firm and a water company. The firm owned an enormous warehouse in which hardly any water was used, and they naturally desired to be supplied by meter. They gained their judgment in the First Court they went to, but the company appealed and got it reversed. Then the City firm took the case to the House of Lords, which sustained the decision of the Court of Appeal, and it is now settled that the people of London cannot get their water supply by meterage. They must, instead, submit to pay on assessment, no matter how small a quantity of water they may require. Is there any other commodity which the people have to pay for on the same conditions?

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The water supply clause does not form part of this Bill.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS : Possibly I shall have an opportunity of raising this question when my hon. Friend moves in Committee to insert the clause. I think we have good cause to complain of the manner in which we have been treated in regard to this Bill. I am told that great pressure was brought to bear on the Government to cut out this clause. I do not care whether the pressure came from this side or the other side of the House ; all I say is that we have a just demand for an inquiry into the water supply of London.

*SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.) : I think that the Metropolitan Members of this House, whether they sit on this side or on that, will desire to scrutinise very closely the large powers of expenditure which it is proposed to confer on the London County Council by this Bill ; and, therefore, I trust that the hon. Member for Dundee, who represents the Council in this House, will give us some adequate explanation of the proposal. The hon. Member for Finsbury, who spoke last, said this was a matter for the London County Council itself to consider, and that it rested between the members of that body and their constituents. Well, but, Sir, for the next three years the constituents of the London County Council will have very little opportunity of saying anything on this point, or, indeed, upon many other points, as to which I suspect they will have a bone to pick with their present representatives in the London County Council when they come before them for re-election. The constitution of the London County Council has been fixed by this House with the very purpose of our exercising a certain amount of supervision over its powers of expenditure during the early period of its existence, and I venture to think that the London ratepayers are inclined at the present moment to be thankful that this House possesses that power of control. I hope that this House and that the ratepayers of London will observe that the fault found by the hon. Member for St. Pancras with this Bill is that it does not confer on the London County Council sufficiently wide powers of expenditure. I must say that from the somewhat cursory perusal I have been able to give to this Bill, it seems to me that the powers given are very large indeed, larger certainly than I should be inclined to agree to until we have had adequate explanations from those who officially speak for the County Council. I hope the ratepayers of London will observe that the hon. Member for St. Pancras wishes to enlarge these enormous powers and to enable the County Council to hold a fishing inquiry, and expend upon it a very considerable amount which will come out of the pockets of the rate-payers.

*MR. LAWSON: The hon. Member is attributing motives to me which are not justified. The Treasury introduced this clause into the original Bill.

*SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The hon. Member is criticising this Bill because that clause has been omitted from it, and therefore I maintain, with all deference to him, that he does desire to give increased powers of expenditure to the London County Council.

MR. T. O. BARING (London): I think it is perfectly impossible at this period of the Session and this hour of the night properly to discuss a Bill of this description. I also confess myself unable to reconcile the figures in the body of the Bill with the figures at either end of it, although the discrepancy may possibly admit of some explanation. For instance, although the Bill authorises the expenditure by the Council during the year of £880,000 odd, when I come to examine the figures in Clause 6, I find they do not amount to £800,000. I hope that next year, if we are to exercise any control over the expenditure of the London County Council, the Bill will be brought forward in such a form, and at such a time, that those who desire to understand what the people of London are paying for may be able to obtain the necessary information.

*MR. R. K. CAUSTON (Southwark, West): The hon. Member for Peckham says the Government have done wisely and well in omitting the clause providing for the payment of the expenses of a water supply inquiry. I hope I shall be in order in asking the Secretary to the Treasury to explain why the Government have omitted from the Bill the clause authorising an expenditure by the London County Council for the purposes of an inquiry into the water supply of the Metropolis. The hon. Member also said that this would be a fishing inquiry. Well, I say that, fishing or otherwise, the people of London demand that there should be an inquiry into the pressing question of the water supply. Perhaps, too, I should not be out of order in pointing out to the House as regards the omitted clause—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Sir Roper Lethbridge

*MR. CAUSTON: At any rate, I think we may demand from the Secretary to the Treasury some explanation of the extraordinary conduct of the Government.

*MR. W. L. JACKSON (Leeds, N): I think the explanation is very simple. The clause referred to has not been introduced, as stated by the hon. Member for St. Pancras, by the Treasury, though no doubt the Bill with that clause was sanctioned by the Treasury. The hon. Member for St. Pancras spoke of the underhand and treacherous way in which this Bill has been dealt with. I do not think they were proper words to apply to action which is taken in this House in the ordinary course of business.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member withdrew the words complained of.

*MR. W. L. JACKSON: I apologise, Sir, for referring to them. I wish to say that I found, when the Bill was introduced, that there was very great opposition to the clause on both sides of the House, it being pointed out that this annual Bill had always been regarded simply and only as a Money Bill, conferring borrowing powers on the municipal authority for the purpose of carrying into effect works which had been previously sanctioned by Parliament, and it was pointed out that this clause gave power to spend money on purposes not already sanctioned by Parliament. Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that there was much weight in these objections, and that, having regard to the period of the Session, it would be unreasonable to ask the House to make this innovation. They, therefore, moved the discharge of the Order for the Second Reading of the first Bill and brought in this amended Bill. The hon. Member for St. Pancras has spoken of the underhand conduct of the Treasury in this matter, and he states that this clause was withdrawn without any communication with the Chairman of the London County Council. But the hon. Member knows perfectly well that I endeavoured to communicate with the Chairman, and was only prevented doing so owing to his having gone abroad, and the hon. Member also knows that I did the next best thing.

and communicated with the Deputy Chairman.

*MR. LAWSON : Lord Rosebery went abroad after the last sitting of the Council. He could have been communicated with before that.

*MR. JACKSON : That does not affect my point at all. The statement has been made that no communication was made, whereas the hon. Member knew I had endeavoured to make the communication : that I communicated with the Deputy Chairman as early as I could, and that I also communicated by letter with the Council.

*MR. LAWSON : I learned from the Deputy Chairman that he was not communicated with.

*MR. FIRTH (Dundee) : My hon. Friend is mistaken. I wrote a letter to the Financial Secretary on the matter.

*MR. LAWSON : Yes, afterwards.

*MR. JACKSON : I have now explained to the House the course I took. The hon. Member for Peckham has asked for information as to one or two points, and, first, as to a sum of £350,000 referred to in Sub-section 2 of Clause 5. Under the Local Government Act the County Council is entrusted with the power of dealing with lunatic asylums in Surrey and Middlesex, and this sum is for the purpose of carrying out certain buildings that are required. As to the apprehensions of the hon. Member respecting the power given in respect to building a Council Chamber, these are not very well founded, as no money can be actually expended until the expenditure has been previously sanctioned by Parliament. It would not be wise to put in the Bill the sum proposed to be given for the site when negotiations are in progress as to the amount to be paid. My hon. Friend also asked as to the proposal to give power to borrow £17,000, provided the total sum borrowed for certain purposes does not exceed £791,000. He suggests that that sum has already been exceeded, and that £1,100,000 has been borrowed. But, as a fact, the £17,000 will bring the amount borrowed under the Acts of 1881 and 1884 to £791,000, and I think my hon. Friend must be confusing the figures and including sums previously authorised to be borrowed. May I add that the duty of moving the Second Reading of this Bill is not one which the Secretary to the Treasury voluntarily undertakes, but that it is a duty imposed on him by an arrangement of long standing.

MR. F. W. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) : Will any amount be put in the Bill to show what will be paid for the site of the new Council Chamber?

*MR. JACKSON : No; I am afraid the negotiations will not be completed in time. But the agreement for purchase cannot be made without the sanction of the Treasury.

MR. FIRTH : I should like to explain a matter on which a little discrepancy which has arisen. This deletion of the clause was made before I had any notice of it, and, indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras was the first to give me information about it. I told him when he called on me I had heard nothing about it, but subsequently I found on the Table of the Chairman of the Council a letter conveying the information.

*MR. JACKSON : Perhaps I ought to explain that I fell into a mistake. When I referred to the deputy Chairman I meant the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London, and not the hon. Member for Dundee.

MR. FIRTH : The titular appellation of the hon. Baronet is Vice Chairman. I may say that the clause which has been omitted is in exactly the same language as that contained in a Bill which I proposed in 1882, in the Markets Bill, which we carried through at half-past three in the morning. I think the Secretary to the Treasury has given a sufficient explanation of the Bill; but I may add that the sum of £350,000 which is authorised to be raised is for buildings which we are bound to erect.

MR. COCHRANE-BAILLIE (St. Pancras, N.) : With reference to Sub-section 4, Clause 5, may I ask if any steps have been taken to see if it is not possible to alter the present offices so as to make them suitable for the Council?

MR. FIRTH : I think that no one who has been through the building which the County Council are now occupying would wish them to remain there longer than possible. A Committee has thoroughly investigated the matter. We have temporarily enlarged the building, and if the hon. Member will do us the courtesy to call, I think he will fully agree with the steps we are taking to get new offices.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

(No. 350.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [1st August], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. GEORGE DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston): As I understand that the Government have agreed to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the Gorton Division of Lancashire, I shall not move the Motion which appears in my name.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The Vice President of the Council in laying this Bill before the House has placed the friends of technical education in a very difficult position. He must be well aware that a good many education reformers object to secondary education being handed over to Local Authorities instead of specially elected educational bodies. Unless some concession is made to our views the Bill will be strongly opposed.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Under the Intermediate Education Bill Parliament has given power to Parochial Authorities to levy a halfpenny rate for exactly the same purposes as are provided for in this Bill, and I therefore wish to know if the provisions of this Bill will enable them to levy an additional rate.

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I do not think any Local Authority will impose any double rate.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I do not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, but I accept it with great regret and reluctance. After the country has been expecting a Technical Education Bill for two years, the measure now before the House is a great disappointment. The real mischief is embodied in Subsection (a) of Clause 1, which prevents the Local Authority from aiding out of local rates any technical or manual instruction in elementary schools, and therefore by this Bill you are building a castle in the air and providing secondary technical instruction, because there is some idea that the voluntary schools stand in the way of introducing this technical instruction in elementary schools. Even agricultural instruction is excluded from elementary schools by virtue of this Bill, notwithstanding the recommendations of the Royal Commission. What will this Bill do for London? For two years the London School Board has had before it a scheme of technical instruction which everybody wishes to see enforced, but this Bill will not allow a single boy in the London Board Schools to obtain this kind of instruction. It is true the County Council will be able, to some extent, to aid the Polytechnic, and for that reason I do not oppose the Bill, although I look upon it as a miserable compromise and as a miserable attempt to fulfil the promises of the Government. The existing system of elementary education is too booky; and it is desired to give to the boys a little manual, scientific, and technical instruction that they may take with them to higher colleges. This Bill will enable anything of the sort to be done. The Bill is one of the greatest shams ever perpetrated in the House, and I hope that it will be much altered in Committee.

Question put, "That the Bill be read a second time."

MR. CHANNING: I object, because no reply has been given to my remarks.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): On a point of order, Sir, the hon. Member has already spoken on this stage. Can he now object?

*MR. SPEAKER: If the words "I object" reach my ears, it is sufficient. It is not necessary for me to know whence they proceed.

MR. CHANNING: I object.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

It being One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at One o'clock till Monday next

EGYPT — MILITARY OPERATIONS AGAINST THE DERVISHES—FUTURE POLICY.

QUESTIONS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to call attention to the hostilities on the Nile and the general condition of affairs in Egypt, said: I will not repeat now what was said the other evening, in which I so heartily joined—the expression of deep satisfaction at the skill, courage, and conduct of our troops in the recent hostilities on the Nile; those who took part in that short conversation bore emphatic testimony to that, and it would be needlessly taking up the time of your Lordships if I were to advert to it again. I suppose no reasonable man doubted what the issue of those hostilities would be; but, as I said before, there is a larger question behind—a larger question as regards the possible or probable recurrence of such difficulties and the general policy which is to be maintained in Egypt. I need not delay your Lordships by more than the briefest reminder of the circumstances which have brought us to the present pass of events. The House will remember how the dual control was brought to an end, the insurrection of Arabi, the bombardment of Alexandria, and the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. Single-handed in fact, and in default of all allies we entered Egypt; single-handed we fought our battles; single handed we won all our successes. But very soon afterwards we were startled by the news of the defeat of Hicks Pasha, and I need not recall the circumstances that followed and culminated in the tragical disaster to Gordon at Khartoum. Very soon after that the withdrawal of our garrisons commenced, and of those that remained some were massacred, some disappeared, and the history of some is even now buried in complete obscurity. There was a declaration made very soon after that time, or about that time, to the effect that we intended to withdraw from Egypt at a certain specified date. I always regretted that declaration, but that declaration was followed by many similar declarations, if not quite as precise in language, at all events bearing very closely the same character. Then commenced the general policy of withdrawal from the outposts, the concentrating of troops for the defence of Egypt proper, and a gradual reduction of the armed forces. That reduction went on from month to month until recently the force could not have been above 2,500 men, or thereabouts. Then ensued that which had been predicted by a great many persons familiar with Eastern affairs, fresh risings on the frontier, fresh harassing of our positions, till at last occurred the recent invasion which we have been obliged to arrest by sending troops from other places. If we had sustained a reverse we should have been obliged to send many more troops. In the events of the last few days there is very much to rejoice over, and perhaps not the least ground of satisfaction is that the health of the British troops, contrary to what might have been expected, has been admirable. I need not point out that the difficulties of European troops are greatly aggravated by the summer heat of such a country as Egypt. Seasoned troops alone can bear such a climate. But unseasoned troops must die like flies. The reason why our troops did stand the severity of the climate was that they were entirely seasoned troops. We were obliged to bring them from Malta, from Cyprus, and possibly from Gibraltar. I think it has been a wise policy on the part of the Government during the last two years, or somewhat less, to increase the strength of our garrison at Malta, which for a long time had been unduly low. The garrison there, however, is very limited, and if any check had occurred, troops of a very different quality and material must have been procured elsewhere. But, my Lords, the question to which I wish to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government and this House is not purely a military question, it is essentially a mixed one. Egypt, to use a metaphor which was applied to a smaller country in Europe, is now the cockpit of European diplomacy. Rival theories are contending and struggling for the mastery. I do not propose to go very closely into that part of the subject, but I may remind your Lordships that very briefly there are three principal theories that struggle for ascendancy. First of all, there is that which is known by the name of neutralisation. It is founded on the idea that Egypt may be placed, by the agreement of European Powers, in the same position of neutrality as Belgium. The answer to that is that Egypt is not, and cannot be for a long time, at all events, a Belgium. Her people are not Belgians. They have not learned the art of Constitutional Self-Government; and it would be idle to suppose that anything short of a very long apprenticeship indeed could teach it to them. There are not in Egypt at the present moment the elements for Constitutional Government, as, on the other hand, there are not the elements for a benignant despotism. Then there is that which is sometimes described as the International theory—a theory which finds favour in France, but which I believe to be equally impossible. The idea is that each Power in Europe should be proportionately represented, and should exercise a proportionate power in the management of the country. But the great objection to that is that each country and each Government has its own special object—or rather that certain parties in each country have their own objects and their own interests. These objects and interests are not for the good of Egypt, but generally for the promotion of the interests of capitalists, of bondholders, of financial rings, of persons who have private and personal objects to satisfy. If that theory were attempted in reality it could only many created an effective and well-drilled army. It is impossible to express too strongly the debt we owe to the able and conscientious public servants who have laboured in this work in Egypt. Moreover, life and property have been comparatively secure, and, lastly, I am told by those who know the country that sentiments have grown up in the mind of the fellah, who has been down-trodden for generations upon generations, which, though they do not actually make him in all senses of the word a free man fit to govern himself, still make him a very different character from that oppressed and miserable person that he was a short time since. That is, briefly summarised, what we have done. What we have not done also is a longer list than I quite like to think of. I do not say that it has been our fault; circumstances and conflicting policies have fought against us; but the taxation of the country still remains unequal, unjust, and often very oppressive. One of the first things which it was our object to do in the purposes of good government was, no doubt, to create a new assessment; but the old assessment continues, and with it most of its injustices and cruelties. I believe (my noble Friend will correct me if I am wrong) that at no very great distance from Cairo, in the interior of the country, so hardly does the enforcement of this old assessment press upon the people that there are very frequent sequestrations of land for the non-payment of taxes. I apprehend that one of our shortcomings is that we really do not govern enough; that the people would rejoice to see greater government, more effective government; and I imagine that the two Departments in which and for which we are deservedly popular are the Irrigation Department and the Army Department. For both of those we are respected; both of those have done, and are doing, a great work. But in each case the work is not adequate; it is stopped in mid career. There is another evil which we met with, and which we still maintain—I mean the conscription. I am not one of those who object to all conscription on abstract and general grounds, far from it; but I think my noble Friend must know well from the facts that have come before him that the conscription in Egypt tells with a peculiar, and a special, and, I should say, an exceptional cruelty; and cannot as matter of argument, in its present form at least, be defended. And, lastly, you have the feeling spread far and wide through the country that there is no abiding confidence in our rule; by which I mean that there is no confidence in the permanency of our stay and of our administration. Then we come to ask, is this a matter of success or of failure? It is certainly not success—it is very far short of it. Now, what are the causes of that? Of course, there are many causes; but there are two which stand out above and beyond all others. The first is the lack of sufficient money; the second the sense of uncertainty pervading the whole country. All improvements in Egypt, as elsewhere, want money. A better system of taxation, a larger system of irrigation, better means of defence, a police force, an army—all these mean money; and what we need in order to obtain that money is a free hand in the management of Egyptian finance. But that is impossible, because then step in diplomatic considerations, foreign jealousies, and, as in a quite recent case, France forbids even the conversion of the debt. I know very well that in the course of a few years, I think it is in 1894, a certain part of the interest on the Canal shares falls in, and there will be a considerable saving, which of course will be applicable to Government purposes. But you have to wait five years for that; and even that amount, after all, is nothing very considerable. But I said there was another difficulty, and another drawback, which took from the complete success of our occupation of Egypt, and that is the uncertainty which pervades the whole of the Oriental mind, whether we are there for long—whether we may not flit like a shadow on the wall; and that I consider to be the greatest evil and the greatest difficulty of all; and for this we have in a certain measure to blame ourselves and our own conduct, because, if there has not been vacillation, there has at least been the semblance of vacillation. There has been the appearance of halting between two professions. On the one hand, we have declared repeatedly that we went to Egypt in order to restore prosperity and order: in the same breath we have said that we were anxious to go as soon as we could get away. On the one hand, we declared that our object was to hold Egypt: in the same breath we have abandoned the outworks of Egypt in the Soudan, and we have reduced our troops till it almost seemed as if we were going to accept a mere corporal's guard. The result of all that is that the Egyptians and the Soudanese disbelieve very much our assertions; that the French place unfair constructions upon our conduct; and that Europe looks on half amused and half perplexed, and designates us as opportunists living from hand to mouth. But what is after all the real position? It is this—that we have assumed responsibilities larger than we can fulfil under existing conditions. We have given to Egypt only one-half of the benefits which our occupation should have tended to give her. Trade, which, after all, is the secret key to unlock success and prosperity, is blighted and comparatively checked. The Khedive, who, as an Oriental Sovereign, had power, is reduced in the eyes of the people to a mere shadow; and all this time we repeat, and repeat, and repeat over again our intention of going at the first opportunity. Now, I venture to think that, on reflection, your Lordships will see that there really are but five possible courses which are open, and I will venture to enumerate them. The first of these is evacuation. That would be a very poor end in the eyes of the country to all the labour and bloodshed and sacrifices that we have made; and there can be no doubt of this—that evacuation would mean anarchy, and must lead to early foreign intervention. Secondly, you may, as some persons desire, but which I should look upon as the worst solution of all, hand the country back again to Turkey. I am satisfied that neither the feeling nor the good sense of this country would tolerate such a proceeding. Every unfulfilled pledge on the part of the Turkish Government, every act of oppression, of misgovernment, of cruelty, would rise up against it, and the very stones of the Pyramids would cry out against it. You have Armenia at this moment declaring that the condition of things is intolerable; you have Crete in a state of semi-revolt; you have Macedonia seething; and, therefore, people who are idle enough to dream that Turkey could resume her authority in Egypt are living in such a cloudland that it is not worth while to discuss it. Thirdly, we may remain as we are, and drift along, repelling the different attacks which from time to time may be made—as on the recent occasion, sending troops whether convenient or inconvenient, hoping for the best, taking the risk. There are, no doubt, precedents for this, but they are not satisfactory precedents, and I do not think that that is a very good solution of the matter. Fourthly, we might remain as we are, but providing some defence for the Southern portions of the country, the outposts of Egypt. I believe that that can only be accomplished in two possible ways: either by securing a competent and reliable authority, semi-independent, to hold these outworks for you—such as Zebehr, or Emin, or some such person, and that was, after all, the ideal which I believe was mainly in Gordon's mind at the last as a practical solution—or by placing black garrisons, who, however, must be paid and must be officered by Englishmen, to hold the country for you. That, no doubt, is a better solution; it is a more adequate solution; but costly, and not without a good many difficulties. Fifthly, and lastly, you may announce to Europe that you intend to stay in Egypt for the present, and that you are not limited by times and seasons; that you will religiously respect the rights of the bondholders, but that you will administer the country upon your own principles and policy, and then govern the country as firmly, and substantially as wisely, as you have governed the best Provinces in India. That is a solution which is, undoubtedly, much the best for Egypt. It may present difficulties, possibly, so far as this country is concerned, but it is the boldest course, and it is the one to which at any time you may be reduced by a combination of diplomatic conditions. It means, no doubt, an increase of your Mediterranean Squadron, and an addition to your Army of some 4,000 or 5,000 men; but Egypt could pay that if she were willing; and geographically defensible as she is to a singularly high degree by the deserts that flank her on either side, the masters of the sea may easily be the masters of Egypt. My Lords, these are the alternatives. I do not believe that any other solutions exist than those which I have mentioned. Willingly or unwillingly, one of these the Government must choose, and the time is drawing near when that choice must be distinctly and definitely expressed. I hope I have said nothing which will embarrass the Government. It has been far from my wish to do so. The question is one of the gravest moment; but I do think it desirable that before long some solution should be arrived at, and I believe it is equally desirable that the country should, in some degree at all events, understand the elements of the question.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, once or twice this Session I have had to regret that the only Member of the Front Opposition Bench (I say it without any incivility to him) whom I have had to confront was my noble Friend the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Oxenbridge). I have no doubt he is a repository in the richest measure of all the experience and all the knowledge of the Government to which he belonged; but it is very difficult for me to enter upon matters of detail concerning the action of the late Government—I mean the Government which terminated in 1885—unless some of those who took part in that Government are present. When my noble Friend behind me talks of our failure or our success in Egypt, I think that as far as we are concerned we have a right to require this—that what we have done or that what has happened in our time shall be measured in respect to the circumstances which we found when we acceded to responsibility; and that we shall not be held to have failed because Egypt does not occupy an ideal position with respect to all the circumstances that have been examined by my noble Friend. In saying that, I have no wish to raise old controversies, or to hint any blame of those who went before me. But I only wish to insist upon this—that to ascertain the merits or demerits of Her Majesty's present Government you must simply compare the state of Egypt when we acceded to power with the state of Egypt as it is now, and not impute to us responsibility for any results which may have accrued from circumstances which happened before our time. It is very necessary to take this into consideration, because, whatever the causes were, there is no doubt that the task to which we succeeded was one of exceeding difficulty; and we have never imagined that the conditions existed which would have enabled us to bring Egypt within any measurable time to the high degree of prosperity and order which prevails in European countries. But I do not in the least admit that there has been any element of failure in what has been done. On the contrary, I think if my noble Friend examines carefully into the Reports which have been laid before the House, he will see that, not owing to any merit on the part of Her Majesty's Government (I do not in the least suggest that), but owing to the wise, careful, and statesmanlike management of the permanent servants of the Crown, and the English servants of the Khedive, who have carried on that great work of civilisation in that country, there has been a constant and steady progress, bringing peace and tranquillity to the country; bringing increased means of prosperity and openings for industry and commerce, abating the evils of misgovernment, of judicial abuse, and of disorder which existed before that time, and even abating that evil on which my noble Friend relies the most—namely, the evil of excessive taxation of the inhabitants. In all the matters which constitute the advance of a nation Egypt has made real progress under the temporary guardianship of England. My noble Friend has advanced nothing that could be called solid evidence to the contrary. His charges have been so vague that it is impossible to deal with them. He tells me that the assessment is still a grievous wrong. The circumstance that there has been any increase in the weight of the assessment has not come under my observation. I doubt it exceedingly. On the contrary, I believe the assessment has been steadily becoming lighter and more just in proportion as the cadastral survey has been carried out, and the re-partition of burdens has become more equal. I freely admit that the financial state of Egypt is not everything that we could desire. The burdens are heavier than we should wish the people to bear, and that for the simple reason that the Governments of Egypt that existed before our time have so squandered the resources of the people that one-half of the revenues of Egypt goes to pay the interest on her debt. That is the burden with which Egypt starts in the financial race, and as long as that burden weighs on her it is impossible to say that her financial condition at all approaches to the ideal. But I did not hear from my noble Friend any suggestion of a possible remedy for that evil. He seemed to intimate that it was the business of this country, in some way or other, to get rid of the debt. I hope I do not do him wrong, but I thought I just traced a suggestion that a simple way of getting rid of the debt was not to pay it.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I must interrupt my noble Friend. Such an extraordinary perversion of words I never heard. I am afraid the noble Marquess was lumbering on the Treasury Bench if he ever supposed that I advocated for one moment passing the sponge over the solemn obligations that have been incurred. I content myself with a simple denial of the fact.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am exceedingly glad to have drawn that denial from my noble Friend, and I have not the slightest doubt that I misunderstood him; but he did not indicate in what possible way financial prosperity could be restored to a people which begins by having to pay away half its revenue as interest for its debt. It is obvious that the burden is one that must weigh upon it most heavily. I am not therefore able to admit in any degree the suggestion of my noble Friend that the guardianship of this country over Egypt has been otherwise than beneficial to it. For that we have not attained such a measure of success as we had a right to expect. I need not go further and say that the withdrawal of that guardianship would be a great evil to Egypt, for in that I understand that I carry my noble Friend with me; but when he goes beyond the criticism of the past or the examination of the present condition of Egypt and the effect of the measures which this country has sanctioned or encouraged, and asks us to penetrate into the future and say what the future relations of this country and Egypt are to be, I must respectfully ask the House to allow me to decline to follow him. It is very burning ground indeed. We have again and again explained what, in our judgment, are the obligations which bind us to Egypt and which we have intended to fulfil; and when my noble Friend says there has been vacillation, or the semblance of vacillation, I again cannot admit that the charge is sustained by any evidence or any particulars. If my noble Friend will do me the honour to refer to the account which I gave four years ago of the policy which the then in-coming Government thought it their duty to pursue with respect to Egypt, and the circumstances in which Egypt found herself, I think he will find we have not deviated by a hair's breadth from the line which we then laid down. I need not repeat what I have often expressed — namely, the obligations which we feel bound in honour to fulfil before we withdraw from the guardianship of Egypt. But when my noble Friend asks us to go beyond that and to convert ourselves from guardians into proprietors, and to say that, in despite of all that we have said and that our predecessors have said, we will, under the circumstances and conditions as they are now, declare our stay in Egypt permanent and our relation to Egypt that of a conquering country to a conquered, I must say I think my noble Friend pays an insufficient regard to the magnitude of the obligations which the Government of the Queen have undertaken and by which they are bound to abide. In such a matter we have not to consider what is the most convenient or what is the most profitable course: we have to consider our honour. Europe has said that we have no authority to do this. Let us not forget that the noblest duty to the noblest of the world is the duty of Egypt. It is a matter of the highest importance that we should do our duty with a readiness which we have not shown in the past. It is a matter of the highest importance that we should do our duty with a readiness which we have not shown in the past.

The Marquess of Salisbury

notions, in its judicial system, and its method of administering the law. I satisfied myself that in this most important particular there had been a real and substantial improvement during the last few years. I do not mean to say that at the present time in this respect Egypt is on a level with European nations, or has completely achieved the object which those who entered upon these reforms had in view; but I was satisfied, from the conversation which I had with the Prime Minister in Egypt, that he held upon this subject thoroughly enlightened views, that he was profoundly impressed with the necessity of further reforms, and that he was most anxious to bring them to as speedy an accomplishment as possible. Your Lordships will easily imagine that the task of law reform in a country like Egypt is not likely to be an easy one. Even in this country, with all our reforming tendencies, and when reforms have been most in the air, the path of the legal reformer has been generally a somewhat thorny one; and law reforms have never moved very rapidly apace. But in the East the difficulties, of course, are considerably greater. I have thought it right to bear my testimony to the fact that I believe a real endeavour is being made, and has, to some extent, already successfully been made, in this direction, and I have every hope that the progress will be continued still further.

ECCLESIASTICAL BUSINESS FEES.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: Your Lordships may remember that in May I moved for a Return which was in continuation of part of the information contained in a Return presented to the House in 1870. It has been found more convenient to obtain the continuation of the whole of that Return rather than a certain part of it, and I therefore move your Lordships to substitute the Return of which I have given notice for that which was ordered on the 21st of May last.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I have been requested by my noble Friend to say that there is no objection whatever to a Return in the amended form.

ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES.

Order of 23rd May last, for Return respecting, discharged.

ECCLESIASTICAL BUSINESS FEES.

“Return from every archbishop and bishop holding a see in England or Wales of the names, residence, profession or occupation, and, if a clergyman, the preferment, of every secretary, apparitor, seal keeper, or other officer employed by them in the transaction of ecclesiastical business, stating the scale of fees charged by such officers, with the total amount of fees received by each of such officers for his own use during each year from 1870 to 1888, both included, and the nature of the duties performed by each officer respectively for such fees.

Return from every ecclesiastical registry in England and Wales, stating the fees payable to each archbishop (if any), bishop (if any), vicar-general, chancellor, commissary, official, master of the faculties, or other ecclesiastical judge, whether acting in person or by deputy, surrogate, registrar, deputy-registrar, or other officer, for the transaction of ecclesiastical business in Court or out of Court, stating the amount of fees that have been received in respect of each class of document or business transacted during each year from 1870 to 1888, both included, stating to whom such fees or proportions of such fees have been paid, and the duties performed by each officer respectively for such fees.

Likewise, the amount of the fee charged for a marriage license exclusive of stamps, also of the number of marriage licenses issued in each year from 1870 to 1888, both included, with the total amount of fees paid into the registry for marriage licenses, exclusive of stamps, in each of those years, stating to what officer such fees have been paid, and the amount received by each of such officers, and the duties performed by each officer respectively for such fees [in continuation of Return (185), 1870].”

THE ALDERSHOT REVIEW.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BRAYE, in rising to ask whether it was true that, owing to the concealed inequalities of the ground selected, several casualties from falls occurred among the troops reviewed last Wednesday at Aldershot, two of which were reported to have been of a very serious nature; and whether, in the event of a future review of such magnitude, it was contemplated that some less broken ground should be chosen for the purpose, said: My Lords, we learn from the ordinary channels of information that last Wednesday, at the great review at Aldershot, some accidents occurred of a very serious nature: one man broke his thigh, another broke his leg and his arm, and there were several other accidents of a minor character. I hope that either these reports are not true, or at least that they are exaggerated; and the most satisfactory answer which I could receive from the noble Lord opposite would be a simple negative. If, on the other hand, they are true, and if it appear that they were entirely owing to the unevenness of the ground in that locality at Fox Hill—to the fact that there are so many concealed pitfalls covered with heather, and rows of disused ruts—if that, as I believe, is the case, it will be satisfactory to learn if the Authorities have taken into consideration the changing of the site for a review of such great importance and magnitude as that which took place last Wednesday in the presence of the German Emperor. There is the whole of England to choose from for such a review, because these reviews are not very frequent, and troops could be amassed at other localities. If the physical difficulties which exist at Aldershot cannot be overcome, and I believe they cannot, it will be satisfactory to learn that the Authorities of the War Office are taking the matter into consideration. These, my Lords, are the reasons why I venture to put the question which stands in my name.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Lord HARRIS): I regret to say that there were four accidents at the manoeuvres on Wednesday last, one of them of a serious nature, being, as the noble Lord said, a fracture. That and another arose from the upsetting of a gun. The second man who was injured is progressing favourably. The other two cases arose from horses falling; one man is progressing favourably and the other has returned to duty. I have no official information as to whether these accidents were due to the concealed inequalities of the ground, or to any carelessness on the part of the men themselves. In any case, I am distinctly of opinion that the Military Authorities will be unable to forego the advantages to be derived from training troops on uneven ground, which accustoms them to take advantage of the cover afforded by its inequalities.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 12th August, 1889.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Prince of Wales's Children Bill, Judicial Factors (Scotland) Bill, Intermediate Education (Wales) Bill, without Amendment; Amendments to Factors Bill [Lords], with Amendments.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to a number of Bills. [See page 993.]

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—THE LIMAVADY SAVINGS BANK.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has heard any complaints as to the management of the Limavady Savings Bank, to the effect that moneys are paid out sometimes without authority from those whose names are registered as the depositors, and that moneys are lodged in the names of persons without their knowledge, with the object of enabling individuals to have large sums of money in the bank and at their disposal under various names; and, whether he will order some inquiry to be made?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No complaints have reached me in regard to the management of the Limavady Savings Bank, nor is the matter one which would come under the cognizance of the Irish Government. The Commissioners of the National Debt are the controlling authority in the case of Trustee Savings Banks. The Treasury presumably answer for the Commissioners in this House.

LONDONDERRY GAOL.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, during May last, or at any other time, Mr. P. J. J. Joyce, of the Irish Prisons Board, gave directions to the Governor of the Derry Gaol to have the prison chaplains watched, and to note what class of prisoners they especially visited, and if they visited Father Stephens, Mr. M'Hugh, and Mr. Kelly oftener than the other prisoners; and, if they did so, to remonstrate with them; and, whether it is within the sphere of Mr. Joyce's duties to give directions to the Governor of Derry Gaol to have a watch set upon the prison chaplains?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question has been already substantially answered in the reply given to a question on the same subject put by the hon. Member on 30th May last. The general instructions of the Prisons Board in the matter were conveyed to the Governors of Prisons through the several Inspectors of the Board.

THE LAND ACT, 1887.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he is aware that the applications of many tenants, leaseholders, to have fair rents fixed under "The Land Act, 1887, have been dismissed on the technical point that they had not administration taken out; and that a large number of such tenants, whose cases have recently been listed, will be too late to receive the benefits of the Act; and, whether he will bring in a short Act to remedy this defect, and to extend the time in which leaseholders can enter Court, and to extend the time for taking out administration to all whose cases are listed before the 22nd instant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that if at the hearing of an application to fix a fair rent it is found that the applicant has not perfected his title as tenant by failure to take out administration to the former tenant the case is not dismissed, but adjourned in order to enable administration to be taken out. The case is in no way prejudiced thereby, inasmuch as the application having been filed, the case is one pending under the Act of 1887, and can be listed for hearing at any time when the tenant has perfected his title. No necessity exists for the suggested legislation.

EMIGRATION TO THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence with the Government of the Argentine Republic relative to the loss brought upon many hundreds of Irish families by the repeated failure of the Republic to keep their engagements for the transport of intending emigrants; and, do Her Majesty's Government intend to exact compensation for the ruin brought upon so many British subjects through the misrepresentation of the agents of a Foreign State; and, if not, will the Government consider the advisability of making it a penal offence for Foreign agents to entice emigrants abroad by false promises?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): There will be no objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence respecting British and Irish Emigration to the Argentine Republic, if the hon. and learned Member will move for it. In so saying I ought to state that the Papers do not show any failure on the part of the Argentine Government to fulfil their engagements. It is true that unsuitable persons have been induced to emigrate to that country, and some hardship has been caused by the unpunctual arrival of steam vessels to embark emigrants. If any case were brought to the notice of Her Majesty's Government in which persons in this country had been deceived or defrauded it would be duly considered, and any action taken that appeared to be required.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did not the right hon. Baronet receive a letter from me showing that there were something like 2,000 persons whose emigration had been delayed for some months after they had broken up their homes and sold off all their goods and chattels?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Inquiries are being made as to the cases which the hon. Member brought under my notice; but it is not one of the cases referred to in the Correspondence with the Argentine Republic.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the Correspondence has not yet come to a conclusion it will not be necessary to move for the production of it.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Correspondence is not yet concluded.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right Gentleman be good enough to lay the Correspondence on the Table as soon as it is concluded?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will inform the hon. Gentleman when the Correspondence is finished.

MALTA—DISTURBANCE AT ROBATO—CONDUCT OF THE MILITARY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a leading article in the Malta of 18th July, making exceedingly grave charges against English troops just arrived at Robato; and whether he can give the House any information as to the truth or otherwise of such charges?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I have not heard of this affair until the hon. Member drew my attention to it. In reply to a question from me, the Governor of Malta has telegraphed:—"Newspaper reports of disturbance at Rabato a gross and malicious exaggeration."

IRELAND—THE PONSONBY ESTATE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that 150 ejectment decrees have been issued at the last Cork Quarter Sessions against the tenantry of the Ponsonby estate, near Youghal, and that the eviction of a large number of families is threatened for a near day; and, in view of the fact that a large number of tenants were evicted in 1887, that, in March 1888, 57 eviction notices, under the seventh section of the Land Act 1887, were served on the tenants, and that Mr. Horace Townsend, the agent, has stated, in a letter recently made public, that the rents of many of the holdings are 40 per cent too high, will the Government authorise the employment of the forces of the Crown for the purpose of carrying out those evictions. I have also to ask the Chief Secretary if he is aware that on the 17th ultimo Mr. D. B. Sullivan, Q.C., on behalf of the tenants, offered Mr. Ponsonby, the landlord, in public Court, to leave the fixing of fair rents to the County Court Judge, and to leave the other questions (arrears and re-instatement of tenants) to arbitration; and, in view of the threatened evictions on this estate, will he use his influence to effect an arrangement, so as to obviate the necessity for evictions on a large scale?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that 49 ejectment decrees were obtained at the last Fermoy Quarter Sessions and some 90 others at the Wicklow Assizes against tenants on the Ponsonby estate. I understand that a letter has been published purporting to be a copy of one written by Mr. Horace Townsend, in which he expresses the opinion that on a particular portion of the Ponsonby estate acreable reductions might be made by the Land Commission from £1 per acre to 12s. or 13s. I am, however, informed, in the first place, that Mr. Townsend only saw a portion of the estate, and that the average rental of that portion was not £1 per acre, as Mr. Townsend appeared to have supposed, but was under 15s. per acre. If the terms offered by the landlord of 20 per cent reduction had been accepted it would have reduced these rents to a sum less than that which Mr. Townsend is reported to have said might be settled by the Land Commission. Mr. Ponsonby has offered to leave the fixing of the fair rents to the Land Commission, and to reduce the arrears in each case by whatever reduction might be made by them in the rents, and it would seem that no fairer offer could be made by any landlord.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the letter in question, Mr. Townsend states that he considers the agent should have given a larger allowance than 20 per cent; and, whether, in view of the strong statements contained in that letter, some representations ought not to be made which would have the effect of delaying the threatened evictions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Mr. Townsend seems only to have gone over a small portion of the estate, and he appears to have been mistaken as to what the rent of that portion was.

EXCISE DUTY IN INDIA.

MR. CAINE (Barrow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if it is true that Messrs. Leishman and Company, of the Castle Brewery, Coonoor, pay an Excise Duty of three rupees six annas per hogshead on all the beers they manufacture; and, if so, why are they treated so exceptionally to all other brewers in India, who are stated by him to be untaxed?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): The reply given by me on June 21st, to the effect that beer was not taxed in India, was too general. There is an Excise Duty on beer in the Province of Madras.

ASSAULT AT DINGWALL.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been directed to the trial of James Stewart (gamekeeper to Sir John Fowler, of Braemore), before Sheriff Hill, at Dingwall, last week, for an assault on Rose, the skipper of a herring boat at Loch Troon, while the latter was engaged in hauling in his herring nets; whether the said Stewart was liberated without bail after emitting a declaration; and whether the prosecutor, the Procurator Fiscal, made any objection to his liberation, although he was committed for trial?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The hon. Member has been misinformed as to this matter. There has been no trial. A charge was lodged against Stewart by Rose, and a countercharge by Stewart against Rose. These charges are now being investigated. Stewart was liberated with the consent of the Procurator Fiscal. This is quite usual in the case of law-abiding persons where the charge is not of a very serious kind.

BOARD OF TRADE—CONTRACTS—THE BULL ROCK LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the lenses supplied to the Commissioners of Irish Lights for the Bull Rock Lighthouse by Messrs. Chance, by direction of the Board of Trade, at a price higher by £150 than that of Mr. Waples.

tender for Messrs. Barbier and Company, have been found faulty by the Commissioners of Irish Lights and their scientific adviser, Sir Robert Ball, F.R.S., and some of them returned as imperfect; whether any complaint of a similar kind has ever been made respecting Messrs. Barbier's lenses, which have been supplied for many years to the Commissioners of Irish Lights; why the officials of the Harbour Department compelled the Commissioners of Irish Lights to purchase these inferior lenses from Messrs. Chance, at a higher price than those of better quality; whether notwithstanding this higher price and inferior quality, similar lenses have subsequently been ordered from Messrs. Chance for two important lighthouses in the South of England by the Trinity House, with the sanction of the Board of Trade; whether in the case of these two lighthouses tenders by public competition were sought; and, if so, whether Messrs. Chance's was the lowest tender or whether, as on the previous occasion, it was higher than the competing tenders; and whether the Harbour Department of the Board of Trade took any pains to have these lenses compared before delivery, as to quality and perfection of manufacture, with lenses of Messrs. Barbier's make and unimpeached quality recently erected at Tory Island Lighthouse and other places in Ireland; and, if so, what were the steps they took to have this comparison made?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As regards the lenses supplied by Messrs. Chance for the Bull Rock Lighthouse, the Commissioners of the Board that portions when first supplied by them, were found faulty and they were subsequently re-ordered, and the following is the present state of the matter:—
The Board has been made to the Commissioners of Irish Lights, their scientific adviser, Sir Robert Ball, F.R.S.:—

"I have the pleasure to notice that the defective portions to which I had taken exception in the lenses at Kingstown, have been replaced by glass which is of a more objectionable strain. I was particularly struck with the solid and massive character of the apparatus, which is a splendid specimen of the art."

It has never been made of

Russell

Messrs. Barbier and Fenestre's lenses by the Irish Lights Commissioners. The grounds on which Messrs. Chance's tender for the Bull lenses was sanctioned by the Board of Trade in preference to that of Messrs. Barbier and Fenestre were fully stated in my reply to a question asked by the hon. Member on the 27th of February, 1888. With regard to Round Island and Bishop Rock, which it is presumed are the two lighthouses in the South of England referred to, the Board are informed by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House that the lenses for these lighthouses were obtained from Messrs. Chance under a three years' contract in force at the time of their supply. There was, therefore, no public competition for the supply of those instruments. As regards the alleged higher prices of Messrs. Chance, the Elder Brethren were satisfied at the time of entering into the contract that the rates as then settled were rather lower than the French official tariff, and as regards quality they have both at that time and in subsequent reports the positive assurance of their engineer that the lenses supplied are at least not inferior to those supplied by French manufacturers. Each instrument is examined before delivery, and any portions not approved are rejected and replaced before it is passed as satisfactory.

THE POSTMASTER OF KNOCKANOEY.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if, previous to appointing Mr. Cleary Postmaster at Knockanoy, County Limerick, he was aware that this man

Magistrate assaulting was bound 12 months for this fact, the postmaster Mr. Gue being a

*THE
(Mr. RAIL) I am here by the circumstances receive a subject I opinion a I may be had, of course, no knowledge of any such circumstances as those alleged by the hon. Member when the appointment was made.

METROPOLITAN COLLECTORS OF INLAND REVENUE.

SIR GEORGE BADEN POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether it has been decided to merge much of the work of the Metropolitan collectors of Inland Revenue in the office of the Receiver General; whether the Receiver General placed before the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments a scheme to effect this object, at a saving of £10,000 per annum; and, whether the Inland Revenue Board suggested an alternative scheme, which involved a saving of only £800 a year; and, whether the former or the latter scheme is the one that is to be put in force?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that no decision has yet been arrived at.

THE DORCHESTER SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will inform the House the total amount of the frauds at the Dorchester Savings Bank; the total amount of the separate surplus fund when the trustees decided to close the bank; and, whether any sums have been granted by the National Debt Commissioners to aid the trustees in making good the frauds, first, from the separate surplus fund, and, secondly, from the credit balance on the current account; also whether his attention has been called to the fact that the actuary of the Dorchester Savings Bank, from 1881 to 1888, wilfully and knowingly concocted false balance sheets, in order to conceal the frauds of his predecessor; and that these false Returns were annually presented to this House; whether any steps are being taken to punish this actuary for such false Returns; and the reason why a public inquiry has not been instituted under the Act of 1887?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The balance on the general account of the Dorchester Savings Bank on the 18th of January, 1889, the date when notice of the intention of the trustees to close the bank was notified to the National Debt Commissioners, was £45,309 16s. 4d. The balance of the separate surplus fund at the same date was £2,356 16s. 2d. On the 10th instant the balance on the general account was £367 5s. 10d., and that of the separate surplus fund the same as before mentioned — namely, £2,356 16s. 2d. The National Debt Commissioners, with the concurrence of the Treasury, have informed the trustees that they will be prepared to allow the separate surplus to be applied towards payment of the depositors' claims upon condition of the trustees and managers entering into an undertaking to make good any balance of deficiency which may remain after payment of the separate surplus money. The Commissioners, at the same time, informed the trustees that they formally reserve any rights which they may possess to recover the amount of separate surplus advanced in the event of personal liability for the losses of the bank being eventually brought home to the trustees and managers, or any of them. A formal undertaking to the effect required by the Commissioners has been subscribed by a majority of the trustees and managers. In reply to the second question of the hon. Member, I have to say that the conduct of the actuary in returning false balance sheets was no doubt highly reprehensible, but as his object in doing so was to conceal and gradually make good the defalcations of a former actuary who was his relation, and as during the six years that he has been actuary he has reduced the deficiency to some extent, and has been guiltless of any defalcation himself, it seemed a harsh course to prosecute him. The question of a public inquiry under the Act of 1887 is still under consideration. But I am bound to point out to the hon. Member that such inquiries are very costly, and that unless it seems likely that an inquiry will reveal fresh facts of importance with regard to the particular bank, or add to the large stock of information as to the position of the trustee banks in general, which has already been brought to light by the Cardiff and Macclesfield inquiries, the Treasury would hardly be justified in sanctioning so great an expenditure of public money.

MR. HOWELL: Have not numerous facts come under the right hon. Gentleman's notice, and the notice of the House, in which these false entries have been made, and yet the National Debt Commissioners have taken no notice of them?

MR. GOSCHEN: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, a Committee sat upon this very subject, and the Commissioners are studying the Report of the Committee. I entirely appreciate the importance of the question, and the hon. Member will see that the Commissioners have pushed the inquiries with regard to the Cardiff and Macclesfield cases with every desire to bring every possible fact to light.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not forget that in the Macclesfield case the Report specially pointed to one offender who is in the Commission of the Peace.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether an appointment has been made of the successor to Sir F. Napier Broome in the Governorship of Western Australia; and, if not, when such an appointment will be made?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The name of the proposed successor to Sir F. Napier Broome has not yet been submitted to the Queen; but it is intended that the appointment shall be made very shortly.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the statement true that the Colony of West Australia, in order to prevent English or Irish barristers emigrating into the Colony, have passed a law requiring six months' residence before they can appear in Court in any case; does this law prevail in any other Australian Colony; and, will care be taken, before the West Australian Bill is passed, to make it impossible to prevent this discrimination against incoming professional men by the older immigrants?

BARON H. DE WORMS: By a Colonial Act of 1886, which has received the Queen's assent, no person can be admitted as a barrister or solicitor unless he has resided in the Colony of Western Australia for not less than six months. In South Australia previous residence for 12 months is required, but may be dispensed with by the Court. I may add that in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia 12 months' residence is a condition for admission. As to the last paragraph of the question, this period of six months' residence is required in the case of all applicants for admission to the Bar, whatever place they may come from, and Her Majesty's Government see nothing unreasonable in the condition, which, it may be added, is less onerous than the requirements of the legal authorities in the United Kingdom before admitting colonial barristers to practise.

MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): Is it a fact that barristers from the British colonies are not allowed to practise in this country until they have completed a residence of three years; and, if so, will the Government take the necessary steps to remedy this grievance?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I believe the hon. Member is correct with regard to the term of residence required. I apprehend that any change in the existing system would necessitate legislation.

MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire): Is it not the case that a dispensation is constantly granted?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, I believe that is so.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it an educational or a residential test that is required?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I believe that in some cases an examination is required, but in all cases a residential qualification is required.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I will oppose the Western Australia Bill when it comes before the House.

MEDICAL PENSIONS.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if a pension can be legally granted to an officer, under the Medical Charities Acts, on any other grounds than advanced age, length of service, physical or mental incapacity; and, if a doctor who has received a retiring allowance for any of the above reasons, is still entitled to hold another medical appointment in the same Poor Law Union?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The grounds upon which a superannuation allowance may be granted by the Guardians of a Union to an officer appointed under the Medical Charities Acts are permanent infirmity of body or mind or old age. The Local Government Board have been advised, in reference to a case which came before them, that there was no legal obstacle to a retiring allowance being granted to a medical officer in respect of an office under the Medical Charities Acts, although he might continue to hold another and distinct appointment under the Poor Law Acts, but the circumstances which could ever give substantial justification for such a proceeding must obviously be very exceptional.

THE MARITIME CONFERENCE.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs which of the 13 general divisions of the programme (for the Maritime Conference) proposed by the American delegates have been objected to by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether an arrangement has now been arrived at; and, if so, what are the subjects which are finally agreed upon for discussion at the Conference?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any further information on this subject at present, as we are awaiting a reply from the Government of the United States to a communication which has been addressed to them.

MR. CHANNING: Is the reply likely to be received before the rising of Parliament?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes; I think so.

THE CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the directions given under the 14th section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (and the Treasury Minute thereon) with respect to defence of persons charged under the said Act which can now be seen by Members of the House in the Library, provide for the case of prisoners, like the Gweedore prisoners, obliged to retain and keep on special retainer, in a strange circuit, the counsel and solicitors engaged and instructed by persons charged in their own country; if not, will he see that special directions are given to make such provision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The arrangements made under the 14th section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act have not been published; but are embodied in Treasury letters. Provision is made for all change of venue cases, including a strange circuit. The fees are fixed with the approval of the Treasury with reference to the nature of the prosecution.

DENBIGHSHIRE CHARITIES.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Penrith Division (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the inquiry into the charities of Denbighshire, instituted last October by the Charity Commissioners, is yet completed; and, if so, how soon the Report will be issued; and whether, in view of the uselessness of the Return ordered by this House on 19th June, relative to the endowments available for the purposes of the Intermediate and Technical Education (Wales) Act, an investigation will be made by the Charity Commissioners without delay into the charities of the different Welsh counties, so as to enable the joint Education Committees to frame schemes under the Act?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The inquiry into the charities of Denbighshire has been completed in 48 out of the 66 parishes of Denbighshire. It is expected that the inquiry will be completed in every parish of Denbighshire before the end of November. The Charity Commissioners have not at present been furnished by the Treasury with the requisite authority for the expenditure necessary for similar inquiries in other counties. They understand that the Treasury desire to consider the Report upon the charities of Denbighshire before authorising further expenditure.

MR. T. ELLIS: In that case is the Act to remain in suspension until the Treasury gives its consent in order to enable the Act to be set in motion?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I think the hon. Member had better address that question to the Secretary to the Treasury. The Charity Commissioners are prepared to go on with the work the moment they obtain the necessary authorisation.

THE JOINT EDUCATION COMMITTEES.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the names of the persons to be nominated by the Lord President of the Council on the Joint Education Committees, under the Intermediate and Technical Education (Wales) Act, will be published on or before 1st November, the date of the commencement of the Act?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): So soon as the Act comes into operation the County Councils will, I presume, proceed to nominate members to form part of the Joint Education Committees, and I apprehend that the Lord President will be prepared to make his nominations coincide in point of time as much as possible.

IRELAND—PRISON TREATMENT OF MR. CONYBEARE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state upon what grounds Mr. Conybeare was deprived by the authorities of Derry Gaol, on Thursday last, of the privilege of reading the newspapers?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the Visiting Justices of Londonderry Prison have withdrawn for one week the privilege which they had granted to Mr. Conybeare to receive newspapers, he having misconducted himself by shouting from the window of his place of confinement on the occasion of the discharge of a number of prisoners.

MR. MAC NEILL: Was not the occasion the discharge of the Falcarragh prisoners, and is it a fact that one of the prisoners who was discharged in a dying state actually died on the following day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question may be an important and proper one in itself, but it is not a question which arises out of the question on the Paper. I believe that notice has been given of a question by another hon. Gentleman on the subject.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN BOFFIN AND SHARK.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is his intention, after repeated applications on behalf of the inhabitants of the islands of Boffin and Shark, to give them increased postal facilities in lieu of the present tri-weekly service in summer and bi-weekly service in winter, that some encouragement may be given to the promotion and extension of the fishing industry of those islands?

*MR. RAIKES: I have carefully considered the application to which the hon. Member refers, and I should have been glad, if possible, to comply with it; but I find that even now the postal service to Innisboffin is conducted at a loss to the Revenue. To increase the frequency of the service as desired would augment the loss already incurred, and I regret that, in the circumstances, I do not feel justified in acceding to the wishes of the Memorialists.

USIBEPU.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the boundaries of Usibepu's location, as laid down by Mr. Addison, R.M., and subsequently altered by Mr. Knight, R.M., and referred to in Colonial Blue Book, C. 5522, page 70 (Inclosure in No. 49), have been finally confirmed; and whether the boundaries laid down by Mr. Knight, R.M., for Usibepu's location include territory to which Ndabuko, Mautywana, Mbopa, and other Usutu Chiefs belonged, and which territory was recognised as the 1883, and that it is difficult to settle these boundary disputes among the different Chiefs; but no final decision will be come to until full information has been received as to the deviations in the lines of Usibepu's location, as settled at different times, and any dispute will be disposed of as far as possible with strict regard to the accepted principle that Usutus should not be placed under the tribal authority of chiefs opposed to Usutus, and vice versa.

THE COLLISION AT KEITH JUNCTION.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has considered the Report of Major Marindin, on the collision at Keith Junction on 17th June, from which it appears that the collision occurred owing to the points being worked by hand instead of being interlocked with the signals; that in 1884 the same Inspector of the Board recommended that this station should be remodelled and re-signalled; that last year a similar collision occurred to a Great North of Scotland train at the same station; that the cross over road and other additions at this station were carried out without submitting the alterations for inspection by the Board of Trade; whether the making of these alterations without obtaining the authorisation of the Board of Trade rendered the Company liable to penalties under "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1842," as extended by the Act of 1871; and what steps will be taken to bring this state of things to an end?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have considered the Report of Major Marindin on the collision at Keith Junction on June 17. After the accident of last year the attention of the company was called to their omission to report alterations for inspection, and they assured the Board of Trade that they would take care in future that when any alterations were made the Board of Trade shall be advised as required by the Act. They have also been called upon to submit for inspection all places where the permanent way or works have been altered since the passing of the Act of 1871. The action of the company in this matter appears to me to afford no additional reason for the passing of the Bill which is now before the House.

COL. CCCXXXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

DEFECTIVE TELEGRAPHIC ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, on 17th July, a telegram was sent from Pruskow Station, Poland, addressed Mahony, Holland Road, Brighton, whether it was returned marked "not known;" and, whether, in view of the fact that Mr. George Mahony has been residing for the past ten months at 21, Holland Road, Brighton, and has been in constant receipt of both letters and telegrams, he can explain why the telegram was not delivered to him, instead of being returned to Poland marked "not known?"

*MR. RAIKES: The telegram to which the hon. Member refers was received in Brighton at 10.44 p.m. It was at once sent out for delivery in Holland Road, and was tried there at seven houses without success. As by this time it was 11 o'clock, the messenger did not consider himself justified in carrying the attempt any further. There is a wide difference between the treatment of letters and of telegrams. Letters fall into the hands of postmen who are every day employed in the same streets; and in this way acquire a knowledge of the names of the residents, whereas telegrams are delivered by boys who are employed successively in the delivery of telegrams in different directions. In this particular case the name of the Addressee was not known to the Telegraphic Staff at Brighton, and they had no alternative but to notify to the office of origin that the telegram could not be delivered.

MR. MAHONEY: Is it not the fact that the telegram was kept at the General Post Office, Brighton, for three days without being sent to the sub office in the Western Road, where the address of Mr. Mahoney was well known?

*MR. RAIKES: I know nothing of the facts, but if necessary I will obtain information.

IRELAND—REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Statement of the Registrar of Deeds commenting on the Report (dated 22nd December, 1885) of the Treasury Committee appointed to inquire into the Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland)?

MR. JACKSON: The statement referred to by the hon. and learned Member is an ordinary inter-Departmental Paper, and it would not be in accordance with the usual practice to lay such Papers on the Table of the House.

THE INNY DRAINAGE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what amount has Colonel Dopping, the Receiver appointed by the Irish Board of Works, paid in for the lands of Mr. Christopher Reynolds, Abbeylara, County Longford, which that body have taken in execution to satisfy the Inny drainage charge; and what is the amount now due to the Government, and how many years' assessment does it represent?

MR. JACKSON: Colonel Dopping, the Receiver in this case, was appointed by the Land Judge, and not by the Irish Board of Works. No money has yet been received by the Board of Works. The total amount due to the 5th of April, 1889, is £135, representing eight years' charge.

DR. TANNER.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been drawn to a Report in the Times of Thursday, which alleges that in speaking of the case of Dr. Tanner, M.P., the Lord Chief Baron of Ireland declared, "I think if I were held for good behaviour there is nothing in the world would induce me to give the sureties;" if, after this pronouncement from so eminent a judicial authority, Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration the propriety of now releasing from prison a Member of Parliament who has already been confined there many days; if his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Judgment of the Lord Chief Baron in the Irish Times, in which the Lord Chief Baron is reported to have said—

"He (the Chief Baron) certainly thought that before being committed for contempt, a person should have the opportunity of being heard;"

and also if his attention has been drawn to that portion of the Judgment where the Chief Baron, while upholding the decision of the Magistrates in points of Law, "regretted that such was the Law;" and if the Government will advise that effect will be given to this opinion from the Bench by remitting the remainder of Dr. Tanner's period of imprisonment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As regards the first paragraph I understand that the Chief Baron made the observations during the earlier portion of the argument of the counsel for the Crown, and that he was understood to mean that he would not give sureties except under a jurisdiction warranted by law. At the conclusion of the argument, the Court unanimously held that the jurisdiction in the case of the Member for Mid Cork was clearly warranted by law. As regards committal for contempt no apprehension need be entertained that any person before committal will be deprived of opportunity for explanation and apology unless it is obvious that such opportunity would only be used for the repetition of insult or disorder.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask whether the Lord Chief Baron did not describe the jurisdiction as antique—one that had hardly ever before been exercised?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not recollect the observation which the right hon. Gentleman attributes to Baron Dowse.

MR. SEXTON: Not to Baron Dowse, but to the Lord Chief Baron.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the Lord Chief Baron did make the observation that this jurisdiction had not been recently exercised; but I believe he also pointed out that the advice the Lord Lieutenant may tender to the Crown on the subject of Dr. Tanner's release, does not rest with me (Mr. Balfour) nor with the House. As far as I am aware, it is not intended by the Lord Lieutenant to make a special representation to Dr. Tanner; but under the circumstances, Dr. Tanner will be treated, under the rules applicable to untried prisoners, as a first-class misdemeanant.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not a matter of fact Dr. Tanner is not now being treated as a first-class misdemeanant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the prison rules are rather more favourable to untried prisoners than to first-class misdemeanants.

COLONEL NOLAN: I want to know whether the report of the Times which I have quoted is correct or incorrect?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not in a position to say whether the report is accurate or inaccurate. The answer I have given was given from the best information I could obtain.

COLONEL NOLAN: Did it come from the Lord Chief Baron?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; it did not.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I wish to ask whether Mr. Powell, the other bail prisoner who is in gaol under somewhat similar circumstances for refusing to give bail for good behaviour, will also be treated as an untried prisoner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information as to Mr. Powell, but I will be glad to answer the question if notice is given. The information I have given as to Dr. Tanner is what I have just received by telegram from the Prisons Board, who are acting under their discretion in the matter.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask whether, in the case of Dr. Tanner, now under sentence for contempt, inflicted by a Court which affects to exercise a jurisdiction which it does not possess, the prisoner will be released?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer an argumentative legal point; but in the case of the hon. Member for Mid Cork the Court has held that the jurisdiction was warranted by law.

POLICE IN CLARE.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what is the number of police at present stationed in County Clare, and setting out (a) the number of ordinary police; (b) the number of extra police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the number of the police at present in the County Clare is as follows:—Free force, 327; extra force, 159—total, 486, together with 9 Head Constables, 8 District Inspectors, and a County Inspector.

NAVAL LIEUTENANTS.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many Lieutenants are now serving in Her Majesty's Ships at home and abroad; how many Lieutenants are now unemployed and available as a reserve for filling up casualties in ships now in commission; how many Lieutenants serving in ships in commission are fully qualified Gunnery Lieutenants; and, how many of the Lieutenants unemployed are so qualified?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There are 857 lieutenants on the present Navy List, of whom 782 are employed in the mobilised Fleet, or in ships at home and abroad. 38 are serving in the Coastguard, and the remaining 37 are either on half-pay, the sick list, or casual employment. There is, therefore, in the present state of the lists, little reserve. It must, however, be remembered that at the present moment the Fleet is on a war footing with a peace establishment, and that in the case of real emergency all the lieutenants referred to, as well as those in harbour ships and the Retired List, would, in addition to officers of the Royal Naval Reserve, be available for service. Of the gunnery lieutenants, 74 out of 79 are serving at the present time. It was settled some time back to raise the lieutenants' list to 1,000, and steps were taken two years ago to carry out this object by largely increasing the number of cadets annually entered.

IRELAND—SANITARY CONDITION OF DERRY GAOL.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary whether three of the Falcarragh prisoners who have been detained in Derry Gaol have been discharged in a state of serious illness; whether one of them, when released, was in a delirious condition, and died shortly afterwards of typhus fever, contracted in the gaol, and whether another was not dangerously ill of the same fever. I would also ask whether, having regard to the opinion of the Lord Chief Baron that Mr. Conybeare is illegally in custody, and ought to be discharged, the Government intend to enforce the whole of his sentence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have heard to-day that one of the Falcarragh prisoners, released from Derry Gaol, has since died of typhus fever.

MR. SEXTON: He was delirious when let out.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not heard that; neither have I heard of the illness of two other persons from typhus, as described by the right hon. Gentleman. I should rather think that the allegation was erroneous, because, in answer to my communications, the only statement which I have received is that on July 11 a prisoner was discharged suffering from inflammation of the lungs, and I think that the authorities would have given additional information as to the typhus if it had existed. As to the hon. Member for Camborne, I do not know that particular circumstances connected with Derry Gaol have any bearing on his case.

MR. SEXTON: It is a dangerous gaol.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite admit that the fact that a prisoner who was recently in Derry Gaol has died of typhus, supplies very adequate ground for making a most careful inspection of the prison, and to-day the principal member of the Prisons Board has gone to Derry for the purpose of instituting the necessary inquiries.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the justice of making some compensation to the family of the poor man who has died, and to whose sentence of imprisonment the penalty of death has been added by the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Until we know the real circumstances of the case and are informed as to the sanitary condition of Derry Gaol, it would be premature to consider any question of that kind.

MR. MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give orders that a covered place, instead of an exposed yard, shall be constructed for the use of prisoners when exercising? On July 12 a prisoner died of sunstroke in consequence of exposure to the burning sun.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The propriety of erecting a covered place of recreation is a question of general prison management which ought not to be decided with reference to one particular gaol. I will inquire what the practice is in England, and if there is a different system here I will consider what should be done in the matter.

MR. SEXTON: In Supply we shall have to discuss whether this Derry Gaol is not a deathtrap.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford S.): Had the Government, at the time of the release of the prisoners, information in their possession that typhus had broken out in Derry Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. No information of the kind was possessed by the Government as far as I know; nor do I know that it is absolutely certain that the man did die of typhus. There seems to be some doubt about it.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): As the Lord Chief Baron has expressed an opinion that Mr. Conybeare has been illegally convicted, and seeing that another Judge entertained some doubt in the matter, will the Government order Mr. Conybeare's release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already answered that question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): May I ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Votes in Supply are being put down in regular order as he promised they should be, because it appears to me that every day they are put down in a different order?

MR. JACKSON: The reason for putting them down in the order in which they appear is the necessity of meeting the exigencies of the Service.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will Class V. be taken in the order in which it appears?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): May I ask the Chief Secretary whether in view of the fact that the Barrow and Shannon Drainage Bills are not to be persevered with he will take them off the Paper?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; I will in each case move that the Order for the Second Reading be discharged.

MR. STOREY: It would greatly relieve our minds if the right hon. Gentleman would state that he intends to take the same course in regard to the Bann Drainage Bill.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not do anything of the kind.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): When does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury propose to take the Second Reading of the Western Australia Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to say.

MR. W. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman give reasonable notice?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to give as much notice as possible; but at this period of the Session it is impossible to say when any particular Bill will be taken.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): May I ask when the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Bill, which stands as the 25th Order, will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be taken at the first opportunity.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO, AND PROTECTION OF, CHILDREN BILL
(Changed from "CRUELTY TO CHILDREN PREVENTION BILL.")

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to move that the Lords' Amendments to the Protection of Children Bill be now taken into consideration. [Cries of "No."] The Amendments passed in another place have, on the whole, very much improved the measure.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Motion can only be taken by leave of the House.

[Several hon. Members objected, and the Motion was not put].

Lords Amendment to be considered upon Wednesday, and to be printed. [Bill 372.]

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, Universities (Scotland) Bill.

MOTION.

PUBLIC HEALTH (CHOLERA PREVENTION.)

LUNACY ACTS AMENDMENT BILL
[LORDS.] (No. 199.)

Lords Reasons, and Lords Amendments to Commons Amendments, and Consequential Amendment made by the Lords to the Bill, considered.

Resolved, That this House doth not insist on the Amendments to which the Lords have disagreed, and doth agree to the Amendments made by the Lords to the Amendments made by this House, and to the Consequential Amendment made by the Lords to the Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY
BILL. (No. 272).

Order for Committee read.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): The subject of the Instruction I venture to submit to the House is one of some difficulty, and I must ask the indulgence of the House while I put forward my view why I think it necessary the Committee should have this Instruction, and I will endeavour to be as brief as possible in doing this. Before I go to that part of the subject I may say that we on this side of the House, and, indeed, I think the House generally, have reason to complain of the way the Government have treated us in regard to this Bill. After 14 or 15 adjournments extending over a period of two months, the Government have at last made up their minds, and this, according to common report, notwithstanding the urgent protests of their own friends, to proceed with this measure. From a Party point of view we, on this side of the House, ought to welcome this decision, because I am perfectly certain it will bring the Government into sharp antagonism with many of their oldest and firmest supporters in the county constituencies. Whatever we may think of the wisdom of their procedure, or the convenience of the opportunity the Government have chosen, it is impossible to deny the right of the Government to choose their own time for bringing on a measure for which they are responsible; but while we admit that right of the majority, I hope we may claim on this side the equal right of the minority to use the fullest freedom of amendment and criticism. We consider the Bill to be a one-sided measure; we consider it to be a measure which cannot possibly carry out the intention for which it is avowedly brought forward.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I must remind him that this is not a Second Reading Debate: it is the discussion of a specific Instruction, not a general discussion.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER: I was only referring, Sir, to the general character of the Bill, in order to point out why it is I consider the Instruction necessary. Of course I bow to your ruling, Sir, and proceed to call attention to the Instruction of which I have given notice—

"That the Committee have power to make provision for a gradual redemption of Tithe Rent-Charge on an equitable basis."

Now, I venture to call attention to the word "gradual" for two reasons—first, because I think it answers any objection which might be brought from the other side that the Instruction would inevitably kill the Bill, claiming, as the Government do, that it deals with a matter of procedure only; and the second and more important reason is, that being gradual it will not have at once universal application, and therefore it will be open to any part of the country where the tithe rent-charge is satisfactory from an agricultural point of view, between tithe owners and tithe payers, not to have this Instruction applied to them. I do not propose on this occasion to put before the House any definite scheme of redemption, it is obvious it would be wrong to attempt to do so at this point of the Debate, and it would be far more orderly to bring forward such a scheme in Committee, and I am quite ready to put down clauses for the purpose should the House sanction this Instruction. But I have an earnest hope that such clauses may come from more competent hands, and, apart from Party, be accepted by the general sense of the House. There are certain principles that must be adhered to. Tithe was originally a compulsory tax on the produce of the land, and the tithe rent-charge has become, with very little protest in the country, an absolute and definite property. But it is a public property, a national property, the property of the nation, and of the nation alone. It is, therefore, quite obvious that if we are to contemplate any scheme of redemption the first condition of any scheme must be the recognition of the inalienable property of the country; there must be no tampering with the title of the nation to its own property. This proposition will be accepted in all parts of the House in reference to any redemption scheme, and it certainly would be a vital condition on this side. Therefore, I pass from that to show why, in my opinion, it is desirable that some scheme of redemption should be brought forward, and that without any unnecessary delay. The tithe rent-charge is, I have said, a tax upon produce; it never was intended to be charged on the land alone; it was never intended to be charged upon the capital which is put into the land, nor was it ever intended to be charged wholly on the labour for the cultivation of the land; it was intended to be a charge upon the property, capital and labour combined. As the House knows, the country has been passing through a period of exceptional agricultural distress, and this distress has especially fallen on those counties in which the tithe rent-charge most especially presses. There is no reason to imagine that we have got to the bottom of that distress. It may happen—it is very possible—that circumstances might arise that would bring this distress back upon us in all its intensity; and if that comes about, then the first question that will arise will be how the tithe rent-charge should be dealt with. It will be pointed out, as it was in 1836, that it is a tax on the great industry of the land, and when we remember that the agitation that will arise will not be from one class, but probably from all classes living on the land—owners, occupiers, and labourers—I think we shall see the agitation will be very formidable and difficult to grapple with, and it may come about that we who look on this charge as a national property, whether it be devoted to religious or secular purposes—it may come about that we shall lose our hold on this property altogether. Therefore, it seems to me, it would be a wiser course for us to adopt some scheme of redemption while there is yet time. The scheme of redemption we should accept must, of course, be on an equitable basis—that is to say, injuring neither the tithe-owners on the one side or the agricultural interest on the other. It must be a fair charge that the land can afford to pay—just to the clergy or tithe-owners, yet not placing the agriculture at a disadvantage. I ventured to point out the other day the great and unforeseen change which has come over agriculture since the settlement of 1836. Nobody at that period, nobody who joined in the Debates upon the Act of 1836, thought it possible that towards the close of the century there would be great tracts of land the yearly value of which would not equal the tithe rent-charge placed upon the land. Nobody at that time could have anticipated that this would happen so soon, yet the causes were then present, and, in some instances, at work. One reason, undoubtedly, was the high price to which corn had risen in consequence of the long Continental wars that ended in 1815. The consequence of that high price was that pasture land and inferior land was converted into corn land, and this land was tithed as arable land when the Act of 1836 was passed. So it comes about that some land is charged with exceptional high tithe in proportion to its value. Everybody knows there is much of this land which has gone out of cultivation, to the great loss of capital and labour. You cannot ever restore the land to its original use; it is not profitable to plant it with wood or to return to its original state of pasture, because the tithe on it is so heavy. These are, I think, very serious, very startling facts that deserve the attention of the House and the country. But there are other facts in regard to the working of this Act to which I would call attention, and the reason I call attention to them is because my Instruction would give some compensation for what has happened. The working of the Tithe Commutation Act has not carried out the intention of the framers of it. I will not now discuss the question of corn averages, but I will call attention to the septennial average. The House knows that the value of the tithe rent-charge for any year is calculated on the price of barley, wheat, and oats during the seven preceding years, and so it may come about that a man may buy a farm or a tenant may take a lease at the end of seven fat years when prices were high, and his first year of occupation may commence a series of lean years when prices are low; but the tithe rent-charge will be calculated on the prices on the seven fat years with which he had nothing to do. As anyone who has had anything to do with agriculture must remember, the year 1879 was most disastrous to that interest in this country. In that year the tithe rent-charge was as high as 112, yet anybody who knows anything about agriculture knows that the farmer and those who worked the soil absolutely got no profit out of the land, and if the tithe had been collected in kind as before 1836, the tithe, instead of being 12 or 13 per cent, would probably not have been worth the expense of collection. Now that seems to me unjust and inconsistent, and there ought to be some compensation. The Government, however, have not, though professing to have the interests of agriculture at heart, brought forward any measure to remedy these defects, and I think at the next General Election, probably, this lepreux of theirs will be recollected in county constituencies. I shall be told there is no necessity for my Instruction because the Government have promised—and I must say in a somewhat vague fashion—to take the matter up themselves. They have said that possibly they will next year bring in a Bill, or, as an alternative, they will refer the matter to a Committee. Well, there is an humble proverb, "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," and that is especially true as applied to promised legislation. We who have only been through this short Parliament have seen over and over again instances where legislation has been promised and the promises have never been fulfilled. Where is the District Councils Bill, which seemed when promised an absolute consequence of the Local Government Bill? We have not heard a whisper of that Bill this year, nor shall we probably hear of it next year. We should be very unwise to give up this opportunity upon a vague and empty promise of the Government. We have a promise from the Government of a Joint Committee of both Houses to consider the subject, but we know nothing of the constitution of the Committee; it may be appointed next year, it may enter on its consideration next year or the following year, and continue to the end of the present Parliament. It is most important to know, too, what the Committee is to consider, and this, I hope, the Government make it necessary to appoint a Committee now when it was not necessary two years ago? The only change there has been seems to me to be a change in the mind of the Government, and what guarantee have we that they will not change their mind again next year? I think the House would be wise to take advantage of this opportunity, and Members for agricultural constituencies would do well to accept this Instruction, even though it should be found impossible to carry clauses to give effect to it, for it will be a definite pledge that something shall be done in the interest of the tithe-payers in addition to a Bill like this, which is conceived solely in the interest of the tithe-owners. Two other reasons have been put forward why this Bill should be passed at once and why this Instruction should not be received. One of these reasons is that we are told the whole object of the Bill is to make the people who can pay tithe-charge and will not pay, pay the charge; or, as I have seen it suggested in a letter, to make the defrauders and swindlers of Wales who can pay fulfil their obligations. We are led to suppose that only those who can pay and will not pay will be affected by the Bill; but that is absolutely false; the effect will be that the whole of the tithe-payers will be——

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member he is now going into the whole question of the Bill, not only the redemption of the charge. I must remind him this is not in the nature of a Second Reading Debate, and but for the notice of the Instruction I should leave the Chair at once, and the House would go into Committee on the Bill. The Instruction does not open up a Second Reading Debate; only the specific question concerned in the Instruction is introduced.

*MR. HERBERT GARDNER: The mistake I made, Sir, was that I thought it possible to put forward the disadvantages of the Bill to show the reason for compensation, and, therefore, for my Instruction. In conclusion, I will ask the House to vote my Instruction because it does give some compensation to tithe-payers, and will, I hope, pledge the Government to bring forward some measure on their behalf showing the country and agricultural constituencies that the House is not prepared to relegate the just claims of the agricultural interest to the chances and changes of an uncertain future.

Motion made and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to make provision for a gradual redemption of Tithe Rent Charge on an equitable basis.”—(Mr. Herbert Gardner.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): There is very much in the speech of the hon. Member with which the Government sympathise. They have more than once declared their intention to deal with the tithe rent-charge, and my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury only a few nights ago said the Government propose to refer this most difficult and complicated question of the working of the Tithe Commutation Act and the Acts amending it to the consideration of a Joint Committee of both Houses. It is obvious that the question is surrounded by many difficulties, and the speech of the hon. Member himself has shown that the most careful examination must precede legislation on this part of the subject. Sympathising as I do with the view that the redemption of the tithe rent-charge on a fair basis is a desirable thing, the only other question is, is it possible with the time at our disposal to undertake this work this year? I think the House will be satisfied that it is not possible. The hon. Member himself points out that what we must first get at is the foundation of the calculation of a fair rent-charge to be put on the land, before we can get the sum of the number of years' purchase for the redemption. I pass by the allusions to tithe rent-charge being a national property because, with all respect to the hon. Gentleman, it appears to me irrelevant to the argument which he offers in support of his Motion. For the purpose of the present Debate, I will accept the argument of the hon. Member that in order to get at the fair basis he desires it will be necessary to reconsider the apportionment of the charge under the Act of 1836. Now I believe that many great anomalies have grown out of the settlement of 1836; but it is a question how far it is possible or wise to review that settlement. I doubt extremely whether, taking the country as not say rightly or wrongly—contracted themselves out of the Act. They have, in fact, done what they tried to do with the income-tax until they were prevented by the Legislature. Now the Government say that the present arrangement is unsatisfactory. The Attorney General says that a large number of the clergy are deprived of their tithes. On the other hand, he says that a large number of tenant farmers will not pay though they can. So the Government propose some other remedy. What is that remedy? If the intentions of the Home Secretary are carried out—and the Opposition will do their utmost to see that they are—the only effect of the change will be to substitute the County Court bailiff for the landlord's bailiff. This is a worthless measure, so far as the clergy are concerned. But this is not the Bill as it stands at present. It goes a great deal further and imposes a new liability on the tenant, and the Attorney General defends it because he says the tenant can pay and will not pay, and the Government will make him pay. That, of course, means that the Government cannot now make the tenant pay, but will do so by the present Bill. As the hon. Member for Essex says, the Bill is going to make somebody personally liable who was not personally liable before. Accordingly, the hon. Member is moving an Instruction to make that somebody the owner of the land. The Government decline to accept that Instruction, on the ground that though so far as future contracts are concerned the landlord ought to be made liable, this principle cannot be applied to present contracts. But the Instruction itself does not say that in every case the landlord shall be liable. The Committee will take care that no injustice was done, and this Instruction provides that when we get the Bill into Committee we shall have power to deal with the chargeability of landlords in respect of this tax. It will then be possible to limit the remedy in any way that may seem desirable. The tenant farmer has a right to say—"If you impose this new personal burden you must consider my case as well as that of the tithe owner." You cannot shut your eyes to the real grievances of the tenant farmer—the unfairness of the mode of assessment; the unfairness of averages; the amount required to pay for the produce of a farm taken at a price which cannot be obtained. I see no reason why the Instruction should not be accepted. The Government is imposing a new liability; but those who oppose the Bill are quite content to go on as now. If the tenant is left alone we have nothing to say in the matter. But if the Government are going to interfere with the tenant then we claim an equal right to interfere with the landlords.

Mr. H. WIGGIN (Staffordshire, Handsworth): I have travelled 100 miles to oppose this Bill as strongly as possible. As a loyal supporter of the Government, I deeply regret that they have not seen their way to withdraw this Bill and bring in a stronger measure next Session dealing with the whole question, including the redemption of the tithe. The redemption of the tithe would relieve both landlord and tenant of an unpleasant burden. If the last Division had been delayed a few minutes the majority of the Government would have been reduced by six or seven, and the next Division may have a very different result. I do implore the Government to drop the measure this Session and deal with the question next year, so as to give permanent relief both to landlord and to tenant.

Mr. A. F. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I quite agree that the landlord ought to be made responsible, and that was no doubt the intention of the Act of 1836, but if you do make the landlords responsible, I do not know how you can come down on his personal property in the event of non-payment of the tithe, unless you put in clauses to provide for that, and that course of procedure might lead to the loss of the Bill. I do not think much of the Bill, and if we allow the Bill to pass I trust that the Government will promise to bring in a Bill making the landlord properly responsible. At the same time, I hope a Bill will soon be introduced for the redemption of the tithe, which is the only way out of the difficulty.

Mr. W. I shire, Arfon) Home Secretary clause into the impossible in lords to contribute payment of the ask the Attorney General what will be the effect if the promise of the Home Secretary is carried out in the case of tenancies which are from year to year? A great part of the land of the country is held on yearly tenancy.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It would be at the option of the tenant to give six months' notice in order to obtain more favourable terms from the landlord.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I wish to say a few words in support of the Instruction, as I have an Amendment on the Paper which cannot be moved unless the Instruction, or something like it, is carried. I am anxious for a speedy and satisfactory settlement of this question. It has been generally admitted that the only practical remedy short of general redemption is to make the tithe recoverable from the landlord. Many of those who, like myself, take this view object to the Bill because it is a step in the wrong direction, and, if passed, will be an obstacle to future settlement. Two years ago the Government themselves passed through the House of Lords a Bill making the charge recoverable from the landlord. Even in last year's Bill they recognised the principle which is contained in the Tithe Commutation Act—namely, that the tithe was to be payable directly or indirectly by the landlord. We know that under the Tithe Commutation Act landlords and tenants began by very generally contracting themselves out of the terms of that Act. But I believe that in recent years in many parts of the country, including certain portions of Wales, there has been an alteration in this system, and that there is now a growing practice on the part of the more sensible and liberal landowners to pay the tithe themselves. I feel certain that if this measure is passed as it stands it will do a great deal to discourage this growing and salutary practice. Again, I feel certain that this measure will tend to postpone the settlement of the question by future legislation. It is not merely that this measure, though a partial and tentative measure, tends to take away the pressure of responsibility from the shoulders of the Government to deal satisfactorily and completely with the subject; but it is that this measure, whatever be its exact extent, places a new liability on the shoulders of the occupier of the land; and I cannot believe that the present Government, after legislating in this direction this year, will next year be prepared to legislate in what is practically a contrary direction, that is to say, propose to settle the tithe question by placing a new liability on the shoulders of the owner of the land. I firmly believe the passing of this Bill will tend to delay the eventual settlement of the question, and not only that, but that it will also tend to discourage redemption.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg pardon for trespassing beyond the limits of the discussion. I am quite content to leave my argument as it stands—namely, that it is better for all parties that if any change is to be made in the mode of recovering tithe the tithe should be recoverable from the landowner, and not from the occupier of the land, with due regard, of course, to existing contracts.

*MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): Two of the Representatives of the County of Essex have taken a prominent part in moving Instructions to the Committee, and I confess I feel some difficulty upon the present occasion. I agreed in principle with the hon. Member for Saffron Walden that there should be some scheme for redemption of the tithe rent-charge, and I also agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon that the burden of the tithe should be placed on the landowner. But I also wish to see this Bill passed. [Cries of "Why?"] Because I think the Government would be wanting in their duty if they did not endeavour to secure the payment of just debts to the owners of property in Wales. The incidence of tithe is a landowner's question, and it quite true that landlords have contracted themselves out of the Act of 1836 by agreements with their tenants. A change in the law to prevent this for the future is now proposed by the Government. I am perfectly willing to see tithe placed in the same position that Income Tax is placed at the present moment—namely, that the tenant, having paid the tithe, should be able to deduct it from his rent to the landlord; and I believe if that were done—and I understand the Home Secretary undertakes to carry that object into effect by clauses introduced in Committee—we should hear no more of the tithe difficulty. On this understanding I shall support the Government on the present occasion.

*MR. T. ELLIS: I desire to call the attention of the House to the declaration of the last speaker. He wishes to throw to the winds every declaration he has made in favour of redemption, and of putting the tithe on the landowner; in fact, he desires to break all his pledges to his constituents in order to strike a blow at the peasantry of Wales. That is the key and the clue to most of the arguments advanced from the opposite Benches. The Government, by bringing forward this Bill, propose to change the whole spirit and procedure and method of the Act of 1836; instead of making tithe a tax upon the produce of the land, they make it a personal debt upon the tenant. That is straight against the declaration of the Prime Minister, and straight against the wishes of their friends. I hope the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) and his supporters, will not run away from their own declarations and their own Amendment, but allow the Government to act on the policy of scuttle, which is the chief characteristic of their present policy. The Prime Minister stated, in 1887, that, "tithe is a debt of the owner in respect of the produce of the land," and in 1888 he said "the occupier is not a debtor, and he is to suffer the inconvenience of a distraint for a debt which is not his own; not merely is he to suffer the inconvenience of a debt which is not his own, but he is now to suffer all the pains and penalties of the County Court, and the distraint which will come from the Court, and all the heavy expenses, and, in the bargain, if he refuses compliance, he is to be gazetted as an ordinary debtor under the rules of the County Court. The Prime Minister paid us a compliment; he came down to Carnarvon to teach the Welsh people their duty with respect to tithe. He said:—

"I wish to ask those who are desirous of considering this question impartially to remember that tithe is really a burden, not upon the tenant, but upon the landowner, and if the tenant has been obliged to pay, it has been owing to a blunder in the law."

Mr. Round

And now you wish to stereotype this blunder in the law. The noble Marquess added—

"We are anxious to pass a measure which shall place it on the shoulder of the debtor, that is to say, on the landowner."

That is, that the landowner who owes the tithe shall be the man to pay. The Government by refusing to accept the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Maldon are running away and scuttling from the declaration of the Prime Minister. It seems, too, that they are running away from the wishes of their friends, the Welsh clergy. The Welsh clergy have sent to the Government from time to time very strong and urgent representations that the majority of them are starving, that is to say, the clergy of the richest church in Christendom are starving. They say, "We want two great amendments in the law: first of all, we want tithe to be a debt recoverable through the County Court; and, secondly, we want to make the true debtors pay—namely, the landlords." The Government are trying to please their friends, and at the same time to break the spirit of the Act of 1836. They want to put the pains and penalties upon the occupiers, and at the same time to let the real debtors go free. The Government themselves brought in two Bills in the House of Lords, one of the chief provisions of each being that the debt should be put on the landowners. I admit that very many of the Members for Wales were against putting the debt upon the landlords, and for the reason that we desire to have a complete settlement of this question and not a tinkering settlement. I maintain that this is a dishonest attempt to settle this question by merely evading it. There is a further reason why I ask my hon. Friends to stick to their guns. In Wales the clergy are the chaplains of the landlords and not of the people. Let the landlords pay for their own chaplains.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman appears to be under the impression that the Government are not true to the principles which they have already announced in another place. Only a few minutes ago my right hon. Friend distinctly stated that the Government accept the principle that in the future there shall be no contracting out of the Act as it stands. That is to say, that neither the landlords nor the tenants shall be at liberty to contract themselves out of the Act of 1837, and that the liability shall rest in all cases of new contract with the landlord alone. The Government propose to insert in the Bill a clause to the effect that Clause 80 of the Act of 1837, which prescribes that the tenant shall be entitled to deduct the tithe from his rent, shall have full effect notwithstanding any contract made after the passing of this Act, and every contract made after the passing of the Act shall, so far as it is to the contrary, be void. That clause will entitle every tenant to deduct on all fresh contracts the tithe from his rent. But what my hon. Friend proposes is that the tenant who has contracted to pay the tithe, notwithstanding the consideration which he has received in the rent which was fixed by the landlord, shall be entitled to deduct the tithe from the rent. That appears to the Government to be simple dishonesty. What we say is, that in future contracts the tenants and the landlords shall not contract themselves out of the Act of 1837. We propose that that shall be the law of the land as to tithe, as it is the law of the land as to the Income Tax.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Let me call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that, under the Act of 1836, it is the duty of the landlord to pay the tithe. But they have not done so. When the right hon. Gentleman talks of dishonesty, I think he should put the saddle on the right horse. Dishonesty is on the side of the landlords, and not on the side of the tenants. We are having a very fine object lesson to-night. We shall see who are the real friends of the farmers. Those who are anxious to be the farmers' friends will vote in favour of putting this burden on the landowners.

MR. GRAY: With the permission of the House I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question. It is, what will be done in the case of the rent not being sufficient to cover the tithe—how in that case will the tenant be able to deduct the tithe from the rent?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That difficulty occurs now. If the tithe is not earned and produced by the land it is not payable.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) stated just now that I, addressing the Home Secretary, said "We will hold you to the bargain—namely, that the landlords are not to pay, but the tenants are to pay." I never said anything of the kind. The House will bear witness as to what I said. I said to the Government "We will hold you to the bargain with respect to imprisonment, and the distraint upon the land." I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman is not anxious to make a statement that is not correct.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I referred to was the hon. and gallant Baronet's emphatic statement that he held the Government to the declaration that they would oppose all Instructions. He will remember he called upon the Government to reject all Instructions, and he cited specially the Instruction of the hon. Member for Malden.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: My remark had reference to those two particular questions. I happen to have 24 or 25 farms, and I have paid tithe in respect of 21 of them. Two of the remaining three or four are held by men who do not wish to have the tithe paid for them.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: May I ask you, Sir, whether it would be competent for the First Lord of the Treasury to move the new clause he has just read, if the House rejects the present Instruction?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: On the point of order, may I point out that the Instruction is that tithe is to be recoverable from the landlord only.

*MR. SPEAKER: The point is one for the Chairman of Committees to decide. I imagine, however, that if the Chairman of Committees is of opinion that the clause could not be inserted in Committee, the Bill could be re-committed for the purpose of inserting it.

MR. SALT (Stafford): It seems to me that the difference between the Government and the hon. Member for Malden is very small indeed. Could we not put the Instruction in such a form that the Government could accept it? The hon. Member proposed that the tithe rent recoverable should be thrown on the landlord. I am certain five-sixths of the Members of the House wish that that should be so. The only question is can it be done subject to existing contracts. It appears to me obvious that any provision to this effect which is inserted in the Bill must be subject to existing contracts.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I am not quite sure that the mind of the House is clear about this Instruction. There are two words in the Instruction which appear to me very significant—the word “recoverable” and the word “only,” and if the Instruction is carried the principle will be laid down that the Committee would have power to provide that the recovery of the tithe, that is the getting of the tithe, is to be instituted against the landlord and against him alone. I do not think that in consequence of an Instruction of this kind the Committee would be at all precluded from safeguarding any rights under existing contracts. What I understand is suggested by the Home Secretary is that he will put in the Bill a clause providing that though the process of recovery given by the Bill is against the tenant, the tenant shall always have power to deduct the tithe from the rent. That is a very different thing to recovery from the landlord. I wish to draw a distinction between the two processes, and I must own it does occur to me there are cases in which the rent is not equal to the tithe.

The House divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 145.—(Div. List, No. 297.)

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I have now to move—

I will endeavour to remember the necessary limitations imposed upon us at this stage, and avoid anything that can be construed into a Second Reading Debate, but it is absolutely impossible to bring before the House the arguments in favour of a re-adjustment of the method of taking tithe averages without, to a certain extent, dealing historically with the whole question. In the first place I would remind the House that in 1836, there was what was considered a statutory settlement of the question of the tithe-charge, its incidence and adjustment from time to time. Lord John Russell, in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill of 1836, spoke of it as a permanent settlement for all future time. But that distinguished statesman once or twice made great mistakes in his use of the word finality. At all events the Government of to-day have for the first time—except in some trifling matters of procedure—re-opened the whole question, and that in the interest of one party, only the clergy. They have in fact brought in a Clergy Tithe Relief Bill. I am showing the ground for my Instruction, when I say that gives a claim to all concerned to come into this High Court and ask that their just claims shall be considered. In moving this Instruction, I will venture to say, I do so in the interest of the whole of the tenant farmers of the kingdom, though personally and peculiarly on this occasion I represent the Principality of Wales. Still it touches the whole of the great agricultural community to whom the tillage of the soil of the kingdom is entrusted. Speaking on a previous instruction, the Attorney General said this Bill provides a remedy in the matter of procedure at once cheap, easy, and effective, while it would impose no additional burdens. We dispute this altogether. There is every reason to fear that it will be neither cheap nor easy, and I will venture to prophecy it will not be effective, while it certainly will impose very heavy additional burdens. So I say on behalf of the tenant farmers of Wales, and I might say so on behalf of the tenant farmers of the whole kingdom, that if you are going to make this a primary objection on every tenant farmer throughout the kingdom, making the tenant liable to County Court process with all its incident expenses, surely the tenant farmers have a right to come here and demand a fair adjustment of the burden. They say relieve us from what is admitted on all hands to be an imposition according to the present method of adjustment which, in the present condition of things, works great hardship on the tenant farmers in hundreds and thousands of cases. Before I go to instances of this, let me draw attention to the present condition of the agricultural tenants, especially in Wales. The Attorney General has repeated what I do not hesitate to call an unjust aspersion on my fellow countrymen. He said that the Bill, which he described as cheap, easy, and effective, was intended only—and here he was indicating my fellow countrymen—to apply to those who were able to pay, but who pretend that they object to pay on conscientious grounds; and, again, he alluded to those who refused to pay from motives not creditable. I repudiate that as unjust in the last degree. I repeat what I have already said, that there are no people in the kingdom more willing to pay just tithes for a just purpose than the Welsh people. There is nothing more unjust than to say that they wish to evade their proper payment. What they do say is that whether they are taken into the County Courts or not, and subjected to additional expense, will not matter a pin as to the ultimate result. Let us, they say, have a fair re-adjustment of the incidence of the tax. They say they consider this a national property—

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member this is not a Second Reading Debate. I understand that he proposes to move an Instruction as to the method of calculating the averages.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I quite feel the justice of your observation, Sir, but I venture to think that under the circumstances I am not unduly travelling beyond the scope of the Instruction. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the general question, he must confine himself to the specific Instruction.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Perfectly so, Sir; I was only pointing out why I suggest a re-adjustment by indicating the exact position of the tenant farmer, and until I am able to point out the position of the tenant farmer under the new conditions of the Bill, I venture to submit, with the greatest respect, that it is impossible for me to say why the re-adjustment ought to come.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the Bill generally.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Then, Sir, to what extent may I be allowed to put before the House the grounds for re-adjustment? I am proposing at once to deal with the nature of the incidence of the tax under the existing law. As the House is no doubt aware the present incidence of the tax—

with the question. The House has discussed that, and has now to deal with a specific Instruction to the Committee.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I express myself I am afraid awkwardly, Sir. I may point out that the method of adjusting the tithe as based on a seven years' average was fixed in the Act of 1836. In that year the price was taken of the three staple products wheat, barley and oats, and, according to the then calculation, it was estimated that dividing £100 into equal proportions of £33 6s. 8d., that 94 bushels of wheat, 168 bushels of barley and 242 bushels of oats could be purchased for £33 6s. 8d. This was the process which was considered to be a permanent settlement in 1836. I will give a few instances of how this operates. We take the year 1886, which is the last year for which details are available, and we find that the tenant for every £100 he paid in 1836 would pay £87 in 1886—a very large reduction no doubt, and it will be said the average must consequently be a fair one. But I think nobody who has studied the subject at all, and certainly no agricultural tenant who has had to go into the matter, can fail to see that this very unfairly represents the effect of the agricultural depression throughout the kingdom. Instead of a reduction of 13 per cent the reduction should have been 20, 30, and even 50 per cent. It was very well put by a writer in the Quarterly Review for 1888, who dealt with the subject in a broad and comprehensive way, though not so liberally as I should like; the article was evidently written by a Churchman. The writer stated that so long as the tenant occupied the land for a short term or from year to year, and the average was calculated on the longer period, the tenant was unfairly treated. The writer goes on to indicate the methods by which reductions might be made gradually with comparatively small loss to the tithe owners, but with these I need not trouble the House. Of course it is not my business here, and it would be presumptuous on my part, to lay down any detailed bases of re-adjustment. All I want to do is to ask the House to tell the Committee that some new method of payment by the tenant farmer is necessary. It is clear the seven years' average has not brought down the tithe for non-payment of tithe should be made absolutely impossible—

“That judgment recovered for any such sum may be executed against all personal property, on which a distress for the sum could at the date of execution be levied, but shall not be executed in any other manner.”

That would absolutely exclude imprisonment, and it would also prevent the judgment being levied except on the same goods to which the distress applied. There is no doubt about it, and I am really surprised that my hon. and learned Friend, for whose opinion I have a great respect, could have come to any other conclusion. I am quite sure we shall, if necessary, accept his assistance with regard to the clause, because the intention of the Government was most clearly expressed by the Home Secretary on the Second Reading.

*MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Sir, this Instruction attempts to widen the provisions of the Bill, for the reason which the Home Secretary gave, that the question of tithe is a vexed and complicated one, only to be legislated upon after long and careful inquiry and in all its bearings. Now, in disturbing the settlement of 1836, it ought to be in the interests of all parties concerned, and not in a one-sided, irritating, and futile manner. My second reason for voting for the Instruction is, that the Home Secretary, in reply to the hon. Member for Sussex, said:—“Before you can have any redemption, you must have a fair and equitable valuation.” If that is so, he deals by that argument a deadly blow at his own Bill. Until you have a thorough settlement, which would make the valuation of the tithe general, you have no right to come to this House and ask it to pass a peddling and tinkering measure. The third reason is this: My hon. Friend asks the House to deal with the question of redemption on an equitable basis. It is carried on now, first of all, on an unfair valuation of the tithe, and, secondly, upon a still unfaire application of the tithe. In any redemption scheme brought before the House, there must be kept in view, first of all, that the first charge upon the land shall be general and fair, so that there shall be no irritation; and secondly, that the application of it shall be in accordance with the desires and wishes of the people concerned. This leads me to the fourth reason why I vote for the Instruction. Let hon. Members jeer as they may, it is perfectly true that the Welsh people—at any rate, an overwhelming majority of the Liberals and the peasantry of Wales—look upon this tithe as sacred in a sense to be used for the purposes of the whole nation. If you bring forward only this small measure, which does not include an equitable settlement of the question, you will increase fourfold the irritation which exists in Wales with regard to the application of the tithe. You are only making the people more stubborn; you will make their opposition more prolonged and bitter, and you will endanger what we consider to be a national property. This opposition would become so strong and stubborn that they would come to look upon the impost as a hateful one, to be done away with, instead of a great national property which should be made available for national purposes. For these four reasons, Sir, I support the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 138.—(Div. List, No. 296.)

MR. C. GRAY: Mr. Speaker, the Instruction which I have to move is one which must meet really with the approval of the majority of hon. Members. We have heard among the reasons for the Bill that the clergy should be relieved from their dreadful position. I sympathise with poverty at whatever door it lies; but if I recollect the distressed condition of certain of the clergy in Wales, I must also carry my mind back to the distress which the tenant farmers have suffered during the last 12 years. If hon. Members only knew the terrible times that the tenant farmer of England has had to go through, they would surely recognise that every question which affects him is worthy the attention of the House. We have been told that certain clergymen are unable to educate their children, and have to resort to the eating of bacon. I am very sorry that such should be the case, but I know that thousands of British farmers have had to resort to fare no better than that during the past 10 or 12 years. I think the least we can do now, seeing that we have got so far along with this wretched, pitiful, and mean Bill, is to lay the onus on the shoulders of the landlord. I would only say, in conclusion, that if it is impossible to make my Instruction apply to existing contracts, I should be inclined to accept the proposal that it should apply to future contracts. I appeal to the House to remember the tenant farmers, however anxious it may be to better the position of some of the clergy.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide that the Charge be recoverable from the landlord only."—(Mr. Gray.)

MR. MATTHEWS: Sir, the Government could not accept the Instruction in the form in which it has been moved. Under this Bill the occupier of the land is to be made the defendant in legal proceedings arising out of the non-payment of tithe, because that is the only way of tying down the remedy to the same goods as could now be legally seized under distress. If the County Court proceedings are brought against the landlord directly, it would be impossible to execute a judgment upon the titheable produce upon the land. My hon. Friend seems to agree that where a tenant farmer has contracted to pay the tithe it would not be right to set the contract aside. In Committee I should be ready to propose a clause prohibiting any contracting out of the scheme of things that would exist after this Bill was passed. The tenant farmer would then be entitled, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary, to deduct from his rent any tithe paid by him. Under proceedings for the recovery of tithe rent-charge titheable goods ought only to be seized. If the landlord be made the defendant, and proceedings are taken directly against him, the remedy of the plaintiff could only be exercised by the cumbrous process of appointing a Receiver to stop the rent, or by attaching goods which are not titheable. The real purpose is through the occupier to get at the rent, and therefore at the landlord.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Sir, I think that in the last Division the House has given a very significant Instruction to the Government. This Bill has purposely been postponed to a very late period of the Session—to a period when the influence of the Government is almost supreme, and yet they have received a severe check. The County Members apparently have failed to come to town in the numbers expected by the Government. How can the County Members support the Government in the course they are pursuing? Is not this a Bill for County-Courting all the tenant farmers in England and Wales? The Home Secretary said, "We will not County Court the future tenant farmers." But the people who have to consider this question are the present tenant farmers. With respect to them there is to be no relaxation of the law, but universal County-Courting. According to the Home Secretary, the clergy must get at the landlord through the tenant farmer. Why? If the landlord is the man who is to pay ultimately, why should he not be made to pay directly? On a former occasion the Government tried to place the charge where it ought to be—upon the landlord's shoulders; but immediately there was an insurrection of the landowners, though they called themselves the farmers' friends. When the method of levying tithe was to be altered, when a new summary remedy was to be provided, the landowners in this House at once cried out, "Do not make us suffer," and the Bill was drummed out of the House. My hon. and learned Friend (Sir W. Barttelot) is a most valuable representative of the landowners, and he told the hon. Member for Maldon that his Instruction could not be listened to for a moment. No; but you are quite willing to lay a burden on the tenant farmers in the interests of the starving clergy. The Home Secretary promises that under all future contracts the tenant will be entitled to deduct the tithe from his rent; but that is no consolation to the tenant farmers who are now suffering. It has not been found difficult to relieve people in Ireland in spite of existing contracts, and the tenant farmers of England will certainly ask for equal relief. The only proper way to deal with this question will be to put the charge upon the owner of the land, and not upon the temporary occupant. It is all very well to say the tithe is only to be levied upon the produce of the land. In my opinion, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, the Member for Staffordshire, was perfectly right in saying that, as your Bill stands, the tax will not fall on the produce. The Home Secretary knows perfectly well that if this Bill is not to have the operation the hon. Member for Staffordshire sketched it must be very seriously altered. I do not, however, insist on that point. I insist on the point raised by the hon. Member for Maldon, whether the County Representatives in this House who call themselves the farmers' friends and who claim to represent the tenant farmers of England are going to subject the tenant farmers to a County Court action for the first time. If that is their intention I only hope they may succeed for the present, and I am sure they will not succeed in the future. The three acres and a cow was a joke to this Tithe Bill. A more monstrous proposal I have never heard of in my life. I think some of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will laugh the wrong side of their mouths if this Bill passes. The Government are in the interest of the titheowner imposing an additional burden in the form of an additional remedy. They have the opportunity of choosing upon which of two parties that burden should be fastened, and they have chosen the tenant-farmer. That is their position, and I am satisfied that they should take up that position, for it will make the injustice of their claim to be the farmers' friends as conspicuous now as it has been on former occasions. For our part, we have no objection, and will be very happy to take issue with the Government upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon—an Amendment which is founded absolutely in justice and in policy—namely, that if there is to be this additional remedy, it ought to be placed upon the person to whom the rent is really owing; that is, the owner of the land on which the tithe is paid. No doubt, according to that neither owner nor occupier is liable, but the rent would, as you have chosen to say that it shall be treated as a debt recoverable on the land by distress. The alteration proposed by the Bill is a vital alteration in point of law. Is it that the tithe is no longer a charge on the land, but a debt recoverable by personal action, against whom personal action to be brought? Against the temporary occupier or the permanent owner? Gentlemen on the other side—the country gentlemen of England who call themselves the farmers' friends—say, “We won't have the action brought against us; we insist on its being brought against the temporary occupier.” This is the issue that Her Majesty's Government have chosen to raise between themselves and the agricultural interest on the 12th of August. I wish them joy of their sagacity. It signifies very little what majority they may have on this Amendment. It is an Amendment on the policy and justice of which the country will have to decide.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I think the Government can afford to pass by the judgment already pronounced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby in what he called his explanation of their sagacity; but, at any rate, as the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to make one of those speeches with which the House is now becoming familiar, he might in fairness have considered what the real position is, and what is the change contemplated in the Bill. Of course, we know that he is only answerable for himself; but when the right hon. Gentleman professed to speak as the legitimate leader of a united Opposition, he would do well to inform himself of the position of affairs at the present time. At the present time, as the right hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well, tithe is levied by means of distress. That distress does not touch the owner, and does not enable the tithe receiver to go against the landed proprietor in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman said the only remedy ought to be available. It is strange that it has not occurred to the right hon. Gentleman or his Party to bring in a measure which would shift the liability to be proceeded against from the tenant to the owner of the land. Let us consider for a few moments what is the position of affairs. There are a certain number of people who can pay tithe and will not pay. This Bill is not directed against the honest farmer, who knows the tithe is a legal debt, and who is willing to pay if he can, but against those persons who allege that they believe they ought not to pay tithe because, as they suggest, the purpose to which the tithe is put are not those for which it was originally intended. But what is the position of the Government. Her Majesty's Government believe there is a great deal of trouble, annoyance, and expense connected with the levying of distress. It is admitted to be an obsolete, troublesome remedy which gives rise to a great deal of exasperation and feeling, and the Government are of opinion that all this may be avoided by a simpler procedure. The scope of this Bill simply is that, instead of having to resort to distress, the tithe receiver shall be allowed to sue the tenant in the County Court. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby knows perfectly well that any annoyance that has to be suffered at the present time is suffered by the tenant and not by the owner. It is simply desired, in the interests of those who are anxious to protect their own property, to render the means by which the tithe can be collected cheap, effective, and simple, and free from that friction which is so annoying in connection with the present method of levying distress. If by this Bill you were to make the landlords liable to be pursued, what would be the result? Has the right hon. Gentleman forgotten that to do that would be to put an end to all existing contracts? The hon. Member for Maldon has said that if Her Majesty's Government cannot agree to the landowner being held responsible in respect of existing contracts he will accept the justice of that plea. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby talks about justice and injustice; but I would like to know how he could justify a clause which would put an end to existing contracts by providing in the effect that the landowner shall pay the tithe in all instances. He knows perfectly well he could not have supported any such scheme, and he also knows perfectly well that what he denounced as a more monstrous proposal than anything he had ever heard of is simply a proposal whereby a certain number of the clergy who do not now receive their tithes are likely to get them without any additional burden being put upon the back of the tenant. I am perfectly certain that my hon. Friends behind me who are in favour of redemption are also in favour of this scheme for the purpose of putting an end to a difficult question in the interests of the tenant farmers. If the House is to be led to a conclusion, it will not be by such speeches as that we have just listened to. It will be rather by considering whether or not this Bill will remove this matter from the atmosphere of discussion, from the atmosphere of agitation, and from the atmosphere of that kind of disturbance which generally gathers round the levying of distress, by substituting for it a remedy in those cases in which it is not the tenant unable to pay who resists payment, but the tenant who can pay, but from wrong motives desires to make the collection of tithes as troublesome as possible. The Home Secretary has told the House what are the intentions of the Government, and I say it does not redound to the credit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby when he delivers speeches which do not give a fair representation of the policy of the Government or of the means by which they propose to carry it out.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I will ask the House to consider where we are now and what the proposed alteration of the law will lead us to. The House will remember that on the Second Reading of this Bill I called the attention of the House to the words of Lord Salisbury—namely, "At the present time the tenant is subjected to inconvenience in respect of a debt that is not his own." Those were the words of Lord Salisbury, and I contend that under the existing law of this land the tenant-farmer is not legally liable for the payment of the tithe rent-charge. I say, secondly, that the owner of the land is not legally liable for the payment of tithe rent-charge; and, thirdly, that the only entity which is legally liable is the produce of the specific land from which it was raised. There is also this peculiarity in the existing law, that the legislation in 1837 did provide that when the tithe was levied on the produce the tenant, unless some contract existed to the contrary, should have the right to deduct the amount so paid from his rent. There is also this difference between tithe rent charge and Income Tax, that whereas in the case of Income Tax the landlord and tenant are absolutely prohibited from contracting themselves out of the Act, there is no such provision in the Tithe Act. Accordingly the landowners of England have as a rule—I do not say rightly or wrongly—contracted themselves out of the Act. They have, in fact, done what they tried to do with the income-tax until they were prevented by the Legislature. Now the Government say that the present arrangement is unsatisfactory. The Attorney General says that a large number of the clergy are deprived of their tithes. On the other hand, he says that a large number of tenant farmers will not pay though they can. So the Government propose some other remedy. What is that remedy? If the intentions of the Home Secretary are carried out—and the Opposition will do their utmost to see that they are—the only effect of the change will be to substitute the County Court bailiff for the landlord's bailiff. This is a worthless measure, so far as the clergy are concerned. But this is not the Bill as it stands at present. It goes a great deal further and imposes a new liability on the tenant, and the Attorney General defends it because he says the tenant can pay and will not pay, and the Government will make him pay. That, of course, means that the Government cannot now make the tenant pay, but will do so by the present Bill. As the hon. Member for Essex says, the Bill is going to make somebody personally liable who was not personally liable before. Accordingly, the hon. Member is moving an Instruction to make that somebody the owner of the land. The Government decline to accept that Instruction, on the ground that though so far as future contracts are concerned the landlord ought to be made liable, this principle cannot be applied to present contracts. But the Instruction itself does not say that in every case the landlord shall be liable. The Committee will take care that no injustice was done, and this Instruction provides that when we get the Bill into Committee we shall have power to deal with the chargeability of landlords in respect of this tax. It will then be possible to limit the remedy in any way that may seem desirable. The tenant farmer has a right to say—"If you impose this new personal burden you must consider my case as well as that of the tithe owner." You cannot shut your eyes to the real grievances of the tenant farmer—the unfairness of the mode of assessment; the unfairness of averages; the amount required to pay for the produce of a farm taken at a price which cannot be obtained. I see no reason why the Instruction should not be accepted. The Government is imposing a new liability; but those who oppose the Bill are quite content to go on as now. If the tenant is left alone we have nothing to say in the matter. But if the Government are going to interfere with the tenant then we claim an equal right to interfere with the landlords.

MR. H. WIGGIN (Staffordshire, Handsworth): I have travelled 100 miles to oppose this Bill as strongly as possible. As a loyal supporter of the Government, I deeply regret that they have not seen their way to withdraw this Bill and bring in a stronger measure next Session dealing with the whole question, including the redemption of the tithe. The redemption of the tithe would relieve both landlord and tenant of an unpleasant burden. If the last Division had been delayed a few minutes the majority of the Government would have been reduced by six or seven, and the next Division may have a very different result. I do implore the Government to drop the measure this Session and deal with the question next year, so as to give permanent relief both to landlord and to tenant.

MR. A. F. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I quite agree that the landlord ought to be made responsible, and that was no doubt the intention of the Act of 1836, but if you do make the landlords responsible, I do not know how you can come down on his personal property in the event of non-payment of the tithe, unless you put in clauses to provide for that, and that course of procedure might lead to the loss of the Bill. I do not think much of the Bill, and if we allow the Bill to pass I trust that the Government will promise to bring in a Bill making the landlord properly responsible. At the same time, I hope a Bill will soon be introduced for the redemption of the tithe, which is the only way out of the difficulty.

MR. W. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): As I understand it, the Home Secretary engages to introduce a clause into the Bill which will make it impossible in the future for the landlords to contract themselves out of the payment of the tithe. Now, I wish to ask the Attorney General what will be the effect if the promise of the Home Secretary is carried out in the case of tenancies which are from year to year? A great part of the land of the country is held on yearly tenancy.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It would be at the option of the tenant to give six months' notice in order to obtain more favourable terms from the landlord.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I wish to say a few words in support of the Instruction, as I have an Amendment on the Paper which cannot be moved unless the Instruction, or something like it, is carried. I am anxious for a speedy and satisfactory settlement of this question. It has been generally admitted that the only practical remedy short of general redemption is to make the tithe recoverable from the landlord. Many of those who, like myself, take this view object to the Bill because it is a step in the wrong direction, and, if passed, will be an obstacle to future settlement. Two years ago the Government themselves passed through the House of Lords a Bill making the charge recoverable from the landlord. Even in last year's Bill they recognised the principle which is contained in the Tithe Commutation Act—namely, that the tithe was to be payable directly or indirectly by the landlord. We know that under the Tithe Commutation Act landlords and tenants began by very generally contracting themselves out of the terms of that Act. But I believe that in recent years in many parts of the country, including certain portions of Wales, there has been an alteration in this system, and that there is now a growing practice on the part of the more sensible and liberal landowners to pay the tithe themselves. I feel certain that if this measure is passed as it stands it will do a great deal to discourage this growing and salutary practice. Again, I feel certain that this measure will tend to postpone the settlement of the question by future legislation. It is not merely that this measure, though a partial and tentative measure, tends to take away the pressure of responsibility from the shoulders of the Government to deal satisfactorily and completely with the subject; but it is that this measure, whatever be its exact extent, places a new liability on the shoulders of the occupier of the land; and I cannot believe that the present Government, after legislating in this direction this year, will next year be prepared to legislate in what is practically a contrary direction, that is to say, propose to settle the tithe question by placing a new liability on the shoulders of the owner of the land. I firmly believe the passing of this Bill will tend to delay the eventual settlement of the question, and not only that, but that it will also tend to discourage redemption.

*MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg pardon for trespassing beyond the limits of the discussion. I am quite content to leave my argument as it stands—namely, that it is better for all parties that if any change is to be made in the mode of recovering tithe the tithe should be recoverable from the landowner, and not from the occupier of the land, with due regard, of course, to existing contracts.

*MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): Two of the Representatives of the County of Essex have taken a prominent part in moving Instructions to the Committee, and I confess I feel some difficulty upon the present occasion. I agreed in principle with the hon. Member for Saffron Walden that there should be some scheme for redemption of the tithe rent-charge, and I also agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon that the burden of the tithe should be placed on the landowner. But I also wish to see this Bill passed. [Cries of "Why?"] Because I think the Government would be wanting in their duty if they did not endeavour to secure the payment of just debts to the owners of property in Wales. The incidence of tithe is a landowner's question, and it quite true that landlords have contracted themselves out of the Act of 1836 by agreements with their tenants. A change in the law to prevent this for the future is now proposed by the Government. I am perfectly willing to see tithe placed in the same position that Income Tax is placed at the present moment—namely, that the tenant, having paid the tithe, should be able to deduct it from his rent to the landlord; and I believe if that were done—and I understand the Home Secretary undertakes to carry that object into effect by clauses introduced in Committee—we should hear no more of the tithe difficulty. On this understanding I shall support the Government on the present occasion.

*MR. T. ELLIS: I desire to call the attention of the House to the declaration of the last speaker. He wishes to throw to the winds every declaration he has made in favour of redemption, and of putting the tithe on the landowner; in fact, he desires to break all his pledges to his constituents in order to strike a blow at the peasantry of Wales. That is the key and the clue to most of the arguments advanced from the opposite Benches. The Government, by bringing forward this Bill, propose to change the whole spirit and procedure and method of the Act of 1836; instead of making tithe a tax upon the produce of the land, they make it a personal debt upon the tenant. That is straight against the declaration of the Prime Minister, and straight against the wishes of their friends. I hope the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) and his supporters, will not run away from their own declarations and their own Amendment, but allow the Government to act on the policy of scuttle, which is the chief characteristic of their present policy. The Prime Minister stated, in 1887, that, "tithe is a debt of the owner in respect of the produce of the land," and in 1888 he said "the occupier is not a debtor, and he is to suffer the inconvenience of a distraint for a debt which is not his own;" not merely is he to suffer the inconvenience of a debt which is not his own, but he is now to suffer all the pains and penalties of the County Court, and the distraint which will come from the Court, and all the heavy expenses, and, in the bargain, if he refuses compliance, he is to be gazetted as an ordinary debtor under the rules of the County Court. The Prime Minister paid us a compliment; he came down to Carnarvon to teach the Welsh people their duty with respect to tithe. He said:—

"I wish to ask those who are desirous of considering this question impartially to remember that tithe is really a burden, not upon the tenant, but upon the landowner, and if the tenant has been obliged to pay, it has been owing to a blunder in the law."

Mr. Round

And now you wish to stereotype this blunder in the law. The noble Marquess added—

"We are anxious to pass a measure which shall place it on the shoulder of the debtor, that is to say, on the landowner."

That is, that the landowner who owes the tithe shall be the man to pay. The Government by refusing to accept the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Maldon are running away and scuttling from the declaration of the Prime Minister. It seems, too, that they are running away from the wishes of their friends, the Welsh clergy. The Welsh clergy have sent to the Government from time to time very strong and urgent representations that the majority of them are starving, that is to say, the clergy of the richest church in Christendom are starving. They say, "We want two great amendments in the law: first of all, we want tithe to be a debt recoverable through the County Court; and, secondly, we want to make the true debtors pay—namely, the landlords." The Government are trying to please their friends, and at the same time to break the spirit of the Act of 1836. They want to put the pains and penalties upon the occupiers, and at the same time to let the real debtors go free. The Government themselves brought in two Bills in the House of Lords, one of the chief provisions of each being that the debt should be put on the landowners. I admit that very many of the Members for Wales were against putting the debt upon the landlords, and for the reason that we desire to have a complete settlement of this question and not a tinkering settlement. I maintain that this is a dishonest attempt to settle this question by merely evading it. There is a further reason why I ask my hon. Friends to stick to their guns. In Wales the clergy are the chaplains of the landlords and not of the people. Let the landlords pay for their own chaplains.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman appears to be under the impression that the Government are not true to the principles which they have already announced in another place. Only a few minutes ago my right hon. Friend distinctly stated that the Government accept the principle that in the future there shall be no contracting out of the Act as it stands. That is to say, that neither the landlords nor the tenants shall be at liberty to contract themselves out of the Act of 1837, and that the liability shall rest in all cases of new contract with the landlord alone. The Government propose to insert in the Bill a clause to the effect that Clause 80 of the Act of 1837, which prescribes that the tenant shall be entitled to deduct the tithe from his rent, shall have full effect notwithstanding any contract made after the passing of this Act, and every contract made after the passing of the Act shall, so far as it is to the contrary, be void. That clause will entitle every tenant to deduct on all fresh contracts the tithe from his rent. But what my hon. Friend proposes is that the tenant who has contracted to pay the tithe, notwithstanding the consideration which he has received in the rent which was fixed by the landlord, shall be entitled to deduct the tithe from the rent. That appears to the Government to be simple dishonesty. What we say is, that in future contracts the tenants and the landlords shall not contract themselves out of the Act of 1837. We propose that that shall be the law of the land as to tithe, as it is the law of the land as to the Income Tax.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Let me call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that, under the Act of 1836, it is the duty of the landlord to pay the tithe. But they have not done so. When the right hon. Gentleman talks of dishonesty, I think he should put the saddle on the right horse. Dishonesty is on the side of the landlords, and not on the side of the tenants. We are having a very fine object lesson to-night. We shall see who are the real friends of the farmers. Those who are anxious to be the farmers' friends will vote in favour of putting this burden on the landowners.

MR. GRAY: With the permission of the House I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question. It is, what will be done in the case of the rent not being sufficient to cover the tithe—how in that case will the tenant be able to deduct the tithe from the rent?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That difficulty occurs now. If the tithe is not earned and produced by the land it is not payable.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) stated just now that I, addressing the Home Secretary, said "We will hold you to the bargain—namely, that the landlords are not to pay, but the tenants are to pay." I never said anything of the kind. The House will bear witness as to what I said. I said to the Government "We will hold you to the bargain with respect to imprisonment, and the distraint upon the land." I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman is not anxious to make a statement that is not correct.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I referred to was the hon. and gallant Baronet's emphatic statement that he held the Government to the declaration that they would oppose all Instructions. He will remember he called upon the Government to reject all Instructions, and he cited specially the Instruction of the hon. Member for Malden.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: My remark had reference to those two particular questions. I happen to have 24 or 25 farms, and I have paid tithe in respect of 21 of them. Two of the remaining three or four are held by men who do not wish to have the tithe paid for them.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: May I ask you, Sir, whether it would be competent for the First Lord of the Treasury to move the new clause he has just read, if the House rejects the present Instruction?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: On the point of order, may I point out that the Instruction is that tithe is to be recoverable from the landlord only.

*MR. SPEAKER: The point is one for the Chairman of Committees to decide. I imagine, however, that if the Chairman of Committees is of opinion that the clause could not be inserted in Committee, the Bill could be re-committed for the purpose of inserting it.

MR. SALT (Stafford): It seems to me that the difference between the Government and the hon. Member for Malden is very small indeed. Could we not put the Instruction in such a form that the Government could accept it? The hon. Member proposed that the tithe rent recoverable should be thrown on the landlord. I am certain five-sixths of the Members of the House wish that that should be so. The only question is can it be done subject to existing contracts. It appears to me obvious that any provision to this effect which is inserted in the Bill must be subject to existing contracts.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I am not quite sure that the mind of the House is clear about this Instruction. There are two words in the Instruction which appear to me very significant—the word “recoverable” and the word “only,” and if the Instruction is carried the principle will be laid down that the Committee would have power to provide that the recovery of the tithe, that is the getting of the tithe, is to be instituted against the landlord and against him alone. I do not think that in consequence of an Instruction of this kind the Committee would be at all precluded from safeguarding any rights under existing contracts. What I understand is suggested by the Home Secretary is that he will put in the Bill a clause providing that though the process of recovery given by the Bill is against the tenant, the tenant shall always have power to deduct the tithe from the rent. That is a very different thing to recovery from the landlord. I wish to draw a distinction between the two processes, and I must own it does occur to me there are cases in which the rent is not equal to the tithe.

The House divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 145.—(Div. List, No. 297.)

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I have now to move—

“That it be an instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses providing for a re-adjustment of the method for taking the tithe rent-charge averages.”

I will endeavour to remember the necessary limitations imposed upon us at this stage, and avoid anything that can be construed into a Second Reading Debate, but it is absolutely impossible to bring before the House the arguments in favour of a re-adjustment of the method of taking tithe averages without, to a certain extent, dealing historically with the whole question. In the first place I would remind the House that in 1836, there was what was considered a statutory settlement of the question of the tithe-charge, its incidence and adjustment from time to time. Lord John Russell, in his speech on the Second Reading of the Bill of 1836, spoke of it as a permanent settlement for all future

time. But that distinguished statesman once or twice made great mistakes in his use of the word finality. At all events the Government of to-day have for the first time—except in some trifling matters of procedure—re-opened the whole question, and that in the interest of one party, only the clergy. They have in fact brought in a Clergy Tithe Relief Bill. I am showing the ground for my Instruction, when I say that gives a claim to all concerned to come into this High Court and ask that their just claims shall be considered. In moving this Instruction, I will venture to say, I do so in the interest of the whole of the tenant farmers of the kingdom, though personally and peculiarly on this occasion I represent the Principality of Wales. Still it touches the whole of the great agricultural community to whom the tillage of the soil of the kingdom is entrusted. Speaking on a previous instruction, the Attorney General said this Bill provides a remedy in the matter of procedure at once cheap, easy, and effective, while it would impose no additional burdens. We dispute this altogether. There is every reason to fear that it will be neither cheap nor easy, and I will venture to prophecy it will not be effective, while it certainly will impose very heavy additional burdens. So I say on behalf of the tenant farmers of Wales, and I might say so on behalf of the tenant farmers of the whole kingdom, that if you are going to make this a primary objection on every tenant farmer throughout the kingdom, making the tenant liable to County Court process with all its incident expenses, surely the tenant farmers have a right to come here and demand a fair adjustment of the burden. They say relieve us from what is admitted on all hands to be an imposition according to the present method of adjustment which, in the present condition of things, works great hardship on the tenant and here he was indicating my fellow countrymen—to apply to those who were able to pay, but who pretend that they object to pay on conscientious grounds; and, again, he alluded to those who refused to pay from motives not creditable. I repudiate that as unjust in the last degree. I repeat what I have already said, that there are no people in the kingdom more willing to pay just tithes for a just purpose than the Welsh people. There is nothing more unjust than to say that they wish to evade their proper payment. What they do say is that whether they are taken into the County Courts or not, and subjected to additional expense, will not matter a pin as to the ultimate result. Let us, they say, have a fair re-adjustment of the incidence of the tax. They say they consider this a national property—

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member this is not a Second Reading Debate. I understand that he proposes to move an Instruction as to the method of calculating the averages.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I quite feel the justice of your observation, Sir, but I venture to think that under the circumstances I am not unduly travelling beyond the scope of the Instruction. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the general question, he must confine himself to the specific Instruction.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Perfectly so, Sir; I was only pointing out why I suggest a re-adjustment by indicating the exact position of the tenant farmer, and until I am able to point out the position of the tenant farmer under the new conditions of the Bill, I venture to submit, with the greatest respect, that it is impossible for me to say why the re-adjustment ought to come.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the Bill generally.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Then, Sir, to what extent may I be allowed to put before the House the grounds for re-adjustment? I am proposing at once to deal with the nature of the incidence of the tax under the existing law. As the House is no doubt aware the present incidence of the tax—

with the question. The House has discussed that, and has now to deal with a specific Instruction to the Committee.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I express myself I am afraid awkwardly, Sir. I may point out that the method of adjusting the tithe as based on a seven years' average was fixed in the Act of 1836. In that year the price was taken of the three staple products wheat, barley and oats, and, according to the then calculation, it was estimated that dividing £100 into equal proportions of £33 6s. 8d., that 94 bushels of wheat, 168 bushels of barley and 242 bushels of oats could be purchased for £33 6s. 8d. This was the process which was considered to be a permanent settlement in 1836. I will give a few instances of how this operates. We take the year 1886, which is the last year for which details are available, and we find that the tenant for every £100 he paid in 1836 would pay £87 in 1886—a very large reduction no doubt, and it will be said the average must consequently be a fair one. But I think nobody who has studied the subject at all, and certainly no agricultural tenant who has had to go into the matter, can fail to see that this very unfairly represents the effect of the agricultural depression throughout the kingdom. Instead of a reduction of 13 per cent the reduction should have been 20, 30, and even 50 per cent. It was very well put by a writer in the Quarterly Review for 1888, who dealt with the subject in a broad and comprehensive way, though not so liberally as I should like; the article was evidently written by a Churchman. The writer stated that so long as the tenant occupied the land for a short term or from year to year, and the average was calculated on the longer period, the tenant was unfairly treated. The writer goes on to indicate the methods by which reductions might be made gradually with comparatively small loss to the tithe owners, but with these I need not trouble the House. Of course it is not my business here, and it would be presumptuous on my part, to lay down any detailed bases of re-adjustment. All I want to do is to ask the House to tell the Committee that some new method of payment by the tenant farmer is necessary. It is clear the seven years' average has not brought down the tithe rent-charge to anything like the proportion of the reductions of rent throughout the kingdom. If it were so the reduction for 1886 would be 25 per cent. and the figure would stand at £75 instead of £87 10s. Surely it would be reasonable to adjust payment on the basis of the previous year's prices, and that would be coming within a reasonable distance of the reductions made in consequence of the agricultural depression. Now, even if we took the previous year's prices as a basis of re-adjustment, what does the House think would be the immediate result to the tenant farmers of the whole kingdom? Why, it would relieve them to the extent of £500,000 a year. If in 1887 the tithe payer—the tenant farmer—had been dealt with on the principle I am explaining, he would have paid £500,000 less to the parochial clergy. Conceive what an enormous saving that would be to the struggling tenant; and, coming to my native country, if that re-adjustment were made to-morrow on the basis of the prices of 1887, the tenant farmer in Wales would be relieved to the extent of £35,000 a year. Only those who know the small peasantry of Merionethshire or Montgomeryshire, and of the North of Wales, only those who know how small are the holdings of these people, and how poorly they live, can appreciate how great a blessing that relief of £35,000 a year would be. I shall be told that this reduction would be a great hardship on the rural clergy. I quite feel the hardship of the case of the small rural clergy, particularly in Wales. There is no doubt that their struggle is a hard one. About a year ago there were some letters in the Guardian newspaper, written by Mr. Protheroe, who gave rather exaggerated accounts of the difficulties which agricultural depression has produced on the rural clergy. In the Midlands, where the clergy have exchanged their tithes for land, most disastrous consequences have followed. Owing to the depression of the past 12 years, rents have fallen 23 to 50 per cent. Mr. Protheroe says—

"The clergy feel the pinch of poverty, not, perhaps, in its acutest form of absolute starvation, but in the loss of these, so called, comforts, or luxuries, which, to people in their position, are so necessary."

He goes on to say that he knows glebe owners, who, but for the assistance of their friends, would have been literally, and without metaphor, starving. No doubt these are very hard and sad cases, and, of course, they are worthy of the consideration of those who belong to the same faith, and who have wealth and means, and who come forward at times with friendly assistance to save the poor clergy from absolute destitution; but I have another client whom I am bound to represent. I sympathise with the poor clergymen when this time of depression comes on; but there are others, and a larger number, for whom I must plead, who are even more terribly affected by agricultural depression. I refer to the small tenant farmers who have had a small capital which has gradually become exhausted; who have been paying tithes which, if they had been fairly adjusted, having regard to the condition of agriculture, would have been 20 or 25 per cent less. These people are entitled to the sympathy of the House and to our legislative interference, if we are to interfere at all. That is my case for the tenant farmers. I say it is only justice and common fairness that when you begin breaking a contract in favour of one class, you should break it also in favour of the other. I regret to see in a circular issued from a palace in North Wales, and written to urge the passing of this Bill, the statement that if it does not pass it will mean the simple starvation of a large number of the Welsh clergy. I say if we pass this Bill without re-adjustment it will mean simply the starvation of many tenants, who will be deprived not of the luxuries but of the necessities of life—of butter, bread, and cheese, for that is what they have been living on. I read with pain the words written by a Bishop of the richest religious body in the whole world. I say it is not fair.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not touching on the question before the House.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I beg pardon. I fear I have been carried away by my feelings, but I submit I received some provocation from the Attorney General. I will conclude by strongly urging the House not to disregard the appeal I make on behalf of the tenant farmers throughout the kingdom.

Mr. Arthur Williams

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses providing for a re-adjustment of the method for taking the Tithe Rent-Charge averages."—(Mr. Arthur Williams.)

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I will only detain the House for a few moments. The hon. Member has come down with what was apparently a set speech and has thought fit to put words into my mouth which I never used. I said not one single word about Wales. I never referred to Wales. I referred to those who were able to pay tithes and would not.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I took the hon. and learned Gentleman's words down at the moment—"those who are able to pay but who refuse to pay on conscientious grounds from motives not the most creditable."

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I never referred to Wales directly or indirectly. The hon. Member says I referred to his own constituency, but I did nothing of the kind. As to the question of averages raised by the hon. Member, no one denies that the matter is one which should be inquired into, but the hon. Member has quite forgotten that when it was the interest of those who pay tithes to go by the seven years' average—when they were in the full swing of paying far less than if the last year's prices were taken—they said not a word—I do not complain of their conduct—to the effect that they are anxious for a reassessment. They wait until they feel the pinch before they cry out. I am not in the least suggesting or advocating seven years. I take it that the House has not got the materials before it on which it can decide whether it shall be three years or one year or more. The scale we now have has practically worked for 50 years, and it is only now hon. Members find it is working hardship. Does the hon. Member suggest that this House will, without much further inquiry and much greater knowledge of what is best, alter the old scale? The hon. Member does not make a single suggestion except that last year's average should be taken, and yet he knows as well as I do that some people recommend that a three years' average shall be taken, and other people recommend different systems. Surely he should have been prepared with the details of a practical suggestion. It would be unfair to the House to enter into the topics with which the hon. Member has adorned his speech. He has merely complained that the tenants object to seven years' averages. The Government know that this matter should be inquired into, but it would be utterly impossible in the scope of this discussion to determine what system should be substituted for the present. They do not consider themselves expressing an opinion in favour of the existing system, and they must be understood as declining to pledge themselves as to what they think would be the proper method. I do not think, under these circumstances, the discussion can lead to any useful result.

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I rise to support the Instruction moved by my hon. friend the Member for South Glamorgan. I support it on the ground of simple justice. The arguments used by my hon. Friend are simply unanswerable. He demonstrated how very unjustly the seven years' averages have operated on the tithe payers for the last few years. Every hon. Member knows that during the last seven years prices of cereal produce have continually declined, wheat having gone down from 50s. a quarter to 28s. or 29s., and it is therefore hardly necessary to point out how cruelly this has operated upon a peasantry who have to pay tithes 20 per cent above the prices they can obtain for their produce. The experience of my own constituency has brought most forcibly to my mind the injustice, I might almost say cruelty, of the seven years' average; and mine is a typical Welsh constituency. It is composed mainly of small farmers, who are extremely poor and hard working. If the tithe rent-charge had been struck upon the average of the prices of the last two or three years, the amount payable would have been about £70, and not £7 10s. By passing this Bill we shall rivet the fetters of tithe upon the Welsh peasantry without granting them relief by placing the tithe on a more equitable footing, and we shall thereby, I may say, add insult to injury, and at any rate be perpetuating a great wrong. It was quite a revelation to me, when I first became a Welsh Representative, to discover the extreme poverty of the agricultural class in the Principality, and if hon. Members knew the extent of it they would more fully feel the force of this Instruction. These small farmers live on the hardest fare, do all the work of the farm with their own hands, and earn less than an ordinary labourer. Some of them are so poor that they do not taste butter from year's end to year's end. You can imagine the feeling of injustice and soreness that is created when a struggling peasantry under these circumstances have to pay year after year tithe rent at the rate of £87 10s. or £90 when the produce only yields an average of £70 or £75—paying it all the while to a Church to which they do not belong and never enter. A great portion of the resistance of the people of Wales to the payment of tithe has arisen from the fact that the seven years' average has made farmers liable to pay a much higher rate than the prices of produce justified. They have asked for reductions of only 10 or 15 per cent when the tithe was 20 per cent above the current prices. It is not from any spirit of contumaciousness that there has been unwillingness, but it is from a deep instinct of right and wrong which lies at the bottom of the hearts of the human race. I wholly distrust the assurances of the Government that a large and comprehensive measure will be introduced next Session. The Government, I have no doubt, honestly mean what they say, but all are aware of the exigencies of political life and the demands that are always being made on the time of Governments; and I should be very greatly astonished if the Government, having passed this short Bill for the easy recovery of the tithes, burdened themselves next Session with a large measure. It, therefore, becomes the duty of the House to take securities that they will not let this Bill pass without provision being made for the equitable incidence of tithes. I hope the Government will not only yield upon this point, but will see their way to-night, or at a very early date, to withdraw altogether this most obnoxious Bill.

*MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I differ from my hon Friend (Mr. S. Smith) and the Mover of the Instruction—firstly, upon the general ground that I am very anxious to see this Bill become law. I cannot help thinking we should be much better employed in proceeding at once to thresh out the details of the Bill in Committee with a view to making the verbal alterations which hon. Members may think necessary, and the Government may be prepared to adopt, than in taking up time in the discussion of proposals which the Government and the friends of the Bill will of necessity feel themselves compelled to resist. The hon. Member for Glamorgan spoke of the Bill as it stands breaking the existing contract as between the tithe owner and the tithe payer. It appears to me that that argument was traversed in the preceding portion of the Debate by the Home Secretary when he pointed out that all the present Bill proposed to do was to expedite the means of recovering rather than to put the tithe-payer in any worse position as regards his liability than he occupies already. When the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glamorgan spoke of breaking contracts, he used words which, however high sounding, are, I think, inapplicable to the present position of affairs. The hon. Member for Flintshire spoke of the septennial average which was settled by the Tithe Commutation Act as an unfair average, at any rate during the last few years, and the hon. Gentleman strengthened that position by referring to the terrible agricultural depression which has made not only tithe, but rates, and taxes, a grievous burden to be borne by the struggling agricultural tenant. Therein I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and no Member of the House feels deeper sympathy with the tenant farmer of England and Wales than myself. But a contract is a contract, an agreement is an agreement, and a bargain is a bargain. The settlement arrived at 60 years ago by which a septennial system of averages was established was held to be peculiarly advantageous to the tithe payer, and very much to the detriment of the tithe owner. It is true times have changed since then; but, manifestly, if the tithe payer received the benefit of the arrangement when agriculture was in a prosperous condition, he must be prepared to take the rough with the smooth, and to adhere to the arrangement, even though it be to his disadvantage, when agriculture is in a depressed state. No doubt there is plenty of justification for a revision of the present system, and the Government have promised such revision. I, for one, shall be quite prepared to give whatever assistance I can to hon. Gentlemen opposite, in another Session of Parliament, to bring about a thorough revision of the present incidence of tithe. If it can be shown — as no doubt it can — that the septennial system, however favourable to the tenant some 50 years ago, is unfavourable to-day, hon. Members on this side of the House, as well as opposite, will, I am sure, be willing to take measures to bring about a revision of that state of things; but for the Government to accept this Instruction would be not only to jeopardise but to kill the Bill, and so deprive the struggling tithe owners of that protection and remedy which the circumstances of their case most urgently demand, and which, I venture to think, it is the business of the Government and this House to supply. The hon. Member for Flintshire spoke of the present Bill as riveting the fetters to the tithe payers of Wales, and implied that tithe payment was in the nature of bonds and fetters to the Welsh agriculturalist. Well, that may be a very good argument for the abolition of tithe altogether, but I have yet to learn that hon. Members on the other side of the House who represent Welsh constituencies are disposed to accept any such settlement of the question. On the contrary, the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire at an earlier stage of the Debate declared that tithe was nowhere more respected than in Wales, for the reason that the people consider that it belongs to them.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: What I said was that tithe, as a property, was as more respected anywhere than in Wales.

*MR. BYRON REED: I do not think I did injustice to the hon. Member in what I said. The hon. Member said the Welsh people regard the tithe as their property, and that the grievance of the Welsh tithe payer is not to tithe at all, but to its application.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is straying from the Instruction which relates to tithe averages.

*MR. BYRON REED: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and beg pardon for having strayed; but you will recognise the difficulty of keeping closely to each separate Instruction when it comes before us. These arguments which come from the other side, if they mean anything at all, mean that tithe should be abolished altogether. If the farmers of Wales are too necessitous to pay tithes, it matters not whether they have to pay them to the Church, to colleges or schools, to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or to lay impropriators. It is equally impossible to pay, whatever the purpose to which the money is to be applied. The hon. Member for Flintshire, in his concluding sentences, spoke in terms of commiseration of the poor farmer called on to pay tithe for a church he never enters. I would venture, with all deference, to point out that the question of Church attendance has nothing to do with the general principle before us, and still less with this particular Instruction. For the Welsh tenant to object to pay tithe on the ground that he does not go to church is as unreasonable as it would be for me to refuse to pay my butcher's bill because I differ from my butcher's religious or political opinions. ["Order, order!"] I will, however, refrain from running further risk of trenching upon the rules you, Sir, have laid down. I will merely again express a hope that the Government will not accept this Instruction, or any other Instruction which would jeopardise the Bill, and that in Committee they will not assent to any Amendment which will alter the scope or spirit of the measure.

The House divided :—Ayes 109; Noes 123.—(Div. List, No. 298.)

*MR. SPEAKER: The next Amendment is in the name of the hon. Member for the Ashburton Division of Devonshire (Mr. Seale-Hayne), and it is in these words:—

"That it be an instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide for the equitable incidence of tithe."

This subject has been largely discussed under the previous Motions. I asked the hon. Gentleman what was the meaning of "equitable incidence," and he told me his meaning was that the tithe should not fall on those who object to its application—that is to say on those who think it should not go to the Established Church. I pointed out to him privately—and I now state it publicly—that the question involved does not come within the scope of the Bill but that a separate Bill would be required to deal with it.

It could not be brought within the reach of the Bill by an Instruction.

*MR. T. ELLIS: On the point of order. It is a fact that many districts or parts of districts are free from tithe altogether. I think my hon. Friend, and certainly many Members of this House, are of opinion that all land should pay a certain amount of tithe——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not think the hon. Member has improved the matter by argument.

*MR. G. O. MORGAN: I beg now to move——

“That it be an instruction to the Committee<sup>e</sup> that they have power to review and revise the settlement made by the Act passed in the sixth and seventh years of his late Majesty King William IV., entitled ‘An Act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales,’ and the Acts amending the same.”

This is of a more comprehensive character than any of the Instructions which have preceded it as it embraces nearly all of them, and I think I may go as far as to say that all hon. Members who have supported other Instructions will vote for this. The hon. Member who last spoke urged the House to reject the last Instruction on the ground that its adoption would prove fatal to the Bill. Well, I take the liberty to ask the House to agree to my Instruction for that very reason. I think that after the note of warning the Government have had, their majority having fallen in one Division as low as four, it must be evident to them by this time that the Bill is unpopular, even among their own supporters. It is certainly most unpopular in my part of the country, and the Government have selected a very unpropitious time to bring it forward, just when Her Majesty is about to pay a visit to Wales. [Cries of “Oh!”] Yes, no one regrets it more than I do, but I fear that the Government are in a fair way to make one of the most loyal parts of the country disloyal. It is agreed on all hands that the Act of 1836 was a settlement. That settlement has lasted a long time—over 50 years—and if it is now to be revised let the revision be fair to both sides. Lord Salisbury told a deputation not very long ago that the Act of 1836 was a sacred covenant, binding for all time, which it would be dishonest to break. But the Government are breaking it now, and what is worse, they are doing so in the interests of the tithe owner only. What will the Bill do for the tithe payer? It will expose him to the costs and trouble of County Court process, and give him no relief whatever. The Home Secretary says the process will not involve imprisonment, but I do not know how he proposes to prevent that. The right of bringing the tithe payer before a Court in a town where there is sure to be a deal of excitement and agitation is certainly not a thing that a clergyman would covet. But what I want to show is that this Bill gives a distinct additional collateral remedy to the tithe receiver without conferring any sort of advantage on the tithe payer. The Act of 1836 provides that “nothing herein contained shall be taken to render any person personally liable for the payment of the rent charge.” Up to the present time tithe is not a personal debt, it never was a personal debt, or even a charge on the land. It is a charge on the produce of the land, and, therefore, if there is no produce no tithe is payable. Of course, in accordance with that general and sound principle, the amount payable for the tithe was regulated with reference to the value of the produce. The Act of 1836 made the charge a money charge on the producer, but it made the money charge depend on the value of the produce. The whole principle running through all the legislation up to the present time has been that the tithe has been a charge on the produce, and that the amount of the charge is regulated by the value of the produce. Now, however, you are introducing an entirely new principle into the law of tithe. The object of the Bill has been said to be to change the mode of recovery. That is not so, because you are not only changing the mode of recovery, but changing the nature of the debt. You are making it a charge not upon produce, but upon the real and personal estate of the debtor. The result is that you are placing a very much heavier burden on the tithe payer. Therefore this is an entirely one-sided measure. You give this additional remedy, and you create this non-existing debt against the debtor, if so he can be called, but you do nothing for the debtor. I credit hon. Gentlemen opposite with being the farmers’ friends as much as we are, and I want them to look at the facts of the case. What is the time the Government are choosing for imposing this additional burden on the tithe payer? I suppose there never was a time in the history of agricultural depression when the price of corn fell so low as during the last 12 or 13 years. And this is the time you, the avowed friends of the farmers—the men who are constantly parading your sympathy for the farming interest—choose to impose this heavy additional taxation on the farmer without giving him anything whatever to make up for it. There are plenty of farms which cannot be let at any price whatever. Let me read the House part of an interesting letter which appeared in the Times of to-day, from Mr. Everitt, who is a tenant farmer who formerly represented one of the Eastern Counties which has suffered especially from this agricultural depression. He says:—

“Never since the passing of the Commutation Act, more than 50 years ago, has the burden of tithe pressed so heavily upon the agricultural industry as now. For 10 or 12 years the price of corn has been continuously falling. The lower it falls the more difficult it becomes to pay tithe at all. Owing to the action of the seven years' average, the amount we have had to pay during each of the last 10 years has been about 10 per cent higher than the price of the produce of that particular year taken by itself would warrant, yet we have had to pay it out of that produce. From a fifth of the rent as it used to be, tithe has become in many cases a third, a half, the equal of it, and in some cases all the rent. Indeed, some farms have actually been driven out of cultivation because no one would take them to pay the tithe as rent. As a rule, during these hard times tithe receivers have been very hard with tithe payers, and have insisted upon their full legal due. Consequently the feeling about tithe, both on the part of the farmer, and of the landowner, has become very strong. The burden is more onerous than ever and more unpopular.”

He adds:—

“I have attended many meetings in different counties during the last few years, called to complain of the oppressive weight of the tithe under the lamentably altered agricultural conditions, and am sure there is no market town in England where at a publicly convened meeting a resolution in favour of this Bill could be carried. Indeed, no one who had any knowledge of the agricultural situation would venture to propose one. The Bill is little better than an insult to one of the most suffering classes in the kingdom.”

Well, Sir, Gentlemen opposite are very fond of talking about the evils which are inflicted on the British farmer by foreign competition. But what is it that enables the American farmer, or the Canadian farmer, or the Indian ryot to compete with the British farmer in his own markets? Why, simply all these charges, the first and foremost among which is the charge for tithes. Of course, I should have no opposition to offer to a large and comprehensive measure that would do justice between the payer and receiver of tithes; but when I find the Government bringing in a measure such as this, which does no good to anybody, and inflicts endless trouble and expense on the tithe payer, I feel it my duty to oppose it in every way I can. I beg to move the Instruction that stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to review and revise the settlement made by the Act passed in the 6th and 7th years of his late Majesty King William IV., entitled ‘An Act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales,’ and the Acts amending the same.” — (Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

*MR. C. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I do not propose to put myself out of order by referring to any matters which I intended to deal with by the Instruction which I had placed on the Paper, but I think I shall be in order if, upon the present motion, I refer to the labours of the Committee which sat last year, for the purpose of investigating the method of taking the corn averages as determined by the Act of 1836. I am astonished, considering that it is generally supposed that the farmers' friends sit on the benches opposite, that during the whole of that Debate we have not heard a single gentleman, either belonging to that Committee or not belonging to that Committee, who has referred to the grievances which affect the tenant farmers, and which were brought before the Committee by so many witnesses. The evidence brought before that Committee showed that the present method of taking averages is faulty, and is one which practically robs the tithe payer of a very considerable amount of percentage over and above that which he ought to pay. In the first place it is evident that the Government officials, who ought to attend at the various markets and obtain from the sellers as well as the buyers the prices for which they have sold their corn, are in many instances unknown, and many sellers even do not know that such an official exists. I know that the position of those officials was defended before the Committee by an official from the Board of Trade, but nobody except that official said one word in favour of those gentlemen, who are supposed to collect correct statistics at the various markets. Under those circumstances, it was perfectly evident to the Committee, and was one of the points upon which they dwelt in their Report, that their Returns were prepared upon incomplete information. It so happened that there was a Return which had been obtained by an hon. Member for one of the divisions of Shropshire, showing how many quarters of each species of grain was returned in the various markets, in different weeks, and also for a whole year, and we found that the average price was determined in some of these markets upon little more than 100 quarters of wheat or oats during the whole year, so that the average was determined upon a small and especially good sample, and consequently that the prices were considerably in excess of the real price of the produce of the land. We all know, having been told so over and over again, that tithe is a portion of the produce of the land, and if tithe in its origin was one-tenth part of that produce I should like to know why that part is not to be taken equitably, and did not include what is poor in quality as well as what is good. The tenant farmer has a very serious grievance in this matter. It is not only evident that what is good is necessarily sent to the market and obtains there the top price, but it is evident also that a vast amount of what the farmer calls "tail" corn does not come into the calculation of the average price in any way whatever. In addition to that, there is a large amount of corn consumed on the farm which is of inferior quality, which also does not come into the estimated price in any shape or form. The consequence is that the average is increased considerably above what, in fairness, it ought to be. There is one point which came before us in the Committee, and which, like the other grievances of tithe-payers, has not been dealt with at all in this Bill, and that is the question of re-sale. Corn which is brought into the market is sold by the man who produced it, and the price he obtains is that upon which the average ought to be calculated. The corn, however, changes hands at a profit, and the prices which are taken by the Government are not the prices which are obtained by the men who grow the corn, but the prices which are the result of speculation upon the market, and consequently includes the profits very often of several middlemen, as also the cost of carriage. These are grievances which are not known to the general public, but which are familiar to everyone who represents an agricultural constituency. I sincerely trust that this Bill will pass in its naked simplicity and with all its imperfections upon it. I further sincerely trust that after the passing of the Act in its naked simplicity, we may have a General Election, so that we may take the sense of the county constituencies upon the subject. In that case, I am perfectly confident that the gentlemen who now sit opposite will be sitting very shortly on these Benches.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As I had the honour of being a Member of the Committee to which the hon. Member has referred, I should like to say a few words. The hon. Member attached great importance to certain grievances, but the amount of that importance is nothing as compared with that which he attaches to his Party allegiance, because, sooner than have those grievances removed, he would like to see the Bill passed through without dealing with them at all, in order that his own Party may have the greater success at the General Election. The Instruction has nothing in the world to do with the matters to which the hon. Member has called attention. The hon. Member has confined his speech to the mode of taking the corn averages, although he ought to know that that was adopted long before the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act, and was only applied to that Act because it happened to be in existence. The hon. Member did not indicate how he would revise the taking of the averages, and while citing evidence given before the Committee of last year, the hon. Member did not quote the Report of the Committee, which gives a good answer to every one of the grievances complained of. The majority of the Committee did not agree with the hon. Member as to the effect of the evidence given before them, and in more than one instance, on the points to which he has referred, the hon. Member was himself in a minority of one.

*MR. SEALE HAYNE: Pardon me. Only on one occasion.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Well, on one occasion at all events. I will not now deal with these points, but the hon. Member's arguments respecting them are answered in the Report of the Committee. If any hon. Member thinks that the averages are taken on a wrong basis, I would advise him to study the evidence and Report before making any suggestions to the House on the subject. So far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned they will abide by the Report, and they are not prepared to legislate on these points. With regard to the Instruction now before the Committee, the right hon. Gentleman did not adduce one argument in its support. It is obvious that if the House were to agree to the Instruction it must defeat the Bill, and it is obvious also that the right hon. Gentleman desires to effect that object without in the slightest degree showing his own hand as to the manner in which the alteration suggested in his Instruction should be brought about.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman seems to regard it as a fatal objection to the Instruction that it would put an end to the Bill. I should have thought that what has happened to-night might have shown him that the passage of the Bill would not be regretted by either side of the House. It is with the greatest difficulty, and only by votes given very much against the grain, that the Government have secured a narrow majority. But how is this Instruction to be fatal to the Bill? Because, the principle of the Bill being that it is to be only against one party, the tenant farmer, the Government say it will be fatal to their Bill if countervailing justice be done to the other party. There are really three parties to the tithe question—the tithe owner, the tithe payer, and the tithe debtor. It is a curious thing that the debtor is the landowner, and the payer is the tenant farmer. The Government are legislating in favour of the tithe owner. They refuse to legislate against the tithe debtor; and they put the whole stress of the Bill on the tithe payer. In taxation it is always considered a great evil to make the trader advance the taxes. But this is what the Bill does to the tenant farmer. The Home Secretary says, "We will get at the landowner through the tenant, who shall be made to advance the tithe." The Chairman of Committees in his acute speech has pointed out what the consequence will be if the tithe exceeds the rent. It is said you cannot interfere with the contract between landlord and tenant under which the latter has to pay tithe. The conclusive answer is, you are affecting the condition of one of the parties, and, if you do that, you must redress the situation of the other. Stand by the contract if you like and leave the tenant alone; but if you must choose to meddle with the tenant you must, in legal phrase, reform the contract. You have no business to say there is one contract, and only one, that is sacred, and that is the contract between the landlord and the tenant. There is one contract that is quite as sacred, and that is the Parliamentary contract of 1836. This is a solemn contract into which Parliament entered with the parties to the transaction and with the tenant farmer first and mainly. The Act says:—

A County Court Judgment would impose a "personal" liability on the tenant farmer, and that would be a deliberate violation of the statutory compact. The Government talk about the "agricultural interest," but we know very well what they mean by it. They mean the parson and the squire; and they do not mean the tenant farmer and the labourer. The Bill gives to the parson a facility for getting his tithe which he does not possess at present. Besides that, it guarantees the squire against bearing any part of the odium of that facility; and the tenant farmer is between these two millstones. That is the real meaning of the Bill. If for any adequate reason the Parliamentary contract is to be set aside, the contracts of all parties must be revised. That is the demand the Opposition make, and the Government meet it by saying, "We will do nothing of the kind." The hon. Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot), finding all other arguments fail, and finding his difficulties shared by Gentlemen sitting around him, brings forward the shibboleth which is used when all other arguments fail, and whenever any injustice is to be supported, and cries out "Law and order." Well, do you not see you are making law and order ridiculous when you use it for purposes of this kind? Do you not see you are making the tenant farmers of England and Wales think very much what the tenant farmers of Ireland think about your law and order? If in a case of such palpable injustice as this you cry law and order, you bring law and order into contempt. There is no doubt this tithe question has led to occurrences we all deplore; but that does not affect the obligation to deal with it in a statesmanlike way by paying due regard to all the interests involved. The interests of all parties concerned ought to be fully and fairly considered; and the cause of law and order will not be promoted if one of the parties is treated in an unfair manner. By the rejection of these Instructions the Government are refusing all amendment to the Bill and disabling themselves from amending the Bill at all; because everybody knows the object of an Instruction is that it can be applied to Amendments which without it cannot be introduced at all. After the very singular indication of the feeling of the House, I should have thought that the Government would have been willing to reconsider their position. I do not know whether we shall be accused of obstruction, but I will venture to say that, considering the votes that have come from the other side in support of our Motions, a more legitimate opposition to a Bill was never offered; and I hope that opposition will be continued, and that in Committee the

Sir W. Harcourt

Bill will be fought line by line, in order that the country may learn its real character. Hon. Members may not like this reference to the country, but it must come, and that soon, if the Government persist in their line of action. My right hon. Friend is entitled to speak on behalf of Wales, and he proposes that the Committee shall have power to revise the existing settlement; and in this connection I would ask hon. Members opposite—the hon. Member for Maldon, for instance—to note that the President of the Board of Trade has said that the Government have made up their minds to make no modification with respect to tithe averages. I hope the country will take note of that statement—a definite and clear declaration on the part of the Government; and hon. Members must reconcile it as they can with the promise of a full and comprehensive Bill next year or the year after, or some years hence. Whenever we have the Bill, the Government have declared through the right hon. Gentleman that they will not tolerate any revision of tithe averages.

*SIR M. H. BEACH: That is not what I said. What I said was, that we should not undertake to legislate against the Report of the Committee of last year, and in favour of the view of the hon. Gentleman opposite. The question of the number of years on which the tithe average should be taken is entirely an open question.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has made that explanation, but I do not quite understand what the Government have made up their minds to do.

*SIR M. H. BEACH: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will look at the Report of the Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What I have to say in regard to the tithe averages is this—that nothing can be more unjust to the tenant farmers than the operation of these averages upon the tenant farmers under the unprecedented low prices of agricultural produce. If you are going to affect their position adversely under the Bill, surely some relief ought to be given under the circumstances. So, also, in respect to assessment and other questions involved in the settlement. If the Government re-open this question I maintain that they are bound to review it as a whole in respect to all the persons concerned. It is most unfair to the House and the country that at this period of the Session a measure of this kind should be pressed as it is being pressed. The Government know perfectly well the distaste, the dislike, and the disapprobation with which it is looked upon even by their own supporters, and to interpose such a Bill in the middle of Supply is merely to waste time upon the subject. [Cries of "Order!"] I can soon place myself in order by a Motion if hon. Members drive me to such a course. I say it is most unfair to the House that the Bill should be forced upon us now. Of course, the Government may by a majority of four or even by a majority of one pass the Bill into law, but they will have no reason to congratulate themselves upon the success which they achieve. This Instruction raises a distinct issue, and upon that we are asked why we do not lay down our plan. But it is no part of our business to propound a plan. We only want to get out of the narrow limits imposed by the Bill, and allow the Government an opportunity, and allow hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House an opportunity, in Committee of making the Bill a just instead of the one-sided and iniquitous measure which it now is with respect to one of the parties to the transaction.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): The right hon. Gentleman condemns the Bill as one-sided, and condemns the Government for introducing it at this period of the Session. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that there is to be in the coming winter a repetition of the scenes of last year? Is the law to be defied and rights settled in 1836 to be entirely ignored, and are those who are entitled to tithe rent-charge to be deprived of it by an agitation conducted in the interests of a particular party? The issue is whether law and order are to prevail, or the will of a few gentlemen conducting an agitation in Wales. I object to a review of the Act of 1836, which is a most masterly piece of legislation. I wish the legislation of the present day were half as skilfully conducted. If the Act is examined it will be seen that almost every interest has been considered. All parties were called before the Commission, and every effort was made to secure a fair and equitable settlement of the question. It may be that in some instances the settlement may operate, I will not say unfairly, but to the disadvantage of one party, but is it possible to have a settlement involving a variety of interests without something of this kind? In some parts of the country the disadvantage is against the receiver, in other parts against the payer. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not indisposed to consider the whole question, but I object to the larger question being tied to a Bill of this character. The rights of the tithe-owners were established not by the Act of 1836, they existed as far back as historical memory goes, first upon custom, which afterwards was merged into the law of the land. When these rent-charges were established they became a first charge upon the land, and if the law were as supreme now as it was in those days, there would be no difficulty whatever in the collection of those tithes. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the tithepayer and the tithe debtor as though they were something different. Does the right hon. Gentleman, who has been a Chancellor of the Exchequer, know nothing of the Property Tax? There is the Property Tax receiver, the payer, and the debtor. There is the State which receives it, the tenant who pays it, and the landlord who is the debtor. The tenant pays the tax and deducts it from his rent; and I fail to see the smallest grievance in the matter of tithe to the tithepayer, who is neither more nor less than the medium employed for the purpose of collecting the tithe, the real debtor and the real payer being the landlord, from whose rent the tithe is deducted. I hope, however, the Government will be prepared to receive Amendments which may put the tithe payment on the tithe debtor, which may tend to prevent somewhat the tumultuous proceedings that have been witnessed in Wales, and which may result in a happy solution of this question.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER: I heartily agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman in his earnest wish that the settlement by the Government of the present day should be equal to that arrived at in 1836. The hon. and learned Gentleman has pointed out that at that time the Government of that day showed itself ready to consider the position of all parties, and that is exactly what we ask the Government to do at the present moment in consideration of this Bill, but that is also exactly what the Government of to-day refuse to do by their absolute rejection of these Instructions. But the hon. and learned Gentleman was somewhat inconsistent in the way in which he praised the Government of 1836; because though he praised that Government for listening to both parties, he admitted that one of the two parties had a grievance and had to bear it as best it could.

MR. AMBROSE: I did not say that either party had a grievance now. On the contrary, I said the tithe-payer had no grievance, because he could deduct the amount of his payment from his rent.

MR. GARDNER: I will deal with that a little later. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say that there would be no harm in the Government rejecting this Instruction now, because he hoped Amendments would be introduced in Committee in regard to these matters. But he seems to me to be absolutely ignorant of the Forms of the House; if these Instructions are refused it will be absolutely impossible to bring in any such Amendments in Committee, and therefore the matter cannot be dealt with in the manner the hon. and learned Gentleman would be prepared to deal with it. In the earlier part of his speech he said that this Bill was introduced in the interest of law and order. If we were able to believe all that has been said on the other side of the House, we should believe that the Bill is distinctly and specifically for one class of persons alone—those who can pay but who will not pay. But nothing more absolutely false was ever stated. The Bill is to apply to the tithepayers generally of the United Kingdom. Now, accepting it as a matter of argument that the farmers of Wales are dishonest in refusing payment—that I deny, but supposing it were so—this Bill does not deal with them alone, and why should the tithe payers of Essex and Suffolk be put to severe treatment because the Welsh tithe payers refuse to pay their tithes? It is absolutely absurd. The real fact is that the majority of persons who will be hit under these circumstances are the suffering tenant farmers and the small yeomen, not those who can pay and will not pay, and the result will be that for the first time the Government will succeed in bringing Tory tithepayers into line with the advocates of Disestablishment, and that surely ought to be a matter for consideration for sagacious Churchmen. I hope we may now have an answer from the Government whether in their promised Committee there will be an inquiry into the working of the Tithes Commutation Act of 1836. Will the Government now give us the answer they declined to give earlier in the evening? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade seemed to think he had given a sufficient answer to my hon. Friend on the question of corn averages, and taunted him with being in a minority of one on the Committee; but I remember Divisions on the Committee when the Government were only in a majority of one or two. I am sure the tenant farmers will not regard the refusal of the Government to inquire into the question of corn averages with absolute complacency. I have referred to the injustice of the septennial average, and will not go into that again. In the Debates on the passing of the Act of 1836 it was laid down that one of the reasons for its passing was that it would stop any tax on the money put into the cultivation of the land. Will any hon. Gentleman tell me that the tithe as paid now does not, in a great majority of instances, come out of capital poured into the soil since 1836 in order to improve the agricultural industry of this country? No one with knowledge of the subject will deny that. I really cannot congratulate the Government on their defence of their measure. I have not heard a single speech from Conservative or Liberal Unionists that has really been a defence of the Bill, and even from the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench it seemed to me there came a very half-hearted defence of their position. Under these circumstances, I ask the Government whether they do not think it would be well to accept this Instruction, which will give them an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and of bringing in a Bill of a comprehensive character which will give satisfaction all round?

MR. C. W. GRAY: In regard to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, I desire to say that I very much regret that there should have been so much Party animus in his speech. I regret also that the agricultural interest should again be made a sort of shuttlecock between the two Parties in this House. What I desire is that all sections of this House should try, if possible, to thrash this unfortunate Bill into a shape in which it will be beneficial, or kick it out altogether. The Instruction now under consideration is, undoubtedly, the most important Instruction of the five we see on the Paper, and I very much wish it had appeared first in the list, so that the Debates might have turned upon it. It is the most comprehensive of the Instructions; indeed, under it I should think that every subject of importance relating to tithe can be discussed. At any rate, I know that the interests of the agriculturalists are covered by the Instruction. The agriculturalists who are discontented with the existing law simply ask that the Commutation Act of 1836 should be reviewed. They say that agriculture has changed in its conditions since 1836, and it is upon that pivot that all their appeals turn. No doubt the Acts of 1835 and 1836 were well thought out, but whether or not they worked well for a time, I am most decidedly of opinion that they are altogether unsuited to the conditions in which agriculturalists now find themselves, and for that reason I must support the Instruction if the right hon. Gentleman goes to a Division. My hon. Colleague was quite right in drawing the attention of the House to the position of the yeoman farmer. There was a time when the yeoman farmer was described as the backbone of old England, and in discussing this question we must consider what effect the Bill will have upon that class. Everyone must admit the importance of the subject to that class. But is there a single line in the Bill calculated to give them relief? Not one. Nothing but the re-opening of the question of the Tithe Commutation Acts will satisfy the yeoman farmer, who has for 12 long years past demanded that the Tithe Question shall be thoroughly looked into. Her Majesty does not reign over a more loyal class, and is the answer to the demand which the yeoman farmer has made to be that all the Government are prepared to give is contained within the pages of the Bill before us? If so, can anyone wonder at the yeoman farmer's disappointment? They have been disappointed with previous Governments—though I do not wish to use the tu quoque argument against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The question is, not who has or who has not done anything for them, but what should be done now? This can be done—we can go back to the Commutation Acts, and ask how far they are applicable to existing circumstances. Where there is a will there is a way, and I am sure it would be possible to re-open these Acts, and try and make them more applicable to the altered position of 1889. The hon. Member for Shropshire, who is a champion of the Church, might give us his advice in the matter, and I am sure we should be only too glad to pay every attention to his views. I must say, however, with regard to the Church view of the question, if you want to make the Church popular you must remove from that body every suspicion of greed. I feel convinced that if it goes out all over the agricultural districts—at all events in England, and I will say nothing of Wales, as it is quite enough for me to deal with the wants of my own country—that the clergy would rather receive large cheques from the landlords instead of collecting the tithe in small amounts. Whatever shaking the Church may receive in connection with this matter, will come, not from without, but from within. My opinion is, that if the Bill goes into Committee without the House having the benefit of this Instruction, the measure will not be productive of that advantage which the Government anticipate. Unless there is a very great difference between the Welsh farmers and the English farmers, it will have a disturbing effect in Wales. Who will say that the odium which now attaches to the collection of tithe will be removed when the County Court process is substituted for the present distraint? Who will put the rough process of the County Court in motion—who but the owner of the tithe? And surely the facts of the situation will be as apparent to the Welsh tithe payer as to every Member here. If I could do so without appearing to be presumptuous I would most certainly advise every hon. Member from Wales to do everything he possibly can during the coming Autumn to get the tithe payers of Wales to refrain from everything in the nature of disturbance. We in England are watching the action of our Welsh brother farmers with great interest. However severe the pressure of tithe paying has been upon the

the Committee which sat to consider the question of Corn Averages, and a feeling of esprit de corps would have prevented my making any allusion to that Committee had it not been for such reference. I have been appealed to as to my experience in connection with that Committee, and I answer frankly and unhesitatingly that I was very much dissatisfied with the Report which emanated from that Committee. I do not believe the Report fitted in with the views of the general agricultural tithe payer throughout the length and breadth of the country. Wherever I went after that Report was made I was told by the farmers: "We looked anxiously to see what your Report would be, and now it has come we think it worthless." It is quite true a gentleman who was once a Member of this House was called as a witness—I refer to Mr. Albert Pell—and he told us he was satisfied with the position of tithe legislation. I was very much surprised at that evidence, and could not consent to take it as that of a friend of the farmers. So one-sided was Mr. Pell's statement that I asked him whether he had any interest, directly or indirectly, in tithe as a tithe owner, and it then came out that he was a very large tithe owner. Upon that, so far as I was concerned, all Mr. Pell's evidence was very much discounted. I have been in a dilemma on this tithe question all the way through, but at the same time I have wished to be sincere. I have spoken my mind in the interests of my agricultural friends in the country, and so long as one hon. Member in the House will listen to me I shall continue to do so when opportunity offers.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucestershire, Cirencester): The House has just listened to a very interesting and a very honest speech from a Conservative Member who represents farmers—who, finding his way, as so many others have done, to the House by promising to support the interests of the tenant farmers, does support those interests even at the risk of having to vote against his Party. I do not think the hon. Member, when he goes down to East Anglia again, will have anything to fear in rendering an account of the votes he has given on this Bill. The part of the country from which I come has been alluded to by the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) as one which has suffered almost as much depression, so far as the cultivation and the value of land is concerned, as even the East of England. I am able to corroborate the right hon. Baronet, and I am very glad indeed to be able to give my vote on behalf of the farmers who have suffered so much. The right hon. Baronet and those who have so long claimed to specially represent the agricultural interests, turn a deaf ear to the complaints of the tenant farmer and a ready ear to the complaints of the clergy and tithe-owner. The clergy seem to have advised the Government to upset the settlement come to in 1870 on educational matters—and I think they have done so unwisely. The change when it is effected will not be found satisfactory to those who have brought it about; and in like manner on this tithe question, when it is finally settled, the settlement will surely be in the interest of the tenant farmer who has waited so patiently for relief from admitted grievances as regard tithe for years. I do not see how any hon. Member, who really has the interest of the farmers at heart, can take exception to this Instruction. The settlement of 1836 referred to in it was a settlement to which there were three parties—the clergy, the tenants, and the landowners. The landowners soon managed after their manner to shift the burden from their own shoulders, leaving it on the tenants, although it is not a tenants' debt, and never was intended to be. In the interests of the tenant farmers of Gloucestershire, I protest against the present unfair attempt to upset the settlement of 1836 on behalf of a single class. I regard this Bill as an insult to the tenant farmers of England. I have not heard a whisper from hon. Members opposite to the effect that these tenant farmers have not paid their tithes—and paid them, too, when they could ill-afford to do it, and in cases where no abatement has been allowed. Why is this County Court process to be inflicted on them—why should they be insulted in this way in the interest of law and order in Wales? As representing an agricultural constituency, I feel it to be my duty to earnestly protest against this Bill, which I believe will be viewed with disfavour by agriculturalists throughout the length and breadth of the country. It is an old maxim of our Constitution that redress of grievances should always precede Supply. But you are not redressing the grievances of the farmers; you are altering the settlement of 1836 in the interest of the tithe owner alone—altering the position of affairs adversely to the tithe payers. I protest against that as being opposed to the great principle of redress of grievances going before Supply. What is this Bill for—this Bill brought forward at so late a period of the Session to take up the time of the House, to raise Party disputes and opposition, and create bitter feelings not only in Wales, but throughout the length and breadth of the country. What is the Bill to do? We hear from the Home Secretary that it shall be amended so as not to cause anyone to be imprisoned, for he has promised to insert words in it which will forbid imprisonment under the measure. It will do nothing but put a stigma and insult upon the tenant farmers, and pile up County Court costs. This Instruction is one that I heartily support, for I hold that if the settlement of 1836 is to be altered or modified at all, it ought to be amended all round, so that we may try to meet the grievances of the tithe-owners; we may also, at the same time, remove those of the long-suffering tenant farmers of the United Kingdom.

*ADMIRAL FIELD (Eastbourne): As the Representative of an agricultural division in the County of Sussex, I desire to say a few words on this question. I think the hon. Member who has just spoken has touched the weak point in this Bill, which by providing that the tenant may be sued for the tithe, puts him in the position——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is going into the whole question of the Bill, and is not confining himself to the Instruction before the House.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I will try to obey your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but, as I stated, the hon. Gentleman has hit the weak point of the Bill. I may say that nothing would induce me to support the Government and vote against this Instruction, but the conviction that we shall have a larger measure from them at a later period. I am in sympathy with all of these Instructions, and I think that every man in the House is in sympathy with them—indeed, Her Majesty's Government are in sympathy with them, and I only vote against them because I look on them as insincere—I mean in this respect—that it is utterly impossible that the Government could accept them, inasmuch as they could not be incorporated in the measure at the present time. This is simply a temporary measure, intended to meet a temporary difficulty, created by political agitators in Wales, and, unfortunately, the disease is spreading to certain parts of England. In saying this I have in my eye a country gentleman Magistrate, living in his own mansion, who declined to pay his tithe because the parson would not reduce the amount; and the consequence was that the parson was forced to distrain, the result being that a crowd gathered round the auctioneer, and there was quite a sensation in the neighbourhood. These are disgraceful scenes, and, for my part, I would send such men into any Court I could—a higher one than the County Court, if possible. When you have a man who can pay, and who will not pay, you ought to be able to treat him like an ordinary debtor. However, I do not like treating the tenant farmers, in this respect, as ordinary debtors. The Government, I understand, will insert a clause hereafter that will, in the case of future contracts, throw the onus of the tithe upon the landlord, who, after all, is the person who ought to pay the tithe. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby says we shall render ourselves unpopular, and that some of us will lose our seats over our action on this question, I reply that I, for one, am ready to face that contingency. The tenant farmers of England, and certainly those of Sussex, know that the Bill is not one that is levelled against them, but against disorderly people—

*MR. SPEAKER: I must again remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he is not speaking to the Instruction which is before the House.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg pardon, Sir; but I find it very difficult to steer clear of the rocks and shoals which abound in this discussion. The word "cowardly" has been used against the Government. I do not know how that word was intended to be applied; but I think they are the real cowards who hound on the people to refuse to meet their obligations—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is again wandering from the point.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I will try, Mr. Speaker, to keep to the point.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman would do better to adhere to my ruling. He has not once touched the subject yet, and I am afraid if he continues in the line he has pursued I shall be obliged to request him to resume his seat.

MR. H. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I rise to support the Instruction now before the House, and will give one or two reasons for so doing. I have a strong conviction that the settlement of 1836 will have to be reviewed, but I desire that when it is reviewed it shall be reviewed in a comprehensive form. I hold in my hand a Petition sent to this House, and signed by Lord Aylesbury and several other Peers, who speak more strongly on this question than any hon. Member who has addressed the House to-night. Among the reasons they give for a review of the Act of 1836 they say that wages have increased to something like 50 per cent in the last 52 years. I am a large tithe-payer myself, and grow a good deal of corn, and I know what that means. They also say that while in 1836 corn was 56s. a quarter, it is now only 36s. or 37s. on the average. If we are to review the Act of 1836, let us not do it in a tinkering way. One hon. Gentleman spoke of the extravagance of the settlement of 1836. Now, I can recollect that settlement, and I tell the hon. Gentleman that the statesmen of that day, whom he was praising, were men who represented the Party on this side of the House, and who were opposed to the Party to which he belongs. The opposition to that settlement was much stronger than anything that has taken place to-night, and I say that hon. Gentlemen should learn its history before coming here to talk upon this question. I feel that we are justified in saying that if we are to reopen this question we should review the whole position, and it will then be seen that the tenant farmers are those who have suffered most. What makes me feel that there is a great deal of dishonesty in politics is that hon. Gentlemen opposite who have said so much in favour of the tenant farmers do not allow us to measure their sympathy for that class. I ask will their sympathy lead them into the Lobby in favour of this Instruction? I desire that in re-opening this question we should do justice to all sides, and especially to that side which has been least considered in this matter. I allude, of course, to the tenant farmers who pay the tithe, but who ought not to have to pay it, and upon whom you wish to press more harshly the obligation which ought to rest on the landowners. I hold in my hand a letter from a distinguished Gentleman who used to be a Member of this House, and who is a tenant farmer. He states that—

“Owing to the action of the seven years’ clause the tenants have been paying 10 per cent beyond what they ought to pay, and that, in many cases, the tithe instead of being a tenth, comes up to a quarter, and in some cases to a third, and in some cases to the whole of the rent.”

Now, the settlement of 1836 meant that the payment should be one-tenth only. The writer also says:—

“How any party, how any person professing to have the slightest desire to benefit the tenant farmers can vote for the Bill on this side of the House I cannot imagine.”

Well, Sir, I shall watch the matter in the Lobby presently, and the tenant farmers will also watch what is done, and if this Instruction is rejected it will be bad for that side of the House.

*MR. SWETENHAM: I desire to say a few words to explain why I, as a County Member, intend to vote against this Instruction. No one can view with greater regret than I do the fact that the Government has not had time during the present Session to review and revise the settlement made by the Act of William IV. That the time has arrived when that Act ought to be reviewed, I am quite satisfied; but it is manifest that at this period of the Session it is impossible to undertake the work. As the hon. Gentleman who moved the Instruction did not specify any of the points on which he proposes revision, I cannot help thinking that what he really means is what has been already discussed.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I did not know it was part of my duty, in moving this Instruction, to state what particular Amendments I proposed to introduce; but if Her Majesty’s Government will accept the Instruction, I am ready to put those Amendments on the Paper to-night.

*MR. SWETENHAM: I was only stating a fact. I wish the House to understand that, in my opinion, it will be absolutely necessary on some future occasion to consider the question of redemption as one of the modes of revising the Act; I also think that another mode of revision will be found in providing that in all future contracts the landowner ought to be the person to pay the tithe. I may also say that I think the Corn Average question is one that presses very severely on persons in the position of the tenant farmers. There are a great many other things that have not been considered, and which I trust may be dealt with in a future Session. I cannot help thinking that when the right hon. Gentleman said the present Bill changed the nature of the debt, he was in reality resorting for which they have sold their corn, are in many instances unknown, and many sellers even do not know that such an official exists. I know that the position of those officials was defended before the Committee by an official from the Board of Trade, but nobody except that official said one word in favour of those gentlemen, who are supposed to collect correct statistics at the various markets. Under those circumstances, it was perfectly evident to the Committee, and was one of the points upon which they dwelt in their Report, that their Returns were prepared upon incomplete information. It so happened that there was a Return which had been obtained by an hon. Member for one of the divisions of Shropshire, showing how many quarters of each species of grain was returned in the various markets, in different weeks, and also for a whole year, and we found that the average price was determined in some of these markets upon little more than 100 quarters of wheat or oats during the whole year, so that the average was determined upon a small and especially good sample, and consequently that the prices were considerably in excess of the real price of the produce of the land. We all know, having been told so over and over again, that tithe is a portion of the produce of the land, and if tithe in its origin was one-tenth part of that produce I should like to know why that part is not to be taken equitably, and did not include what is poor in quality as well as what is good. The tenant farmer has a very serious grievance in this matter. It is not only evident that what is good is necessarily sent to the market and obtains there the top price, but it is evident also that a vast amount of what the farmer calls "tail" corn does not come into the calculation of the average price in any way whatever. In addition to that, there is a large amount of corn consumed on the farm which is of inferior quality, which also does not come into the estimated price in any shape or form. The consequence is that the average is increased considerably above what, in fairness, it ought to be. There is one point which came before us in the Committee, and which, like the other grievances of tithe-payers, has not been dealt with at all in this Bill, and that is the question of re-sale. Corn which is brought into the market is sold by the man who produced it, and the price he obtains is that upon which the average ought to be calculated. The corn, however, changes hands at a profit, and the prices which are taken by the Government are not the prices which are obtained by the men who grow the corn, but the prices which are the result of speculation upon the market, and consequently includes the profits very often of several middlemen, as also the cost of carriage. These are grievances which are not known to the general public, but which are familiar to everyone who represents an agricultural constituency. I sincerely trust that this Bill will pass in its naked simplicity and with all its imperfections upon it. I further sincerely trust that after the passing of the Act in its naked simplicity, we may have a General Election, so that we may take the sense of the county constituencies upon the subject. In that case, I am perfectly confident that the gentlemen who now sit opposite will be sitting very shortly on these Benches.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As I had the honour of being a Member of the Committee to which the hon. Member has referred, I should like to say a few words. The hon. Member attached great importance to certain grievances, but the amount of that importance is nothing as compared with that which he attaches to his Party allegiance, because, sooner than have those grievances removed, he would like to see the Bill passed through without dealing with them at all, in order that his own Party may have the greater success at the General Election. The Instruction has nothing in the world to do with the matters to which the hon. Member has called attention. The hon. Member proposed to amend the mode although the mode was adopted the Tithe only applied happened Member did revise the while citi Committee ber did no mittee, w every one of. The majority of the Committee did not agree with the hon. Member as to the effect of the evidence given before them, and in more than one instance, on the points to which he has referred, the hon. Member was himself in a minority of one.

*MR. SEALE HAYNE: Pardon me. Only on one occasion.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Well, on one occasion at all events. I will not now deal with these points, but the hon. Member's arguments respecting them are answered in the Report of the Committee. If any hon. Member thinks that the averages are taken on a wrong basis, I would advise him to study the evidence and Report before making any suggestions to the House on the subject. So far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned they will abide by the Report, and they are not prepared to legislate on these points. With regard to the Instruction now before the Committee, the right hon. Gentleman did not adduce one argument in its support. It is obvious that if the House were to agree to the Instruction it must defeat the Bill, and it is obvious also that the right hon. Gentleman desires to effect that object without in the slightest degree showing his own hand as to the manner in which the alteration suggested in his Instruction should be brought about.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman seems to regard it as a fatal objection to the Instruction that it would put an end to the Bill. I should have thought that what has happened to-night might have shown him that the defeat of the Bill would not be regretted by either side of the House. It is with the greatest difficulty, and only by votes given very much against the grain, that the Government have secured a narrow majority. But how is this Instruction to be fatal to the Bill? Because, the principle of the Bill being that it is to be only against one party, the tenant farmer, the Government say it will be fatal to their Bill if countervailing justice be done to the other party. There are really three parties to the tithe question—the tithe owner, the tithe payer, and the tithe debtor. It is a curious thing that the debtor is the landowner, and the payer is the tenant farmer. The Government are legislating in favour of the tithe owner. They refuse to legislate against the tithe debtor; and they put the whole stress of the Bill on the tithe payer. In taxation it is always considered a great evil to make the trader advance the taxes. But this is what the Bill does to the tenant farmer. The Home Secretary says, "We will get at the landowner through the tenant, who shall be made to advance the tithe." The Chairman of Committees in his acute speech has pointed out what the consequence will be if the tithe exceeds the rent. It is said you cannot interfere with the contract between landlord and tenant under which the latter has to pay tithe. The conclusive answer is, you are affecting the condition of one of the parties, and, if you do that, you must redress the situation of the other. Stand by the contract if you like and leave the tenant alone; but if you must choose to meddle with the tenant you must, in legal phrase, reform the contract. You have no business to say there is one contract, and only one, that is sacred, and that is the contract between the landlord and the tenant. There is one contract that is quite as sacred, and that is the Parliamentary contract of 1836. This is a solemn contract into which Parliament entered with the parties to the transaction and with the tenant farmer first and mainly. The Act says:—

A County Court Judgment would impose a "personal" liability on the tenant farmer, and that would be a deliberate violation of the statutory compact. The Government talk about the "agricultural interest," but we know very well what they mean by it. They mean the parson and the squire; and they do not mean the tenant farmer and the labourer. The Bill gives to the parson a facility for getting his tithe which he does not opened, but that there is not time to do it this Session. An hon. Member just now talked about the insincere position taken up by Members on this side; but I would ask whether there is any man in this House at this moment who in his heart of hearts believes that the Government is going to devote the next Session of Parliament to re-opening the tithe question. A very high authority—a gentleman in the most intimate confidence of Her Majesty's Government—has told us what they are going to do next Session, and I venture to say that that will occupy our whole time from the very day of the reading of the Queen's Speech to the day of prorogation, and there will be no Tithe Bill whatsoever next Session. This, therefore, is our only chance of dealing with the tithe question. We have not asked the Government on the 12th August to prolong the Session; indeed, we were quite willing on this side to give the Government every facility for bringing the Session to a close, and if hon. Gentlemen are kept here late it is entirely the fault of the Government which has thrown down the gauntlet, and has said that the settlement of the tithe question is of supreme importance, and that they are entitled to ask Parliament to sit on and do this work. Well, if the Government say that, we say we will have no half-hearted re-settlement. If the tithe settlement is to be re-opened in the interests of the tithe owner, it must also be re-opened in the interests of the tithe payer, and in the interests of the cultivator of the soil. The President of the Board of Trade has complained that we have not indicated in what direction we want this question re-opened. Now, Sir, we hold, first, that as rent has gone down since 1836, so tithe also ought to go down if the settlement is to be re-opened. If land was in 1836 paying a rent of 30s. per acre, and it is now only paying 15s. per acre, then the tithe which in 1836 amounted to 5s. per acre, ought to be reduced proportionately with the rent. I am not saying that that is right or that that is the contention we shall put before the House with reference to the re-opening of the question. We say, secondly, that the mode on which the averages are calculated is unsound, imperfect, and misleading. The right hon. Gentleman has referred us to the Report of the Committee. I have referred to the Report of that Committee; and I will not detain the House now by reading a number of extracts from the evidence which I have in my hand; but I may say that the testimony of men like Mr. Duckham and Mr. Clare Sewell Reade shows that the present mode of calculating the averages puts an additional burden on the land equal to at least 10 per cent. These are grave questions which cannot be settled in four or five minutes. We also complain that a large quantity of wheat and oats is not brought into the calculation. There are these three great questions to be dealt with. The right hon. Gentleman says, "I shall stand by the Report of the Committee," and he refers my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby to that Report. But the Committee did not accept the Chairman's Report. We cannot accept the Report of the Committee, which was carried by a narrow majority, as any settlement of the Newnes). If the Government were as honest as we should like them to be they would have moved in this direction by a Motion to revise the settlement under the Commutation Act. I do not know how far the Government have reviewed that Act, but certainly they are now doing their best to revise it by the proposition which is before the House; and I think that before they accuse the tenant farmers of breach of contract, they ought to have tried to have put their friends—the landlords—right first, because, undoubtedly, the landlords were the first to break the contract. They repudiated entirely the conditions of the Commutation Act by forcing the tenant farmers, against their will, to become responsible for the payment of tithe, instead of paying it themselves. I believe that is the sole reason for the present disturbances in Wales. They are entirely due to the plain dereliction of duty on the part of the landlords. If I understand it aright, the landlords refuse to carry out this part of the compact under the settlement of 1836. Under that Act it was never intended that the tenant should be liable. In fact, the settlement was made for the very purpose of putting an end to the payment of tithes by the tenant, because the payment of tithes by the tenant had caused so much irritation between the clergy and the agriculturalists of the country that it was found advisable to commute it into a rent-charge payable by the landlord, and that the tenant should be introduced only in the character of a “go-between.” We are told that the settlement was a masterly piece of legislation. Why, if it was a masterly piece of legislation, do the present Government propose to disturb it in the interests of one party only, and to the detriment of the poorer of the two parties? I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon, when he said that two wrongs do not make a right. Even the Conservative Press in Wales is against the Government. The Western Daily Mail, a Conservative journal, in its to-day’s issue says, speaking of this Bill and the present action of the Government, “We fear that it will aggravate the evil and make the relations between the clergy and their parishioners more unpleasant than ever.” The Home Secretary says that this Bill affords an easy mode of collecting the tithe; but the Conservative Press do not even agree with that, for the Mail says, “It is a mistake to suppose that the present proposal will in any way make it easier to collect tithes in Wales.” The tenant farmers of Wales will look upon this Bill as an attempt to threaten and coerce them into paying tithes to an alien Church, and in that is to be found the real difference between the English and the Welsh tenants farmers. This proposition will only cause irritation in Wales, and I am sorry to think of what may take place if the Government persist in pushing the Bill through. If there is not time now for the full settlement of the question, and to do justice to all classes, instead of doing an injustice to one class, and that one the poorer class, it surely will be far better to allow the present state of things to continue.

*MR. T. E. ELLIS: I desire, Mr. Speaker, to give reasons for the vote I am about to give, and I think I may say that if the Government desire to get this Bill through they had better allow the Welsh Members, who are most concerned in this matter, to have their say upon the subject. You have not yet got into Committee on the Bill, and you had better give us fair play and enable us to state our case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, in reference to the settlement of 1836, said it touched three great interests—namely, the Church, the tithe-payer, and the landlord. I believe that the statesmen of that period felt in coming to that settlement that they were dealing with a still larger interest, and that was the interest of the nation itself. Before 1836 the tithe, as the hon. and learned Member for Harrow has told us, was merely a customary payment, but it had been productive of irritation, and if the hon. Member in their leisure moments will read the voluminous Reports of the Poor Law Commission, which sat for many years before 1836, they will find that the agitation against tithe and discontent at the payment of it was almost universal over the whole of England, and far more widespread than is the discontent now prevailing in Wales. The statesmen of 1836 felt that, unless they put the payment of tithe on some new basis it would be lost altogether, and they looked upon their work as saving a great property for the nation itself. Therefore the Act of 1836 was a settlement in favour not of a particular class, but of the whole nation. What we ask to-night in this Instruction is that if you revise and review that settlement, you should do it not in the interests of the tithe-owner, but in the interest of the cultivator of the soil, and above all, in the interests of the nation. One of the cardinal points of the Bill of 1836 was that the tithe was not made a personal debt. Section 67 of the Act of 1836 indicates plainly and in so many words that it is not to be a personal debt; but, at the same time, it had to be recovered in some way or other, and, therefore, the tithe was put not upon the landlord as such, not upon the tenants, but upon the produce of the land. Now, in this Bill you take away that, and yet you retain all the other anomalies of the Bill of 1836. You have thrown down the challenge to us in Wales, and I say that we have a perfect right, as representing the people of Wales, to ask that this House shall go thoroughly into the whole question.

It being midnight, Mr. Speaker rose to interrupt the Business.

Whereupon, Mr. W. H. SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move that the Question be now put.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 165; Noes 124.—(Div. List, No. 299.)

Question put accordingly—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to review and revise the settlement made by the Act passed in the sixth and seventh years of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intitled 'An Act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales,' and the Acts amending the same."

Mr. T. E. Ellis

The House divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 155.—(Div. List, No. 300.)

Committee deferred till to-morrow.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS (No. 2) BILL. (No. 360.)

As amended, considered; Amendments made; Bill read third time, and passed.

SUPPLY (21st June)—REPORT.

Order for Consideration of postponed. Resolutions read.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

(1.) "That a sum, not exceeding £79,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charges for Half Pay, &c, of Field Marshals, and of General, Regimental, and Departmental Officers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890."

(2.) "That a sum, not exceeding £1,186,600, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the charge for Retired Pay, Retired Full Pay, and Gratuities for Reduced and Retired Officers, including Payments awarded by the Army Purchase Commissioners, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

Question proposed, "That the House do agree with the Committee in the said Resolutions."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): According to a promise made when these Votes were discussed in Committee, I ask leave to make a statement as to the mode in which we intend to deal with the general officers' list. It may be in the recollection of the House that a good deal of evidence on this subject was given before the Select Committee on Army Estimates last year, and that in the Report of the Committee the question of reducing the number of general officers according to proposals which had been made was pressed upon the special attention of the Government. We have, therefore, given to the subject a very careful consideration, and the scheme which we have adopted will, as we believe, accomplish all the objects that are desired, and, at the same time, deal justly and tenderly with the important interests involved. The present list of general officers, independent of the Staff Corps, consists of 10 generals, 35 lieutenant generals, and 95 major generals, or a total of 140, which is far in excess of the number of appointments. Promotion to the rank of major general is at present regulated partly by selection and partly by seniority. The result is that a certain proportion of the major generals' list is composed of officers who have never been, and never will, be employed as general officers. The principle of the new scheme is that when it comes into full operation no one will be promoted to the rank of major general except to fill an appointment allotted to that rank. In other words, selection will be introduced in the least invidious form for every promotion. Selection to fill an appointment will apply also to the promotion from the rank of major general to that of lieutenant general, but there will remain a fixed establishment of 10 generals as at present. This is retained as a reward to distinguished general officers. The application of this principle cannot take place all at once. The claims of many existing general officers and of purchase officers generally, are so indisputable that time must be allowed to bring it into effect. The scheme will, therefore, only begin to operate on December 31, 1890, and the reduction in the present numbers will then be gradually effected according to previous precedents in case of reduction of numbers. Moreover, all officers who were on the establishment of general officers in December, 1886, will retain their rights as to promotion. Nor is it possible to limit the number in each grade to the exact number of appointments to be filled, because it must necessarily happen that at the close of a five years' appointment there may be not another vacant appointment available, and therefore what may be called a "backwater" is allowed for in the form of a certain excess in the number of general officers in each grade over and above the number of appointments. Retirement on the ground of non-employment will then be abolished. It is proposed to fix the establishment of full generals at 10, and to abolish the establishment in the other grades, substituting a maximum of 20 lieutenant generals and 70 major generals. This will involve a possible maximum number of 100 general officers, showing a reduction of 40; but according to the report of the actuaries it is probable that the normal number will, under existing conditions, be about 90. The same principles, as I have described, will be applied to the case of the Indian Staff Corps. The vested interests of officers are adequately provided for. The maintenance of the present establishment for general officers of 1886 and earlier and the gradual system by which the reduction in number is to be effected have already been mentioned. But, in addition, it is clear that this reduction will effect also the prospects of colonels. It is therefore intended, in order to compensate them for their loss of prospect, and in view of the fact that the rank of colonel is also now restricted to selection to fill an appointment, a power has been reserved to grant to colonels who have been employed as such after December 31, 1890, and retired at the age of 57, retired pay at the rate of £500 instead of the present rate (£450 for Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, and £420 for other arms of the Service, the age being 55.). The pension for colonels' widows is also to be raised from £90 to £100 a year. It will be seen that by this scheme the object will have been accomplished of largely reducing the present numbers, of introducing the principle of selection in its best form, and of creating a list of general officers, all of whom will have been qualified for appointment to that rank, and ought to be the picked men of the Army. The net financial result, after making allowance for the increased retired pay to colonels already mentioned, is estimated to be a saving of £22,000. But I do not put forward these proposals on the ground of economy; I advance them on the grounds of the increased efficiency which will be secured. We are trying to deal justly with every claim which is put forward. I hope that in this short statement I have been able to make clear the general effects of our scheme.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The Secretary for War rather glided over the point as to when the scheme would come into operation, and I should be glad if he would give us some further information on the point. As far as I understand it no step will be taken under the new scheme until 1890, and up to that date progress will be regulated according to precedent. This is extremely ambiguous. It is further stated by the right hon. Gentleman that the claims of all general officers will be considered, especially of purchase officers; but I do not see why the claims of non-purchase officers should not be considered exactly in the same way as those of purchase officers. May I ask whether the Engineers and Artillery are going to be shut out from the benefits of the scheme? I repeat that I think the purchase and non-purchase officers should be treated alike under the scheme.

GENERAL C. C. FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I beg to earnestly protest against the scheme in the interests of those officers who have spent their lives and fortunes in the hope of becoming general officers. I hope another opportunity will be given on which the House can fully discuss the matter.

*SIR WALTER BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I think my hon. and gallant Friend must be mistaken if he fears the Engineer and Artillery officers will not come under the scheme. But I should like to ask the Secretary for War how he proposes to deal with the colonels? I understand that under this scheme some will be left entirely out in the cold and will get no promotion whatever. Is it the case that the scheme will apply only to those who have been actively employed lately? There may be some who have not had the good fortune to be so employed, but who have yet done excellent service, and I should like to ask my right hon. Friend how he proposes to deal with these men who have served with distinction and are still colonels in the Army?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I think the hon. and gallant Member for Galway was quite right in asking me to explain a little more fully what I meant by "gradual reduction." The reduction will take place in the following way:—Every second vacancy in the rank of major general and every third vacancy in the rank of lieutenant general will be ignored. With regard to the Artillery and Engineers, they are entitled to the full benefit of the scheme just as much as their brethren of the Infantry. With regard to the colonels, the Government propose to give a special retiring allowance of £500 instead of £420 in compensation for the loss of promotion which is involved in the scheme.

COLONEL NOLAN: Is it every second or every third vacancy for major generals will not be "filled up?"

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Every second vacancy.

No. 9.] SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [August 21.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 13th August, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

CEYLON.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies of whom is the Commission, stated to have been appointed by the Governor of Ceylon, to inquire into the alleged evictions and consequent deaths, in parts of Ceylon, composed; and has the attention of the Colonial Office been drawn to a letter, which appeared in the Ceylon Mail of the 29th June, 1889, from Mr. George Wall, in answer to inquiries from the Government agent as to the authority on which the statement had been made that 1,048 villagers, evicted by the Government from their lands for non-payment of Grain Tax, had died of starvation in the vicinity of Nuwara Eliya, in which Mr. Wall says:—

"I find it stated in the Administration Report on the Nuwara Eliya district for 1887, that, between 1882 and 1885, 2,889 paddy fields were sold for default of payment of the Paddy Tax, and, 'that, in the case of the fields so sold, 1,048 of the late owners had died.' That fact is not disputed. The only question is as to the cause of death.

"This seems to me to be sufficiently obvious, it is plainly suggested in the opening paragraph of an appeal on behalf of the Bodi-Ela people, of which the author of the foregoing statement is the prime mover, as follows: 'During the years from 1882 to 1885 large numbers of Kandyan villagers in the Nuwara Eliya district were ejected from their ancestral holdings, by the sale of their paddy lands for default in the payment of Paddy Tax, to lead a wretched life and eke out a miserable existence by pilfering in the villages, migrate to towns and swell the criminal population of the country, or, as was often the case, to die of sheer starvation in the jungle.'"

I wish to add that the question which appears on the Paper is not the question which I handed in to the clerk at the Table.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Commission in question is a Sub-Committee of the Legislative Council. The Secretary of State's attention has been drawn to the passage quoted; but as the matters referred to are alleged to have happened some years ago, and as they are being carefully inquired into, he does not propose to take any further action pending the Governor's Report.

SIR E. WATKIN: Is the Governor of Ceylon now in England, or in Ceylon?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I believe that he is in Ceylon, but I am not sure.

IRELAND—ALLEGED ASSAULT BY THE POLICE.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W. R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on Monday 5th August, Sub-Inspector Wade, of Portumna, and Constable Judge assaulted and threw on the ground an old man, Tom Forde, who had cautioned them against trespassing on private ground, and that Judge drew his sword to frighten or to stab the old man while on the ground, but Sergeant Murphy interfered for his protection; whether Judge is the constable who tore out the hair of a young girl at Tully's eviction; and what action it is intended to take with regard to this constable?

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I will try to obey your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but, as I stated, the hon. Gentleman has hit the weak point of the Bill. I may say that nothing would induce me to support the Government and vote against this Instruction, but the conviction that we shall have a larger measure from them at a later period. I am in sympathy with all of these Instructions, and I think that every man in the House is in sympathy with them—indeed, Her Majesty's Government are in sympathy with them, and I only vote against them because I look on them as insincere—I mean in this respect—that it is utterly impossible that the Government could accept them, inasmuch as they could not be incorporated in the measure at the present time. This is simply a temporary measure, intended to meet a temporary difficulty, created by political agitators in Wales, and, unfortunately, the disease is spreading to certain parts of England. In saying this I have in my eye a country gentleman Magistrate, living in his own mansion, who declined to pay his tithe because the parson would not reduce the amount; and the consequence was that the parson was forced to distrain, the result being that a crowd gathered round the auctioneer, and there was quite a sensation in the neighbourhood. These are disgraceful scenes, and, for my part, I would send such men into any Court I could—a higher one than the County Court, if possible. When you have a man who can pay, and who will not pay, you ought to be able to treat him like an ordinary debtor. However, I do not like treating the tenant farmers, in this respect, as ordinary debtors. The Government, I understand, will insert a clause hereafter that will, in the case of future contracts, throw the onus of the tithe upon the landlord, who, after all, is the person who ought to pay the tithe. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby says we shall render ourselves unpopular, and that some of us will lose our seats over our action on this question, I reply that I, for one, am ready to face that contingency. The tenant farmers of England, and certainly those of Sussex, know that the Bill is not one that is levelled against them, but against disorderly people—

*MR. SPEAKER: I must again remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he is not speaking to the Instruction which is before the House.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg pardon, Sir; but I find it very difficult to steer clear of the rocks and shoals which abound in this discussion. The word "cowardly" has been used against the Government. I do not know how that word was intended to be applied; but I think they are the real cowards who hound on the people to refuse to meet their obligations—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is again wandering from the point.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: I will try, Mr. Speaker, to keep to the point.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman would do better to adhere to my ruling. He has not once touched the subject yet, and I am afraid if he continues in the line he has pursued I shall be obliged to request him to resume his seat.

MR. H. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I rise to support the Instruction now before the House, and will give one or two reasons for so doing. I have a strong conviction that the settlement of 1836 will have to be reviewed, but I desire that when it is reviewed it shall be reviewed in a comprehensive form. I hold in my hand a Petition sent to this House, and signed by Lord Aylesbury and several other Peers, who speak more strongly on this question than any hon. Member who has addressed the House to-night. Among the reasons they give for a review of the Act of 1836 they say that wages have increased to something like 50 per cent in the last 52 years. I am a large tithe-payer myself, and grow a good deal of corn, and I know what that means. They also say that while in 1836 corn was 56s. a quarter, it is now only 36s. or 37s. on the average. If we are to review the Act of 1836, let us not do it in a tinkering way. One hon. Gentleman spoke of the extravagance of the settlement of 1836. Now, I can recollect that settlement, and I tell the hon. Gentleman that the statesmen of that day, whom he was praising, were men who represented the Party on this side of the House, and who were opposed to the Party to which he belongs. The opposition to that settlement was much stronger than anything that has taken place to-night, and I say that hon. Gentlemen should learn its history before coming here to talk upon this question. I feel that we are justified in saying that if we are to reopen this question we should review the whole position, and it will then be seen that the tenant farmers are those who have suffered most. What makes me feel that there is a great deal of dishonesty in politics is that hon. Gentlemen opposite who have said so much in favour of the tenant farmers do not allow us to measure their sympathy for that class. I ask will their sympathy lead them into the Lobby in favour of this Instruction? I desire that in re-opening this question we should do justice to all sides, and especially to that side which has been least considered in this matter. I allude, of course, to the tenant farmers who pay the tithe, but who ought not to have to pay it, and upon whom you wish to press more harshly the obligation which ought to rest on the landowners. I hold in my hand a letter from a distinguished Gentleman who used to be a Member of this House, and who is a tenant farmer. He states that—

“Owing to the action of the seven years’ clause the tenants have been paying 10 per cent beyond what they ought to pay, and that, in many cases, the tithe instead of being a tenth, comes up to a quarter, and in some cases to a third, and in some cases to the whole of the rent.”

Now, the settlement of 1836 meant that the payment should be one-tenth only. The writer also says:—

“How any party, how any person professing to have the slightest desire to benefit the tenant farmers can vote for the Bill on this side of the House I cannot imagine.”

Well, Sir, I shall watch the matter in the Lobby presently, and the tenant farmers will also watch what is done.

and if this Instruction is rejected it will be bad for that side of the House.

*MR. SWETENHAM: I desire to say a few words to explain why I, as a County Member, intend to vote against this Instruction. No one can view with greater regret than I do the fact that the Government has not had time during the present Session to review and revise the settlement made by the Act of William IV. That the time has arrived when that Act ought to be reviewed, I am quite satisfied; but it is manifest that at this period of the Session it is impossible to undertake the work. As the hon. Gentleman who moved the Instruction did not specify any of the points on which he proposes revision, I cannot help thinking that what he really means is what has been already discussed.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I did not know it was part of my duty, in moving this Instruction, to state what particular Amendments I proposed to introduce; but if Her Majesty’s Government will accept the Instruction, I am ready to put those Amendments on the Paper to-night.

*MR. SWETENHAM: I was only stating a fact. I wish the House to understand that, in my opinion, it will be absolutely necessary on some future occasion to consider the question of redemption as one of the modes of revising the Act; I also think that another mode of revision will be found in providing that in all future contracts the landowner ought to be the person to pay the tithe. I may also say that I think the Corn Average question is one that presses very severely on persons in the position of the tenant farmers. There are a great many other things that have not been considered, and which I trust may be dealt with in a future Session. I cannot help thinking that when the right hon. Gentleman said the present Bill changed the nature of the debt, he was in reality resorting to what he will forgive me for calling a quibble. The Bill does not change the nature of the debt; all it proposes is to change the nature of the remedy for recovering the tithe rent-charge, which is practically a debt on the land. The right hon. Gentleman, had not read the Bill carefully, would he have said the tithe was made a charge on the tenants' personal estate. It does not in any way make the tenant personally liable, any further than does the Act of William IV.; on the contrary, it specially safeguards him, so that the tenants' personal estate shall not in future be liable beyond what is provided by that Act. The last speaker asked what extra power does this Bill propose to confer.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is going beyond the Instruction, which is

*MR. SWETENHAM: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and would not have ventured into that part of the question had I not thought the hon. Gentleman to whom I have referred was in order in the allusion he made to it. I will no longer stand between the House and a Division, and will merely say I do not support this Instruction, because, as the last speaker has said, although it may do right to the tithe-owner and limit the wrong done to the tenant farmer, it nevertheless would unduly overweight the Bill and imperil its passage at this period of the Session.

MR. GRAY: I never admitted that I thought it would be right to the tithe-owner.

*MR. S. RENDEL: I would observe that only one Welsh Member has spoken in reference to this Instruction, and that hon. Gentleman sits on the opposite side of the House. I think if any section of the House should receive indulgence on this occasion it is that to which the Welsh Members belong. We have been plainly told that we are responsible for copying Parliament with such a measure at this untimely season. We are told that this measure is of our making, and this is said even by those who are otherwise opposed to the Bill, and only assent to it in consequence of the view they take of the conduct of the Welsh people in this matter. The hon. Member for Maldon, for instance, adjured the Welsh Members to do their best to see that law and order are henceforth better maintained on this subject, and again, the hon. Member for Harwich, who dislikes the Bill, told us that he was prepared to support the Bill because of what is going on in Wales in regard to this subject. I doubt whether the hon. Member has a large proportion of the opinion of his constituents with him on this matter. To put this matter of breach of law in as succinct a form as I can, I refer to the charge delivered by Mr. Justice Field when opening the Summer Assizes for Montgomeryshire. The learned Judge then alluded to the general improvement that had taken place in regard to the observance of the law, and he expressed his satisfaction at the peaceful character of the tithe demonstration in that and the neighbouring counties. Latterly you have had the Welsh farmers resisting the payment of tithes up to the point of being turned out of their farms, and if all you do now is simply to enact a law by which they can be taken to the County Court, instead of having their goods distrained upon, the result will be very disappointing to those who believe that this measure will have a beneficial operation.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. Member is travelling beyond the scope of the Instruction.

*MR. S. RENDEL: I bow to your ruling, Mr. S. in conclusion, tion may be c be possible to and tithe-pay tion that some behalf to r onerous than of adopting a Government the evil by attempting to pass a Bill under which the mischief will merely take a new channel, and in Wales, at any rate, I can assure them that they will find the last condition worse than the first.

MR. NEWNES (Cambridge, E., Newmarket): As a large number of my constituents are interested in this question, I trust I may be allowed to occupy a few minutes of the time of the House, more especially as I do not often trouble it. I think, Sir, the number of Instructions that have been put on the Paper in order to enlarge the scope of this Bill affords proof of the bald, imperfect, and incomplete state in which the measure is now presented. Indeed, the Government have admitted this, because they have promised next Session to introduce something that will be more satisfactory. But although this promise has been made, one of the most ardent and loyal of the supporters of the Government, the hon. and gallant Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot), has risen in his place and stated that he has long ceased to place any reliance on the promises made by the Government of legislation on the tithes question. If their own supporters cannot rely upon them, I am sure they can hardly expect us to do so. They say that another time they will give us a full and complete measure; but if there is time now to look after the interests of the landlords, there is also time—or there ought to be—to look after the interests of the tenants, and at any rate it is not fair for them to produce a one-sided result as this Bill certainly will do. I venture to say on the question of time that, if necessary, rather than do such a gross injustice, as I am sure this will prove to be, we ought to stop here till Christmas in order to do justice. This, Mr. Speaker, is a very large question indeed, and it is one which admittedly requires re-opening and re-settlement. The Government have admitted this, because they are promising us a settlement next Session. But I venture to say that to open it now in the closing hours of this Session in the interests of one party—the party of landlords—against the interests of the tenants, is a very strange method indeed for the Government to adopt in regard to the tenant farmers of this country for the continuous support which they have given to the Tory Party. I can assure the House that though it is not so in Wales, or in Ireland, the tenant farmers of England are the bulwarks of the Conservative Party; and this is how they are treated by the Government. Nothing will satisfy the overburdened tithe-payers of England but an entire re-opening of the settlement of 1836, and an adjustment of the question in the way we suggest in the Instruction of my right hon. Friend. The English farmers have borne their troubles with great patience; but I believe their patience is rapidly becoming exhausted, and this piece of business on the part of the Conservatives will open their eyes. If the Conservative Party desire to retain the support which has been so loyally given them by the tithe-payers in the past, they will, even at the eleventh hour, withdraw this one-sided and pernicious Bill.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Instruction of my right hon. Friend raises the whole case which we have against this Bill, and the Division which the House is now about to take is really, I think, the most crucial Division we shall have taken the whole of this evening. I want, for a moment or two, to recall the attention of the House to what really is the point in dispute. By this Instruction my right hon. Friend asks the House to give the Committee power to revise the whole settlement of 1836, and he asks for that power because the Government propose to re-open that settlement with respect to one branch of it only. The only answer we have as yet received is not that the settlement ought not to be re-opened, for everyone admits that it ought to be re-

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, line 5, to leave out "entitled to a sum," in order to insert the words, "claiming money."—(Mr. Staveley Hill.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not quite sure that I apprehend the extent to which my hon. Friend desires to go. Does he desire anybody who is not entitled to receive tithe to recover judgment for that tithe and then to proceed to execution? That is what his words would enable anybody to do.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: The right hon. Gentleman misinterprets me altogether. If a man goes into Court, he must go into Court as claiming money; and if he does that, you at once invite the defendant to raise the question of title, because you say "entitled to a sum."

MR. MATTHEWS: If you take away the word "entitled," you apparently deprive the defendant of the power of raising the question whether the plaintiff is entitled, and that is certainly not what we intend. My hon. and learned Friend grew pathetic over the incumbent who may have to defend his title. He may have to do that now. If the defendant disputes the title, in an action of replevin, all the points of title to the tithe will have to be raised and have to be fought by the tithe-owner or the persons claiming the tithe. It ought to be observed that the points of title that arise in a case of tithe are extremely small. The advantage of the mode proposed by the Bill is that you have to fight the point of law, in the first instance, before the trouble and expense of an execution. Under the arbitrary remedy of distress, you begin by taking the goods, and then you settle the point of law. That is a cumbrous way of doing it. But here you settle it in the first instance. Our intention certainly is, that if there is any doubt about the title of the claimant, that doubt shall be settled by the County Court Judge. With regard to the word "sum," I really cannot understand the verbal criticism. It means the amount of the rent-charge, and how my hon. and learned Friend can think it means anything else I cannot conceive. But if he is in doubt I am willing to add the words "sum of money," and not of anything else.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The question raised is very important. As I understand the right hon. Gentleman's argument, this section is to give unlimited jurisdiction to the County Court Judge. There are cases in which the tithe is £500 a year, and instances may arise in which the greatest legal experience will be required to go into the question of title. The County Court Judge, if this Bill passes as it is, will have a more important duty imposed upon him than any he has had before.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: In the first place, I am entirely of opinion that the clause is not a work of art, for the word "entitle" has been used, when it clearly ought to be "claim." Although it is a small matter, I do hope the word "claim" will be adopted. With reference to the jurisdiction of the County Court, it has been constituted by about 30 Acts of Parliament, and has been extended in every direction, but in every instance it has always been limited as to amount. There is not a single instance, I believe, in which jurisdiction has been given without limitation.

THE CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. Gentleman that the words of the clause are "whatever the amount may be."

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I would venture to suggest that the word "entitled" ought to be struck out.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I should be very sorry indeed if, in a case of this kind, the defendants were shut out from making any defence by raising the question of title.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is not a very material point, but I should have thought the Home Secretary would have seen that if a man claims who has no title, that want of title will be urged against his claim. But to start by saying that a man who goes into Court is entitled, is determining the very thing which may be disputed. It is not only bad drafting, but it is begging the whole question. I would strongly urge the Government to take the ordinary way; but to say before he goes into Court that he is entitled to a sum of money is, in a logical sense, putting the cart before the horse.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think we need occupy the time of the Committee with this minor point. Nobody can be in any doubt about the general scheme of the Bill, and I think the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman is rather strong. The words "entitled to a sum" of money is a form which occurs in several Acts of Parliament, including the Lands Clauses Act. I would suggest the words—"person claiming to be entitled."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, after "purchase," to insert the words "person claiming to be entitled."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I beg to move that after the word "sum," the words "not exceeding £20" be there inserted. This section will give unlimited jurisdiction to the County Courts. It is perfectly true that questions of title as to tithe are of comparatively rare occurrence, but they notoriously do involve abstruse questions of law; yet by this Bill we call upon the County Court Judge at once to give a decision. The lay impropriator may at once get a decision in the County Court, after which his claim cannot be ousted throughout by the Amendment. The jurisdiction of the County Court is limited to £20 a year, and that would apply to the Section as it now stands. There will be very few cases of tenant farmers in which the amount is for more than £20, and if this remedy is to be granted, I think it ought to be limited to £20. I beg to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, after the word "sum," to insert the words "not exceeding twenty pounds."
—(Mr. Arthur Williams)

SIR W. HARCOURT: This clause gives universal jurisdiction to the County Courts in all questions of tithe, and not merely as to the amount to be recovered. It is really making a Bill, with small objects, give universal and unlimited jurisdiction to the County Courts on all questions of real property so far as they are connected with tithe. It is a most extraordinary thing to be introduced into a Bill of this kind.

Then I observe that the Home Secretary proposes to introduce an Amendment making the County Court judgment final and conclusive. In the ordinary way, there is an appeal to the Superior Courts; but here the County Courts will decide in respect of property worth hundreds of thousands of pounds. The Home Secretary has actually got on the Paper an Amendment to prevent the ordinary forms of appeal from the County Court to the Superior Courts, and all this in the name of the poor clergy in Wales. Was there ever such a preposterous Bill drawn with such carelessness, such recklessness, such obvious want of consideration of the consequences involved as this? Surely there ought to be some limitation of the jurisdiction of the Court.

*MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman's criticisms are not always couched in conciliatory language, and the draftsman will appreciate his compliments. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that part of the intention of the Amendment I have on the Paper, and which has called forth his sarcasm, is simply putting into proper language an Amendment which the hon. Member for West Monmouthshire has put upon the Paper. It aims more certainly, in my opinion, at preventing the removal of any payment for tithe to a Superior Court for the purpose of getting execution upon it in places in which the jurisdiction of the County Court does not extend or run. In my judgment the clause is already effective for the purpose, though I did offer to put an Amendment on the Paper preventing a removal of judgment to the High Court. It is not necessary to remove it under Section 21 of the County Courts Act, 1848, and the appeal remains. The right hon. Gentleman says we intend to give the County Court jurisdiction in cases of title. Undoubtedly we do. The whole remedy would be useless otherwise. There may be cases in which title to real property is involved, but they are so rare that so far as my knowledge goes there is not a single one. Most of the titles to tithes are perfectly clear, and in many instances there is no title to prove. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, Colleges, Schools, lay impropriators and other large bodies have no title to prove. They have perpetual

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that the District Inspector with some constables was engaged in preventing the ringing of the chapel bell which had been commenced with a view to assemble a crowd to obstruct a bailiff in the discharge of his duty. Forde alleges that he was assaulted and has summoned both the District Inspector and the constable named, the case being now sub judice. The police deny the allegation that they assaulted him.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that the net amount annually received from the sale of Government publications in the United Kingdom averaged for the six years 1878-9 to 1883-4 about £20,650, but rose in the year 1884-5 to the abnormal amount of £34,810, falling in the two next years to £31,143 and £24,526 respectively; whether when tenders were invited in 1885 for the sole agency for the sale of Government publications in England and Wales only, £36,000 was stated to be the likely amount of the gross annual sale; whether this sum was based upon actual experience of sales effected or partly on estimate; and, if the latter, what was the proportion estimated for, and why, if the year selected was an exceptional year or the amount largely speculative, it was not so stated in regard to tenders invited by a Government Department; whether Her Majesty's Stationery Office have made considerable reductions in the sale prices since the present contract was entered into, without any corresponding readjustment of the trade discount or the annual premium paid by the contractor; whether the contractors have explained that no compensating increase in sale can result from the reduction in price; and whether it is in accordance with usual practice that such changes should be made during the currency of the contract?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have not been able to verify all the figures given in the hon. Member's question, but I believe they may be taken as fairly representing the facts; there has no doubt been a falling off since the year 1884-85. The figure of £36,000 was given in the advertisement for tenders, not as an average, but as a rough statement of the sale in the particular year 1884-85, that being the latest year for which the Stationery Office could give a sufficiently complete statement. There was no reason to suppose that the sales in that year would prove to have been exceptionally large. As regards the reduction in the prices which has been made since the date of the contract, I am advised that it does not constitute a breach of the contract. My hon. Friend is probably aware that the contractor has power to terminate the contract by giving notice.

TRAINING SHIPS.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the intended increase in the Fleet, it is intended to increase the number of training ships; and, if so, whether he would arrange for one of these ships to be stationed in Harwich Harbour?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, S.W., Ormskirk): The intended increase to the Fleet will not necessitate any addition to the present number of training ships, and, therefore, I am afraid no hope can be held out of stationing a training ship at Harwich.

ZULULAND.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what British troops are now serving in Zululand, and whether the peace and order of the country have been so recovered as to allow of the early withdrawal of the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons and Royal Scots; and whether he can state the total expense incurred by the employment of British troops in Zululand since the disturbances which took place after the restoration of Usibepu?

BARON H. DE WORMS: (1.) The British garrison in Zululand consists of about 1,000 men, and the Local Authorities advise that the force cannot be reduced until a decision has been come to with regard to the sentence passed on ~~the~~ Zululu and the other Chiefs. (2.) I am informed by the Secretary of State for War that the total military expense caused by the disturbances amounted to £52,000 from April to October, 1888. The extra cost of 600 troops above their cost at another station from 1st December, 1887 (the date of the restoration of Usibepu) to 31st October, 1888, was £7,333. Since October, 1888, the extra cost of 1,000 troops to 31st March, 1889, was £6,842.

Mr. Henry J. Wilson

MR. T. ELLIS: When will the hon. Gentleman be able to lay on the Table the Report of the trial of the Chiefs?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A portion of the Report has been received, and has been laid on the Table; but the full Report is not yet complete.

MR. T. ELLIS: A promise was given that the whole should be laid on the Table early in August, and I find from a reply given to a question in another place that the Report was received some days ago.

BARON H. DE WORMS: A portion only was received and presented to the House some time ago. We are awaiting the concluding portion.

MR. T. ELLIS: May we hope that it will be laid on the Table before the Prorogation?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot give a promise to that effect. That part of the evidence which has been received is very voluminous, and it will have to be printed.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Is it a fact that, on the 24th August, 1888, the Resident Magistrate of the Etshowe District of Zululand sentenced Nratu, alias Umsidusi, to 50 lashes, which were inflicted in 10 instalments? I wish also to ask whether, on the 20th of November, 1887, three men, by name Sikwata, Mahlatini, and Ngunya, were sentenced to 25 lashes each, and were immediately flogged, without previous reference to the Chief Magistrate; and, whether, in January, 1888, Mgongosa, Umlunsuza, and others were flogged at the Ndwande Magistracy without trial and without reference to the Chief Magistrate?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has not received information as to these cases, but he has called for a Return, which will include any that may have taken place in 1888, and will call for particulars as to that which is stated to have occurred in 1887.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, some time ago, in answer to a question by me in reference to one of these cases, that the Secretary of State would cause inquiry to be made.

BARON H. DE WORMS: Inquiry was made, but no answer has yet been received.

IRELAND—SUB-COMMISSIONER ROBERTS.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Roberts, one of the Sub-Commissioners under the Land Law (Ireland) Act, and member of a Court held in Ardee last month, was, during the week, the guest of a Mr. Lee Norman, a local landlord interested in some of the cases tried before the Court; and, whether he will issue instructions to the Sub-Commissioners not to accept hospitality from people who are parties to proceedings in their Courts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I assume that this is a repetition of the question placed on the Paper for the 18th of July, but not then asked by the hon. Member. The Land Commissioners then reported that Mr. Roberts had informed them that he has never been inside Mr. Lee Norman's house, as alleged in the question. Mr. Lee Norman's name did not appear in any way on the list of cases for hearing at Ardee in July before the Sub-Commission, of which Mr. Roberts was a member. The Commissioners have always been most particular in requiring that Assistant Commissioners should not accept of hospitality from anybody while on Circuit, and a rule to this effect has been in operation for years.

LABOURERS' DWELLINGS.

MR. NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recommendations made after an inquiry held by the Local Government Board in October, 1886, into certain schemes for the erection of labourers' dwellings in the Castlebellingham Division of Ardee Union, County Louth, Ireland; and, whether any further steps have been taken in the matter, and, if not, what has been the cause of the delay?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Local Government Board duly made a Provisional Order in connection with the erection of the cottages, and sanctioned a loan for the purpose. The subsequent delay appears to have arisen through informalities in the applications made to the Land Commission to have fair rents fixed for the lands taken, and to the death of the landlord, which rendered further action on the part of the Guardians necessary. The matter, however, is now in a forward state.

MR. NOLAN: Who is responsible for the informality?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the Local Authorities, but I cannot be sure of that.

MR. NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an improvement scheme for the erection of a labourers' dwelling in the townland of Haggardstown was made on the 14th November, 1887, by the Guardians of Dundalk Union, County Louth; that the local inquiry was held on 29th March, 1889; and that no opposition was offered on the part of either landlord or tenant; and, whether the Guardians are still of opinion that a necessity exists for the carrying out of the scheme; and, if so, why the sanction of the Local Government Board is withheld?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are substantially as stated in the first paragraph. The dwelling proposed to be provided by the scheme was intended to replace a house occupied when the scheme was made and condemned by the Medical Officer as unfit for human habitation; but on the Local Government Inspector visiting this house on the occasion of his inquiry, he found it closed and vacant, and learned that the man who occupied it had obtained a house and employment elsewhere. The Local Government Board therefore, on the Inspector's recommendation, declined to sanction the Guardians' proposal on the ground that the new cottage was not required. The Guardians have not made any communication to the Local Government Board showing that necessity now exists for the house referred to.

MR. CONYBEARE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will give the date of the Medical Report which has been received respecting Mr. Conybeare's health; whether it made any, and what, reference to the repeated complaints made by Mr. Conybeare as to the rheumatic affection from which he is suffering, or to the complaints made by Mr. Conybeare respecting the weakness of and pain in his eyes, which he attributes to the whitewashed walls of his cell; whether, inasmuch as Mr. Conybeare complains of suffering constant pain, sometimes so severe as to entirely cripple him and prevent him from walking, he will have further and fuller Reports sent as to Mr. Conybeare's condition; whether it is the fact that on Monday last Mr. Conybeare could get only half an hour's exercise, owing to the wet weather, and on Tuesday he and all other prisoners were confined to their cells the whole day, in consequence of the rain; whether, in view of these facts, he will reconsider his opinion that no sheltered exercise ground is needed; and, whether there is any other prison in England or Ireland in which first-class misdemeanants are confined to one small cell similar to that which Mr. Conybeare is compelled to occupy?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board state that the particular Medical Report as to Mr. Conybeare's health, to which I presume the hon. Member alludes, is dated the 25th of July. This report stated that Mr. Conybeare had a slight attack of lumbago, and one occasion had a slight pain in his shoulder. The Report made no reference to any alleged complaint by Mr. Conybeare respecting his eyesight or the colour of the cell walls. As regards the allegation in the third paragraph, it is stated in a further Report received from the medical officer on Saturday last, that Mr. Conybeare is in good health, that the only thing he has complained to the medical officer of is chronic lumbago, and that in all other respects his bodily health is satisfactory. The Governor of the prison reports that on the previous Monday Mr. Conybeare got not half an hour's exercise, as is alleged in this question, but one hour's exercise. He would not take his afternoon's exercise owing to the inclemency of the weather. On the following day he and the other prisoners, with two exceptions, were prevented from taking exercise in consequence of the rain. The Prisons Board adhere to their opinion that the strongest objection exists to the suggested erection of sheds in prison exercise yards. The Board state that the rule as to first-class misdemeanants, only requires that a "room or cell" shall be provided for such prisoners, and that there are several prisons in Ireland in which only cells are available for the purpose.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is it not the fact that the statute secures to every prisoner a right to two hours' daily exercise in the open air? Seeing the large sums of money annually voted for the repair and maintenance of prisons, will not the right hon. Gentleman instruct the Prisons Board to have sheds erected for daily exercise in inclement weather so that the prisoners may be enabled to keep themselves in health?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can add nothing to what I stated yesterday—namely, that I will make inquiry as to what the practice is in England. In face of the strong objection of the Prisons Board I can make no promise.

MR. W. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): Cannot an order be given for the removal of Mr. Conybeare from a prison which is not in a proper sanitary condition, and in which there is no cell fit for a first-class misdemeanant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member assumes two things—first, that the prison is in an insanitary condition; and, next, that it contains no cell fit for the imprisonment of a first-class misdemeanant. The evidence before me does not support either of those assumptions.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Is it not the fact that the cell occupied by Mr. Conybeare is placed in such a position that it is directly in a draught, and so situated as to make it absolutely necessary that the window of the cell should be kept constantly open, so that the hon. Member has the alternatives of getting rheumatism or of being asphyxiated at night? Will the right hon. Gentleman give directions that Mr.

Conybeare shall be removed to a cell which is in a proper condition, and not sent out of prison at the end of his sentence a complete wreck?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information in regard to the facts mentioned by the hon. Member, but we are continually watching all matters concerning the health of prisoners.

DR. KENNY: Is that a reason why no action should be taken when important facts are brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The mere fact that the hon. Member alleges certain facts does not conclusively prove that they are facts.

DR. KENNY: I allege them on medical authority.

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has got a copy of the Resolution of the Cavan Board of Guardians, requesting the Government to include a line of railway from Oldcastle, in the County of Meath, to Crossdony, in the County of Cavan, via Kilnaleck, in the proposed legislation for the extension of railways in Ireland; and, if he intends giving that Union an answer, and what that answer will be?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A copy of the Resolution mentioned has been forwarded to me. I have already replied to it, to the effect that representations on behalf of any particular scheme will be considered in the event of the Light Railways Bill becoming law. I also alluded to the fact that the Parliamentary Representative of one division of the county was not irresponsible for the obstacles which the promoters of the measure had still to surmount.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whose duty it is to find out whether the Factory Clause, introduced into War Office contracts as a security against sweating, is being properly carried out in each case?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The Director of Contracts will make every effort in his power to secure the enforcement of the Factory

Clause in the War Office contracts as a security against sweating ; but it is exceedingly difficult for the Department to make sure of doing so without a very extensive inspection, and the real security for enforcing it must rest with the workmen themselves.

THE INDIAN FOREIGN OFFICE.

MR. BRADLAUGH : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has received a copy of a letter addressed to Members of this House, intitled, "India. The Queen-Empress's Promises: How they are broken," issued from the Indian Political Agency, and written by Mr. William Digby, C.I.E.; whether he is aware if the statements contained therein are accurate, and the documents quoted, (1) a memorial to the Viceroy from the Chandalin Maharani of Rewa, and (2) an autograph letter from the Maharaja of Kashmir, are authentic; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the allegations in the said letter regarding the administration of affairs controlled by the Indian Foreign Office, in connection with the States of Gwalior, Rampur, Bhopal, Rewa, and Kashmir?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has received a copy of the letter in question. He cannot commend the accuracy of its statements, nor vouch the authenticity of the documents quoted. The Secretary of State declines to institute an inquiry into the administration of Native States by the Government of India at the instance of a private individual. All the Native Chiefs of India can make representations to the Secretary of State through the Government of India, and can appeal to him against any orders which are passed by that Government. No such representations or appeals have been received by the Secretary of State from any of the Native States mentioned in the question.

THE LIMAVADY TRUSTEE BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the average of each individual deposit at the Limavady Trustee Bank in 1887, as given in the Annual Returns, is £14 18s. 11d., whereas the average for the whole of Ireland is only £5 16s. 11d.; and that this extraordinary divergence has existed for several years; whether this fact is prima facie evidence that illegal deposits have been received, and that the Government have paid interest to the trustees on illegal deposits; and whether any steps have been taken by the National Debt Commissioners, in this and similar suspicious cases, to ascertain if illegal deposits are taken, and to prevent frauds upon the Exchequer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member has correctly stated the average individual deposits in the Limavady Savings Bank, as represented in the Parliamentary Return, as £14 18s. 11d., whereas the average for the whole of the Irish Savings Banks is £5 16s. 11d. There are Irish Savings Banks, however, where the average individual deposits are still higher than in the case of Limavady; while there are some where the average deposits appear to be abnormally low. The high average in the case of Limavady does not necessarily imply that there has been any illegality, and, so far as the National Debt Commissioners can determine, the figures supplied may be correct. The accounts of the Savings Bank rendered to those Commissioners show the deposits in the year 1887 to have amounted to £9,552, and the payments to £8,886. The Parliamentary Return shows that there were 639 receipts, averaging £14 18s. 11d. each, equivalent to a total of £8,886. There is nothing on the face of these figures sufficiently suspicious to justify any special inquiry of the trustees.

THE DECCAN MINES COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can tell who is responsible for the fact that the Index to the Report of the Deccan Mines Committee of the 6th August, 1886, has been distributed on 9th August, 1889; and, if measures can be taken to check the waste of public money in printing Papers when they are quite out of date?

MR. JACKSON: I have not been able to get sufficiently full and complete information to enable me to answer the question of the hon. Gentleman; but I am bound to admit, at once, that the index to a Report nearly 12 months behind time is altogether unjustifiable. Measures will be taken to obviate the recurrence of a similar inconvenience.

THE LICENSING LAW.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Clerks to Justices of the city of Manchester in summoning a meeting of the Justices to appoint a Committee under the 38th Section of "The Licensing Act, 1872," and for other business connected with the approaching Brewster Sessions, have appended the following notice:—

"N.B.—We desire to call the attention of the Justices to the interpretation of the Licensing Law, as given by the Law Officers of the Crown, which is in effect that no person can act as a Licensing Justice who is a shareholder in any Company (Railway or otherwise) which is a retailer of any Intoxicating Liquor in the Licensing District for which he acts or in the adjoining district."

Whether, in fact, a railway shareholder in a company having licensed premises in the county or city or the adjoining county, city, or borough for which he acts, and who may sign an occasional license, or act at any sessions for transfer of licenses, or for other purposes under the Licensing Act except as to fining for drunkenness or breach of the Licensing Laws, is liable to a penalty of £100; and, whether, in the event of the Railway Shareholders (Licensing Sessions) Bill being withdrawn, owing to the late period of the Session, the Government will bring in a Bill next Session to relieve shareholders in railway and other companies from the disqualification and penalties for acting as Justices at Licensing Sessions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have no information as to the facts stated in the first paragraph of my hon. Friend's question. As to the second paragraph, I am advised that a railway shareholder in a company having licensed premises in the places described is disqualified from acting as justice in the places in any cases but those excepted in Section 60 of the Licensing Act of 1872; and if he acts knowingly he appears to be liable to a penalty. As to the third paragraph, the Government will consider the suggestion of my hon. Friend; but he must excuse me from giving a pledge as to legislation next Session.

THE IRISH POLICE AND PRIVATE MEETINGS.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, at a meeting held in the private dwelling of a Mr. Bagnall, at Tallaght, in the County of Dublin, on the 28th of July last, to consider questions relating to the Dublin and Blessington Tramway, a force of Constabulary, accompanied by a Government note-taker, demanded admission to the meeting; what justification had the police for this intrusion; and will directions be given to prevent a repetition of such conduct on the part of the Constabulary at Tallaght?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It appears that the meeting was summoned by placard, to protest against the tramway, and it was to have been held in the open air, but was afterwards adjourned to Mr. Bagnall's house. The police on being refused admission made no attempt to enter the house, and, therefore, there was no intrusion.

THE CANADIAN MAIL SERVICE.

DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General, whether he has received a copy of a resolution passed unanimously by the Cork Harbour Commissioners, at their meeting on the 7th instant, in support of the memorials of the Londonderry Corporation and the Chamber of Commerce, addressed by those bodies to the Government on the subject of the alleged proposed change in the Canadian mail service, whereby Foyle would cease to be a port of call for said mails; and whether the Government have any such change in contemplation; and, if so, whether they will abandon it, and leave undisturbed the existing arrangements?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I have received from Cork a copy of a memorial addressed by the corporation of that city to the Prime Minister on the subject of the Canadian mail service.

The mail service between this country and Canada is provided by the Canadian Government; and I can only repeat the statement made on the 1st inst. by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies that the subject is one for that Government to deal with. The Imperial Post Office has really no voice in the matter.

DR. KENNY: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies to communicate with the Canadian Government on the subject, in order to prevent the Foyle from ceasing to be a port of call?

*MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member had better address a question to my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies. The question is rather one for the Colonial Office than the Post Office.

THE MINES INSPECTORS' REPORTS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he can now state when the Mines Inspectors' Reports will be available to Members? Whether it is a fact that these Reports have been in the possession of the Government since March last? And, whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to ensure an earlier issue of these Reports next Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: The final proofs of the Mines Inspectors' Reports have been in the printers' hands for more than a week, and I hope the Reports will be ready for issue in the course of a day or two. The Reports have been in possession of the Government since March last; but when the manuscripts were in course of being set up it was decided for the purposes of economy and convenience to alter the usual manner of printing and presenting the Reports, and this has led to a considerable delay. I will do all I can to secure an earlier issue next Session.

MR. HOWELL: Would it not be possible to give a summary of these Reports earlier in the Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid that that would be throwing on the Inspectors an additional amount of labour beyond the scope of their ordinary duty; but I will consider the suggestion of the hon. Member.

Mr. Raikes.

THE ULSTER AND TYRONE CANALS.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in accordance with the provisions of "The Ulster and Tyrone Navigation Act, 1888," the agreement of transfer has been ratified; whether the company has commenced to repair the Ulster and Tyrone Canals, and, if so, to what extent; whether the Treasury has yet paid over to the company any money; and whether the Treasury has negotiated, or is in process of negotiating, a loan to the company?

*MR. JACKSON: The agreement referred to has been completed, and the canal has been handed over to the Lagan Navigation Company, who have begun to repair it and to receive instalments of the Parliamentary grant. I am sorry that, owing to the absence of notice of the question, I cannot give the hon. Member particulars of the amount of repairs done by the company, and of the amount of advances from the grant made to them; but I may say that the amount of the advances is determined by the progress of the work. No loan, so far as I know, is in process of negotiation at the present time.

MR. JORDAN: Is it the fact that money has been paid over to the company by the Treasury?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes, some money has been paid over under the agreement, but I am not able to state the amount because I have not yet had time to make the necessary inquiries.

MR. JORDAN: If I repeat the question on Friday will the hon. Gentlemen give me the information?

*MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

IRELAND—LAND ACT—RENTS IN KILKENNY.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, since the passing of "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887," any applications by leaseholders were heard for that part of county Kilkenny which is in the union of Waterford; whether notices of application by leaseholders from that district, entered before 29th September, 1887, are still unheard; whether the landlords, in those cases, have exacted the undeducted rents from which relief was sought; and, whether tenants, who lands are valued at more than £50, have any protection from the execution for the recovery of ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry that I have not yet been able to obtain the necessary information to enable me to answer the question.

MR. CHANCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to answer the question if I repeat it on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope so.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in 1888, Returns were made by the Enumerator of Agricultural Statistics, concerning the farm of Mr. James Bowes, of Huntstown, Tullaroan, County Kilkenny, during the imprisonment of Mr. Bowes, under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887;" whether the information contained in such Returns was obtained from Mr. Bowes or with his consent; whether such information was, in fact, supplied by the police; and, whether steps will be taken to secure that in this case inaccurate and misleading statements will not be included in the official agricultural statistics.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Registrar General reports that the information concerning the farm was furnished to the police in 1888 by "Alick Flood," but whether by Mr. Bowe's permission or not there is no information. The information is included in the Returns already presented to Parliament.

THE DUBLIN DEAD LETTER OFFICE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if a Catholic official of long standing and high character has been recently removed from the Dublin Dead Letter Office, and an Orangeman put in his stead; upon what grounds were the changes made; and upon whose initiative and recommendation?

*MR. RAIKES: I understand that on the 20th of April last, and again from the 14th to the 31st ultimo, the Principal Officer in charge of the Returned Letter Office in Dublin was absent, and that Mr. Maberly, who is the second in rank in that office, filled his place. The Principal Officer was, on the first occasion, on leave of absence for the day, and on the second occasion he was required to perform duty in another branch by the Secretary. The religion of the Principal Officer is not known to me.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am not aware whether my question has been answered or not. I want to know whether a Catholic official of long standing and high character has been removed and replaced by an Orangeman?

*MR. RAIKES: I stated that I have no knowledge, whether the gentleman referred to in the question is a Catholic or not; but he has not been removed.

MR. MABERLEY AND THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General how often since the appointment of the Times' Commission has Mr. Maberly, of the Dublin General Post Office, been absent from his post, and for what periods; has Mr. Maberley access to the Dead Letter Office; how often has he visited Mr. Soames, solicitor to the Times, or his employers, or been to the office of the Times solicitor or his agents; did he submit returned letters or papers, which should be in the custody of the Post Office, to the agents of the Times; had he the authority of the Postmaster General for this; if Mr. Maberly was served with a subpœna duces tecum by the Times; by what means was the Times' solicitor able to specify the documents in the confidential custody of the Post Office, which he was required to produce; and what were the names of the addressor and addressees of the letters which Mr. Maberly produced?

*MR. RAIKES: Since the appointment of the Special Commission Mr. Maberly has been absent three times—namely, from the 24th of October last to the 28th of that month; from the 7th of December, 1888, to the 20th of March; and from the 9th instant to the present time. The first and last periods he was on his ordinary annual leave. The second period he was on sick leave under medical certificate, and during this period he was summoned to London by subpœna from the President of the Special Commission. Mr. Maberly is second in rank in the Returned Letter Office in Dublin, and takes charge of that office in the absence of his superior officer. I have no official knowledge of how Mr. Maberly may have spent his time, or whom he may have visited during his absence from his official duties, but he has never received or asked the sanction of the Department for any interview with Mr. Soames, or other persons in the employ of the Times. I understand that previously to the service of the subpoena he had received no communication directly or indirectly on the subject from anyone. Mr. Maberly did not submit any returned letters or papers to the agent for the Times. The solicitor for the Times specified nothing so far as the Post Office is aware. The President directed the production of certain books, and Mr. Maberly was authorised to produce in Court, if required, the only books which answered to the terms of the subpoena. No letters were produced by Mr. Maberly.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether it was Mr. Maberly, or some other official in the Dublin Office, who lately opened a letter addressed to me by the President of the United States?

*MR. RAIKES: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware that I endeavoured to prosecute an inquiry into the matter, but was unable to do so in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman declining to give up the envelope to the officers of the Department.

MR. SEXTON: Did I not submit the letter to the right hon. Gentleman, and did he not point out, even before I noticed the fact, that not only had the letter been opened, but that fresh gum had been used to seal it up again?

*MR. RAIKES: The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to show me the letter, and I believed that it had been opened, so far as I could judge, but it was necessary to place it in the hands of officers in the Department, who are experts in matters of that kind. I am entirely unable, in the absence of evidence, to say by whom the letter has been opened, when or where.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that if I give him the envelope it will not be allowed to pass out of his hands or to be destroyed?

Mr. Raikes

*MR. RAIKES: The right hon. Gentleman will, I hope, have sufficient confidence in my common honesty.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the conduct of Mr. Maberly and the general irregularities of the Dublin Office upon the Post Office Vote.

TURKEY AND ARMENIA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the following allegations with respect to the condition of the Armenian subjects of the Sultan, namely, that at Diarbekir robberies and burglaries are being patronised by the head of the local police, who has organised a gang of robbers from among the convicts; that Kurdish ruffians recently strangled an Armenian merchant named Kevcrk, carried off his goods, and threw the corpse of their victim into the Tigris; that at Mardin, manifestoes have been placarded calling upon the Mahometans to massacre the infidels; that the Sultan has ordered the dissolution of Armenian societies engaged in commercial pursuits, and that the police have entered the premises of these societies and confiscated books, accounts, and money; that the court martial instituted at Yildiz under the presidency of Dervish Pasha continues to sentence Armenians to years' hard labour or perpetual exile, and that the Reverend Boghos Vartabed, who was imprisoned last autumn on the petty charge of having published 15 years ago a pamphlet on Armenian affairs, has been found guilty by this tribunal and condemned to perpetual banishment; and, whether he is able to give the House any information with regard to these allegations; and, if not, whether he will cause inquiry to be made.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N. E.): The information we have received would not justify us in accepting as accurate the statements suggested in the question, but the details cannot be examined in an answer to a question. I have only two days ago laid full Papers on Armenia upon the Table. The attention of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople will be called to the questions put by the hon. Member.

MR. COCHRANE-BAILLIE (St. Pancras, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a telegram sent by the Governor-General of Van to the Imperial Government, and published in the Levant Herald of June 25, which telegram states that two brigands killed in a fight with the Turkish gendarmerie were, from documents found on their person, discovered to be Armenians disguised as Khurds, having correspondence with Armenians established in London and other cities of Europe, and whose real motives were to stir up a political agitation.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for North St. Pancras, he showed me the statements read by him on entering the House, and, if I am not mistaken, they are in one of a series of able papers called "Diplomatic Sheets." There are reports on either side contradictory of each other in regard to such occurrences; but Her Majesty's Government could not accept either as authentic without further information.

DERRY GAOL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has ascertained the facts as to the death of two men, and the dangerous illness of a third, immediately after release from Derry Prison; whether a prisoner, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, named John M'Gee, was released at midnight on Thursday last in a delirious condition, and died of typhus fever on his way home to Falcarragh; and, if he can generally state the result of the inquiry by the medical member of the Irish Prisons Board into the sanitary condition of the Derry Prison.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall Mid, St. Austell): I wish, also, to ask whether there have been any cases of fever in Derry Gaol within the past week, and are there any there now? How many prisoners under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act were discharged on Thursday last, and was their discharge due to the outbreak of fever or the completion of their sentences; and whether he is aware that two of the prisoners so discharged are since dead of typhus fever; and, if so, whether he intends still to retain other prisoners, including the honourable Member for the Camborne Division, in Derry Gaol, exposed to the risk of contagion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give a conclusive answer to the first paragraph until I receive a report from Londonderry; but I still hope that we may rely on the negative evidence, which is based on the fact that no report of the kind has reached me. Perhaps allusion is made to the case of a man Seize, who was discharged on July 13 on the ground of ill-health. He was at the time thought to be recovering from inflammation of the lungs. With regard to M'Gee, the inquest is still proceeding. I understand that the cause of death was not typhus, but tuberculosis.

MR. SEXTON: Whether the man died of tuberculosis or typhus, is it not the fact that he was twice in the hospital, and that when he was discharged at 12 o'clock on the Thursday night a warder refused to help him, and he fell forward upon the ground? Is it not further a fact that he was kept so long in prison in a dying state that when he was turned out he was delirious; and did not the emergency men in charge of the farm from which this poor tenant had been evicted when they heard of his death hoist the Union Jack on the roof of the premises?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rather think that this was not one of the men who had been evicted, but that he was a tenant upon that part of the estate which had been sold. With regard to the earlier part of the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have no information except on one point—namely, that he had been in the hospital. I believe that he had been twice in the hospital.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman ascertain whether these savages, the emergency men, did hoist the Union Jack when they heard of the man's death; and will he continue to protect the emergency men in their savageries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said nothing about their being protected.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is not the point. Did the emergency men in charge of this farm hoist the Union Jack when they heard that M'Gee was dead?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no information on the matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to answer the question on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope so, but how soon I may be furnished with a report I am unable to say.

DR. TANNER.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the judgment of Chief Baron Palles in Dr. Tanner's case, on the question of appeals, as follows:—

"He felt very much the position in which the Court was placed in that case of a quasi criminal nature, from their decision, in which there was no appeal to any higher tribunal. Were it a case of a Bill of Exchange involving only £5, the party decided against could take it to the House of Lords. But here, notwithstanding the important questions that were at stake—notwithstanding the case was one of a nature which for a long series of years had not been presented to any Court either in England or Ireland—their decision, whether right or wrong, was absolutely final, and would settle once for all the course to be adopted in this country. He wished that some one interested in the right administration of the law in this country would turn his attention to the question whether by any legislative means an appeal could be given to the House of Lords in these important cases of a criminal nature;"

and the following on the question of sureties for good behaviour:—

"Although, in his opinion, holding a man to bail for his good behaviour was a grave and serious punishment, the law did not regard it as such, and had not regarded it as such since the time of Edward III.; and if they wanted to make what every man of common sense knew was a punishment to be dealt with by the law of England applicable to other punishments, the law was in such a state on the subject that recourse should be had to an Act of Parliament. . . . He regretted extremely this anomaly in the law, which could only be dealt with by the Legislature;"

And do the Government intend to take any steps to improve the law in the direction recommended by the highest Irish legal authorities?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the Chief Baron made use of the observations referred to in the earlier part of the question. The suggestion referred to is part of a very large subject, about which there is a very decided difference of opinion among legal experts, and to give effect to which would involve the repeal of those portions of the English and Irish Judicature Acts which deny the right of appeal in criminal matters. The subject is, undoubtedly, one deserving of consideration; but it would be obviously impossible to give any pledge with regard to legislation on it. The observations of the Chief Baron, referred to in the second part of the question, dealt merely with the propriety of expressly offering an opportunity for explanation and apology before binding to good behaviour. It should be remembered, however, that in the concrete case the Chief Baron said that if they (the magistrates) thought they would not have been met with humility or submission they were not bound to subject themselves to fresh insult.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give effect to his own pledge on the 17th May, 1887, that there should be an appeal in every case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible for me to give a pledge on the subject, but the hon. and learned Member can put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am about to bring in a Bill dealing with the subject, and I shall certainly ask the Government to give it their support.

THE MUNSTER FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

MR. RICHARD POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the memorial of the trustees of the Munster Friends' School to the Lords of Her Majesty's Treasury, dated 18th April, 1887, with reference to their loss by the operation of the Landed Estates Courts Act, has been brought under his attention; whether this loss arose from the blunder of an official, paid out of public funds, to prevent such losses; whether he is aware that a guarantee fund is provided by the Bills of the Solicitor General for Ireland relating to Irish title and assurances, to meet such cases; and, whether, considering the extreme rarity of such blunders, and in this case the deserving character of the charity injured, the Government can see its way to make compensation to the trustees of the school, and to institute a guarantee fund, as in other countries, to meet similar contingencies?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, ~~Secretary~~ Westminister): I regret to say that the trustees of the Munster Friends' School have incurred a loss through the oversight in 1881 of an official of the Irish Land Court. The case has been carefully considered by the Treasury, but they are not prepared to admit the liability of the Exchequer to make good losses caused by the errors of the Courts of Law.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY: In asking for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the law as to criminal procedure in Ireland, I wish to say a few words on the subject, which has received a remarkable elucidation in recent days by the judgment of Chief Baron Palles in the case of Dr. Tanner. The object of this Bill is to give effect to the views expressed on that occasion by the Lord Chief Baron. I may also remind the House that on the 17th of May, 1887, the Chief Secretary, in introducing the Criminal Law Procedure Act, otherwise known as the Crimes Act, gave a pledge to the House in regard to extending the law on this subject which has never yet been fulfilled. I am perfectly aware that the right hon. Gentleman has on more than one occasion attempted to explain the reason of the non-fulfilment of his pledge; but, in reality, it was abandoned in response to the letters of the hon. and learned Member for Fulham (Mr. Hayes Fisher), a criminal lawyer, who would have been better engaged in the administration of the criminal law in England than in interfering with that of Ireland, and the hon. and learned Member for Peckham (Mr. Beaumont), who knows nothing about the criminal law either of England or Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion to which I refer, said—

"Under the Bill as we have drafted it we have closely followed the Act of 1862, and by the existing law there is no appeal for imprisonment for less than a month. We propose to give an appeal in every case to a County Court Judge, and to the higher tribunals where there are legal technicalities."

The Bill which I now introduce provides, amongst other things, an appeal in the case of a Magistrate sentencing a prisoner in default of giving securities for good behavior. I am aware that there is an appeal in cases and in all cases of sentences under the Crimes Act, and that there shall be no increase of sentences upon the appeal. In cases brought before the superior Courts on certiorari or habeas corpus, I propose, notwithstanding the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench that they could not look into the evidence, that the evidence must be examined, and that costs may be given against the Crown. Finally, the Bill provides that no sentence of longer duration than one month shall be given in default of sureties except in cases of assault and battery, and in a case of conspiracy no man shall be held responsible for the action of anyone except himself. These, I think, are extremely reasonable propositions, and I appeal to the Government to allow the Bill to go through the House, so that we may get rid of the scandal of permitting a man to go to the House of Lords on a bill of exchange, while it is impossible to reverse the decision of a Resident Magistrate in a case affecting the liberty of Her Majesty's subjects.

Bill to amend the Law as to Criminal Procedure in Ireland ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton, Dr. Kenny, and Mr. Chance.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 375.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL. (No. 272.)

*MR. SPEAKER: Two instructions have been placed upon the Paper, one standing in the name of the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Cossam), and the other in the name of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) both of which are, in my opinion, out of order. The first is an instruction to the Committee that they shall have power to insert a provision that all tithe rent-charge payable under the Bill shall vary in proportion to rent payable on the land subject to such charge. But the House decided yesterday that it would not re-open the settlement made by the Act of 1836 for the commutation of tithes. If the Instruction which was rejected yesterday, had been accepted by the House, it would have been proposed to vary in proportion to the rent desired by the hon. Member. But the House negatived that Instruction, and thus disposed of his proposition. With regard to the second Instruction, which proposes that it be an Instruction to the Committee to make provision for the application of tithe rent-charge recoverable under the Act in Wales to purposes generally acceptable to the Welsh people, I am of opinion that a Bill for the recovery of tithe rent-charge in a particular way cannot be extended in such a way as to cover the whole question of the application of tithe. That is beyond the scope of the Bill, and so far beyond it that it cannot properly be brought within the scope of the Bill through the machinery of an Instruction.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. A. S. HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) moved to leave out the word "a" before "person," and insert "any."

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that the word "a" is sufficient and is quite as good as the word "any."

MR. A. S. HILL: I venture to think that that is not so, and that "a" person entitled to money is not "any" person entitled to money.

The Amendment was not put.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to move in Clause 1, line 5, to leave out "person" and insert "parochial incumbent." I hope the Government will accept the Amendment without much discussion, because it is simply intended to carry out the policy which they themselves declared on the Second Reading of the Bill. The only pretext put forward for bringing in the Bill at all was that there are a certain number of worthy parochial clergymen in Wales, who are unable to obtain their tithe, and the Government therefore desired to make it easy for them to recover it. Her Majesty's Ministers themselves declared that this is not a question of the large tithe owners but the case of starving clergymen dealing with refractory tenants and parishioners. Whatever may be said in regard to giving to the parochial incumbent the power of recovering his tithes, there is no reason why a large powerful and wealthy body like the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be put upon this new basis. Lay impropiators again should be satisfied with the same remedy as a landowner, whose only remedy is by distress; the only persons to whom this power should be given are the parochial clergy.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, to leave out the word "person," in order to insert the words "parochial incumbent."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Question proposed that the word "person" stand part of the clause.

MR. S. LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I oppose the Amendment, and hope the Government will not accept it, on the ground that this is not a Bill for the protection of the clergy, but a Bill for the purpose of making a certain property more easily recoverable. It is also a Bill which is to the advantage of the farmer in enabling him to get rid of a disagreeable question. It is only fair that it should apply all round to those who are owners of tithe rent-charge, some of whom are Nonconformists themselves, and undenominational bodies such as schools. I have received a letter from a correspondent, who states:—

"I am unfortunately one of the lay owners of tithes and I am afraid that no one seems to think of us. The present condition of things presses very hardly upon those who, like myself, have a large family and a limited income."

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The Amendment of the hon. Member behind me has been of use in this respect, if in no other—it has pricked the bladder of the grievance that has been set up as a justification for this Bill. Hitherto we have been given to understand that the measure is necessary in the interests of the unhappy half-starved Welsh clergymen, but now it appears that it is not the clergy in Wales or England who are the special objects of the care of the Government, but the lay impropiators of tithe, especially Nonconformists. That is an entirely new light; it is a Bill to facilitate the recovery of tithes by Nonconformists and lay impropiators. It is wonderful how as we go on in discussions of this kind we ultimately discover the real truth, even when it lies at the bottom of a rather deep well. We are now told that the Bill has been introduced in the interests of the benefit of the clergy; that it has nothing to do with Wales nor anything that has occurred there, but that it is for that unfortunate and ill-used class, the lay impropiators, men like the Duke of Bedford, that the Government are forcing this Bill through the House of Commons on the 13th of August. That is very refreshing information, and it should induce the House to resist the measure still more strenuously.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the kind of speech he has just delivered. I hold that it is scarcely fair to suggest that the Government have introduced the Bill in the interests of the lay impropiator or of Nonconformists. That suggestion was a good example of the kind of pleasantry of which the right hon. Gentleman is so fond. I do not think that such observations can assist the House in debating this question calmly, and therefore I shall not say anything further in reply to them. As to the Amendment, it is impossible to accept it. It would perhaps have been better if the mover of the Amendment had disclosed the real motive of his proposal, which was manifestly to prevent the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from levying their tithes. The contention of the hon. Member is that the enjoyment of the new remedy for the recovery of tithe shall be confined to parochial incumbents. Surely if any amendment of the law is desirable it ought to apply to all tithe owners without distinction. The amount of tithe collected by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Wales is £28,796, while the whole amount expended by them on the Church in Wales is £67,634, more than twice as much. £35,611 is contributed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in support of the benefices of the poor incumbent in Wales, or £7,000 more than is collected by the Commissioners as tithe. Surely a public body who are collecting tithes with the object of handing over the money so collected to the poor clergy, the class of people who, it is admitted, are most in want, should not be debarred from availing themselves of the new remedy which the Bill proposes to bring into existence.

*MR. S. RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I certainly think that the Amendment is an extremely valuable and important one. If the sole intention of the Government were to protect the poor Welsh clergy I can hardly conceive that they would resist this proposal. The argument of the Attorney General as to the special claim of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, because they spend more tithe in Wales than is derived from that country, adds in effect insult to injury, for it is felt to be a great grievance in Wales that large sums drawn from England should be expended there for the purpose of buttressing up the Church in Wales. It is an unfair application of national property, which the Welsh people strongly resent. The foundation of the Bill was asserted to be the sad case of the clergy in Wales and the conduct of the Welsh farmers in resisting distress warrants. The Government ought, therefore, to be content to deal with the grievance which they themselves allege to give rise to the Bill, and not under the guise of protecting the clergy to give relief to the lay impropiators—to let in the lay rat under pretence of helping the Church mouse. I certainly do not see why poor little Wales should be made responsible for giving increased value to the tithes of the lay impropiators. We wish by this Amendment to test the good faith and honesty of the Government in regard to a measure which they assert to be simply for the protection of the starving Welsh clergy, and nothing more. If that is really the case they will not, I am sure, resist the Amendment.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I heartily support the Amendment, if for no other reason than that which has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), that if there could have been a doubt as to whom the Bill was intended to benefit that doubt has been cleared up by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. Leighton), who distinctly tells us that it is the lay impropiator. We were assured at the stage of Second Reading by the President of the Board of Trade that the Bill was only brought forward in the interests of the clergy in Wales, and if that is so they alone ought to be given the benefit which it is proposed to confer. It ought not to be shared by the lay impropiator. A few days ago a letter, signed "An English Clergyman," appeared in the Morning Post, in which the writer congratulated the Government on having wisely resolved to pass the Bill through Parliament. The point of the remark is in the end, where this Christian pastor says if the Bill does not pass this Session the "enemy," by which title he designates his parishioners, will be immensely encouraged in swindling and defrauding the tithe owners to an extent worse than death itself. The letter seems to show the minimum of Christianity with the maximum of ecclesiastical intolerance. I quote this to show what is behind the Government urging them to pass this Bill. I shall vote with my hon. Friend, and by doing so I shall be carrying out the intention expressed by the Government.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The Attorney General objects to giving a special remedy to one class of tithe owners, and he spoke as if this would be the only remedy; but he it remembered the lay impropriator would still have his remedy, and the only question upon which the whole issue turns is that to which the Attorney General did not address himself. Months ago we were told the Bill was brought forward for the protection of the poor parson, and now we are told it is for the protection of the rich lay impropriator, and especially the Nonconformist lay impropriator. Now, I must say as regards the lay impropriator that he is an individual for whom we have very little sympathy. His tithe is very dubious, but granting that he has a tithe leave him to work it out as he does now. As to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, it is one of the greatest grievances that they take the money they get from Wales and spend it in support of a Church which the Welsh people regard as an alien Church. On that ground I shall support the Amendment.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): There are two points I want to urge in favour of the Amendment; the first is, that when the lay impropriator bought his tithe he bought it subject to the existing law, and we have no right to give him more protection than he had when he made his purchase. He is not entitled to the special protection of the House, or to have his property made more secure than it is now. Then I am opposed to giving the power of suing at all, but if we must give it, let us confine it to the narrowest basis.

Mr. H. Gardner

Upon the clergy we may suppose the control of public opinion will be to some extent exercised, but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are susceptible to no such influence, they are the most difficult body to deal with, the most covetous, the most overbearing of any in the country, and to put this power in their hands is to put it into the hands of an utterly irresponsible body. I believe we should do well to confine this remedy to the parochial clergy, whom we may expect will exercise it with some regard to public opinion.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): The remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire seem to me to come with very little weight to us on this side, and I will not say on this side only, but to anyone desirous of preserving the elementary principles of law and order in the country. I can understand how irresponsible Members behind him, who feel bound to speak the language of their constituents, commit themselves to wild statements; but how a right hon. Gentleman who has held office, and who, I suppose, expects to hold office again, can lay down such extraordinary doctrines passes my comprehension. First of all, he thinks he has made the discovery that the Bill is proposed in the interest of those who are called the poor parsons.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: That was the suggestion.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: But the right hon. Member for Denbighshire says we have no right to give him more protection than he had when he made his purchase. He is not entitled to the special protection of the House, or to have his property made more secure than it is now. Then I am opposed to giving the power of suing at all, but if we must give it, let us confine it to the narrowest basis.

is abolished by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, we must collect it and administer it as best we can. Now, the ordinary process of recovery has not been successful; it has led to scenes of disorder which, I am sure, the right hon. Gentleman must regret as much as we do. The Government come forward with a simpler process; and then the right hon. Gentleman has the assurance to say that, because Corporations are not poor clergymen, he would not assist them to obtain their dues. A still more astounding statement came from the right hon. Gentleman—we heard it before from the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, but from him I thought we merely had the language of his constituents, but from the right hon. Gentleman it excites more attention—he actually denounced the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for sending into Wales a larger amount of money than they received from Wales, and he resented this as an insult. Now, I should like to know what would have been said had the Commissioners taken away the amount of the Welsh tithe.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I did not resent the spending of the money as an insult, but as an injury. I said the proposal for special legislation for the purpose of enforcing payment was the addition of insult to injury.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT: Well, then, it is not an insult but an injury. But I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire told us it was an insult to spend this money on the Welsh clergy. But suppose the Ecclesiastical Commissioners—holding, as we do, a considerable amount of property in Wales, which we must continue to hold until we are deprived of it—suppose we were to divert the whole of this Welsh income to expenditure in some of the large towns in England, would not the right hon. Gentleman be one of the first to complain? Would he not rise at that Table and, in his well-rounded periods, denounce the iniquitous conduct of the Corporation? We have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton talk of the richest Church in Christendom having the duty of supporting its own clergy, and is not that exactly what the Commissioners are doing? I say it is a matter of plain common sense. The Commissioners take the tithe they own by indefeasible title from Wales, and they spend it in Wales. They come to Parliament and say—they, with others—“Allow us to collect the tithe in the most peaceable manner, in the manner least oppressive to those from whom we collect it;” but this is called adding insult to injury, and resistance is now offered to as reasonable a demand as was ever made in Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We had a speech from the hon. Member for Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) from which we learned something, and we have learned still more from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University. I said we were getting on. We are now unmasking the real battery. The imposture of the poor clergy has been used long enough, and now the real reason for the Bill lies before us. It was only a mild skirmish we had from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanley Leighton), but now the true batteries are opened by the real promoters of the Bill. The hon. Member for the University does not often address the House, but when he does he always enlightens us, and never, I think, has he done so more to the purpose than to-day. In his lofty way he lectured my right hon. Friend for his assurance, and others for speaking the language of their constituents; but if ever a man spoke the language of his constituents it was the hon. Member for Oxford University. I know something of the University of Oxford, and of its qualities as landowner. I know Oxfordshire well, and I can say that if ever you see property there absolutely out of order and in a state of dilapidation and ask as to the ownership, you are perfectly sure to be told it is college property. The hon. Gentleman is the representative of what I should call, on the whole, the worst class of landowners in the country. I speak of matters on which I have knowledge. It is no blame to the College Authorities; their business is not that of land owning and land management; knowledge of the Greek accident and the integral calculus does not contribute to the management of land, and, as I say, you may tell college property as you pass along the roads. Now, it is on behalf of these colleges that the hon. Gentleman makes the claim for an extraordinary claim.

I do not dispute their title; I have no wish to take it away; but I say this—that if there is any class of people not entitled as against the farmers and small owners of England to come and ask for an additional remedy in respect of their property, it is the owners of college property, represented by the hon. Gentleman. So far as this Bill is concerned, the hon. Gentleman says they are—not the only but the principal—claimants in this matter. Then the hon. Gentleman talks of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and from what I know of them they are much better managers of property than the colleges; they understand it a good deal better; but what is the claim on behalf of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? Why do the Ecclesiastical Commissioners want further remedies? One of the reasons alleged for the Bill is the need of the poor clergy, who are more or less defenceless, and who find difficulty in applying the legal processes now open to them. It is for this that they are to be provided with the County Court, just as you provide claimants of small debts with the County Court. But you would never have thought of providing, for the purposes of large property, this remedy of the County Court; therefore the argument of my right hon. Friend is perfectly good in this respect. Then the hon. Gentleman, in referring to my hon. Friend behind me, has misstated altogether what he said. What my hon. Friend objected to was that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should use the funds derived from elsewhere for the purpose of bolstering up the Church Establishment in Wales.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: I was referring to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan), who spoke in denunciation of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for spending so much in Wales.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, but the hon. Gentleman did not appreciate the point of the remarks that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners devoted large funds, derived from London and elsewhere, to the support of Church purposes in Wales. That is the objection, that these funds are used for the purpose of bolstering up the Church in Wales. Now, the original object of tithes was to provide for the religious instruction of the people of the district where it was raised. It worked well when the feelings of the people were in harmony with the Instruction provided. But a totally different state of things arises when the money is used for other purposes in the hands of a lay impropiator or a college, for purposes with which the people living on the land have nothing whatever to do. This is a good reason for confining this remedy to those who live on the spot and render some service to the people. Now that we have got to the true principle of the Bill, we find that it is not a small Bill at all. It is a very large Bill, and its object is now disclosed to be to increase the value of tithe property. This extra remedy will give an additional screw which will have a distinct money value. The Bill is, in fact, a proprietor's Bill directed against the occupier. It is well that this should be clearly understood by the tenant farmers and yeomen of the country. It is a Bill promoted by proprietors to increase the value of tithe property with a view to redemption. The real point of the Bill has been illuminated by the speech of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford; and it is to be hoped, therefore, that we shall have no more of the trumpery excuse that this is a mere temporary remedy in aid of distressed tithe-owners.

*MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen): I had no intention of joining in this discussion, and certainly should not have done so but for an observation that fell from the hon. Member for Oxford University who referred to the conduct of the Welsh people in regard to the tithe agitation as being a scandal to civilisation. I entirely agree it is a scandal to civilisation to put compulsion upon people to pay for a Church and to support an establishment entirely opposed to their convictions. It is all very well to refer to the Welsh agitation as a scandal to civilisation, but consider what has been going on, how the value of agricultural produce has been diminishing and how landlords all over the country have been making large reductions in their rents. It is a scandal that the clergy of the richest Church in the world should exact the utmost farthing when landlords are everywhere granting reductions of their rent. The same language has been applied to other agitations—to the tithe agitation in Ireland 50 years ago. Yet the policy of that agitation subsequently recommended itself to the Legislature. The position of Wales now is precisely that of Ireland half a century ago, and the agitation will soon extend to England if tithes are pressed as they have been, and are to be, by Bills of this kind forced forward in this way.

*MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Just a word or two in reference to the speech to which we have just listened. I have been doing what little I could do to prevent this Bill passing, and I should be glad if still I could do something that would have that effect; but at the same time I must take the opportunity of saying that I have no sympathy whatever with the views expressed by the hon. Member. I recognise tithe as a property, and I hope that every Englishman and Welshman will do his utmost to meet his obligations so long as he has the means to do so. I could point out to the hon. Member in my own County of Essex places where on one side of the road a field supplies maintenance for a chapel and on the other side of the road a field helps to maintain a church, and I fail to understand why the rent collected for the one field should be described as a scandal, but should be perfectly justifiable when collected for the other field. Perhaps I may say a word or two in reference to the somewhat sweeping criticisms which fell from the right hon. Gentleman opposite in reference to the management of college property. I do not think his was a fair description. He will pardon me for saying that his criticism would have more effect—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was speaking of Oxford, not of Cambridge.

*MR. GRAY: Well, I was about to speak of Cambridge.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My remarks did not apply to Cambridge. I spoke especially of my knowledge of Oxfordshire. I am a Cambridge man myself, and I believe that the Cambridge property is much better managed than the Oxford property, which is managed about as badly as possible. I take the testimony of the hon. Member as regards Cambridge.

*MR. GRAY: For once the right hon. Gentleman and myself are in accord; we are both standing up for the University that has the proud distinction of having been Alma Mater to the right hon. Gentleman. I was speaking of Cambridge, and was about to show that the language of the right hon. Gentleman did not apply to the college property, but I leave that subject. With many hon. Members on both sides, I believe that redemption is the only way in which, sooner or later, we can settle these tithe troubles, and in all our Amendments I hope we shall keep that purpose steadily in view, but we must not to that end seek to increase the value of tithe. I admit the property in tithe, I admit that we ought to pay our debts, but I do not think we are called upon to raise the value of the property with some system of redemption in connection with it in view.

MR. H. GARDNER: I wish to make a few remarks in regard to one observation which fell from my hon. Colleague opposite on one point. His point was that from his own knowledge of property in Essex he was aware that the rent of a field on one side of a road—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I was unwilling to interrupt the hon. Member for Carmarthenshire, who was making his first speech to the House, and who strayed from the question before the Committee. His speech has, however, been followed up until the question before the Committee is now well in the back-ground. The hon. Member must address himself to that question.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I do not, I am sure, wish to travel away from the Amendment before the Committee, but I must express a hope that my hon. Friend will divide the Committee on this Amendment. Whatever may be the claims of the parochial clergy, they stand upon a different footing from those of lay impropiators, whose ownership of tithes originated in spoliation and the diversion of tithes from their original purposes. The lay impropiator has no claim upon the consideration of the Legislature, and he ought to be left to the remedy given him by the Act of 1836. Yet it is proposed by this Bill to raise the value of the lay impropiator's tithes by 25 per cent. When the Bill was first proposed, and I read it, I came to the conclusion that I must be very stupid indeed in not finding out what its object was. Reading it section by section, I came to the conclusion that it was the most stupid composition it had ever been my lot to read. It proposes to replace an immediate, an easy, a convenient, and a cheap process, with a process which is circuitous, which involves considerable delay and expense, and imposes a heavy penalty on the tithe-payer. That seemed to me impenetrably stupid until I thought it over and found out the real object of the Bill. That object is not to give an easier remedy, but to give a debt-collecting security, and to increase the value of the property.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The only question before the Committee is whether this Amendment should be adopted.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: With the greatest respect, Mr. Courtney, I think in a few sentences I can show why I have ventured to point out this difference. It may be very well that the clerical tithe-owner should have this personal remedy. I think it unfair and unnecessary; but, admitting that he should have it, I maintain that it is not a remedy which ought to be given to the lay impropiator. The hon. Member for Oxford University said he could not wonder at the irresponsible utterances of Members on this side who are bound to speak the views of their constituents. It is very well for an hon. Gentleman representing a great University to put forward personal arguments of that kind against a body of men who are endeavouring to represent honestly the views of their constituents; and, as to the extraordinary language which he says we use, I doubt whether it comes anywhere near the extraordinary language used by clerical and other orators on the other side. We do not charge the other side of the House with swindling, or attempting to swindle, or to defraud the tithe-payer. We put it, at all events, in more Parliamentary language. We say that this process is an unjust process to the tithe-payer, and we also say that it is the duty of the Government to act up to their distinct announcement that the object of the Bill was to benefit the parochial clergy.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I merely rise to correct a misrepresentation—of course, unintentional—in the speech of the hon. Member opposite. What I said was that the Welsh people, and the Welsh Nonconformists especially, resented the application of moneys levied from them to the maintenance of a Church in which they do not believe.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I am a lay impropiator, though a small one, and therefore I know something about this subject. How the Government can come forward and break the bargain which has been made between impropiators and tithe-payers by increasing the value of the tithes 25 per cent I really do not know. When this Bill was introduced, I sent a copy of it to my land agent and asked him what its effect would be. His reply was—"It will increase the value of your tithes 25 per cent." I do not know a stronger instance of a Government proposing to increase for electioneering purposes the value of property for the most part in the hands of those whom they believe to be their own supporters, and to increase that value in anticipation of a forced sale. It is also as strong a case as could be of the one-sided breaking of a bargain. Lay impropiators are placed in a position of which they may well feel ashamed. The clergy may have hardships, and I know some of them have, but the greatest hardship is to have an income from a congregation which does not work under them. That is the practical point of view, and I think it will soon all come to this—that each set of labourers should support their own ministers. I shall vote most heartily in support of the Amendment.

MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I do not think I should vote for the Amendment if its sole effect was to make incumbents privileged persons, but I shall vote for it because I believe that we ought not to pay any tithes at all. It is well-known in Wales that the majority of the people in that little country do not want the services of the parochial incumbents. True, they are there; like many barbers' shops they are there. The barbers, perhaps, never shave, because people never go to their shops—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must confine his observations to the Amendment.

MR. ABRAHAM: With due respect to your ruling, Sir, I am endeavouring to point out that the clergy ought not to be made privileged persons at all. As to the spending of money by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Wales, I should say that it is not the spending of money we disagree with and denounce. Spend what money you will to help the Church in Wales, but do not compel other people who do not believe in the Church to contribute to that expenditure. It has been said in the Debate that we ought to pay tithes as long as we have the money to do it. The only question I have to ask is—what are we to do if we have no money to pay?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): This Debate has not been brought so near to the real issue as some of us consider right. The Amendment is to leave out the word "persons," and that word includes all persons who have become possessed of the right to levy tithes in some way or other. Those who have bought tithes as a matter of speculation knew that if they were not paid they had to be obtained by distress on the particular ground they were levied on. I think that those gentlemen who have speculated in tithes for purposes of profit stand before the world in a very contemptible position, and I think we are doing our duty to the nation in making them bear the responsibility of the burden they imposed on themselves when they purchased.

MR. T. ELLIS: I think the least the Government could have done would have been to reply to the very serious arguments which have been put forward in the latter part of this Debate. I see on the back of the Bill the names of Mr. Secretary Matthews and Mr. William Henry Smith, and I should have thought that one of those gentlemen would have tried to reply to our arguments. I should like to ask the Government whether they agree to the ordinary definition given of tithes—namely, a tenth of the produce payable for the maintenance of the parish priest. It seems to me it is grossly unfair that the toilers of Durham, and Essex, and other counties should have money extracted from them by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the shape of tithes in order that the Establishment in Wales and the system of proselytising the Welsh people may be bolstered up. My Amendment, which limits the operation of the measure to the clergy, is quite in harmony with the real nature of the tithe, and I earnestly appeal to Gentlemen on the other side of the House to follow me into the Division Lobby on this question.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 130.—(Div. List, No. 301.)

MR. STAVELEY HILL: My next Amendment is to leave out "entitled to a sum," and insert "claiming money." The phrase "entitled to a sum" seems to me a doubtful expression, for I do not quite see what the word "sum" means. But what I wish to call attention to is the word "entitled." Does my right hon. Friend intend by these words to give the County Court Judge unlimited jurisdiction with regard to amount? Supposing the tithe comes to £50, £60, or £100 a year, the claimant goes into Court, saying there is a certain amount of money due to him, upon which the question of title is raised. At present where a distress is levied the question of title can only be raised by removal by certiorari into a Superior Court, under 7 & 8 William III.; but under this Bill, if the defendant raises the question of title, it will have to be settled by the County Court Judge. I ask those who are looking carefully after the interests of the poor incumbent to consider the position in which he will be placed if he has to fight the question of title. And supposing the sum involved does not exceed £20 a year, that at 25 years' purchase would mean an enormous amount of capital to be decided upon by the County Court Judge.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No.

MR. HILL: My right hon. Friend says "No." But it is so. Will my right hon. Friend say that he does not allow this jurisdiction without limit to the County Court Judge? I raise the question as to the word "entitled" in order to know how the matter really stands. Are we to have the incumbent set at arm's length by half-a-dozen persons combining together to raise the question of title? If so, then it is a very small mercy you are extending to him. Will my right hon. Friend afterwards agree to some provision limiting the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge? I beg to move my Amendment.

is sufficient to say that to allow such an Amendment would be inconsistent with the decision arrived at on the Instruction of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex. It is within the power of the Committee to amend the process for the recovery of tithe rent-charge, but not to take away against the will of the tithe owner the remedy which he now has, without an Instruction from the House to that effect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There was no Instruction touching the question of distress moved last night, though there were Instructions as to the election of remedies. I submit that if the proposal of the Government is that the owner shall elect one of two processes, it is competent without Instruction for the Committee to reject one of them.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member moved an Instruction to the Committee yesterday to provide that the tithe rent-charge should be recoverable from the landlord only. That was rejected, the House holding that the tenant, from whose property on the land the tithe is recoverable by restraint, should remain liable. It seems to me, therefore, that the Amendment now proposed is not permissible unless authorised by the House.

*MR. C. GRAY: It will, perhaps, save the time of the Committee if I say that, even if my Amendment had not been ruled out of order, I should not have moved it, as I consider there is more to be gained by another Amendment dealing with the period of time—extending the one month to three months—which Amendment would be impossible if the power of distraint were done away with.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move, in lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert "three years." The history of the tithe in Ireland was well known, and the Irish Members are past masters in the art of abolishing the iniquity. If I may give a "griffin" to my Welsh friends, it would be "accumulate arrears." If the Irish landlord has to wait years for his rent, I see no reason why the English parson should not wait as long. It seems to me that the contention of Her Majesty's Government, that this tithe is a sort of national institution, will not hold water. In Wales we find a small minority exacting this tax from the majority, hence I think it reasonable that we should allow the tithes to run into arrears to as great an extent as possible. If you do not do that you will never have a remedy for the monstrous exactions on the people who do not believe in the Established Church. Accumulate arrears, otherwise Parliament will not come to the rescue; make this more or less a burning question. If my Amendment is accepted I think the people will run into three years' arrears, and will avoid the hardships of having to pay this money year by year.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert, "three years."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question, "That 'one month' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, page 1, line 7, after the first "may," insert "having previously demanded thereof in writing."—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I beg to move after the word "may" to insert the words "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge." It would be hard on the tenant to be called upon to pay that which his landlord has covenanted to pay. The landlord may be impecunious and become a bankrupt or run away, or the tenancy being near its termination he may be unable to recover from future rent any payment for which he has been sued by the titheowner, and I desire to avoid the necessity of compelling the tenant under such circumstances to pay twice over. I hope the Government will accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after "may," to insert "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will see on a moment's reflection that the liability of the landlord to the tenant cannot affect the rights of a third party, the tithe owner. If the tenant wishes to avoid a distress at present he has to pay. The only remedy the tithe owner has is to go to the occupier and, if he does not pay, to distrain. No doubt there is some hardship in it in cases where the landlord has covenanted to pay, but the occupier has been fixed upon as the person liable to pay for the sake of convenience, as it is sometimes next to impossible to find the owner. The occupier, of course, will not suffer, as he can deduct the tithe from the rent.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: The landlord may receive the money from the tenant and may not pay it to the tithe owner.

MR. MATTHEWS: The landlord where he has covenanted to pay will do so, otherwise the amount will be deducted from the rent.

SIR W. HARCOURT: As long as the money is obtained by distress it can be paid only out of the produce of the land; but the Bill now substitutes another remedy. It is said that the tithe is to be stopped out of the rent; but the right hon. Gentleman has never met the point which you, Mr. Courtney, raised on the first night of the Debate, that the rent may not amount to so much as the tithe, or the produce of the land may not be sufficient to pay either the tithe or the rent. It is quite plain that the tenant will be deprived of the security he now has where the produce of the land will not yield the sum claimed.

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman does not allow for the effect of the sub-section of the clause providing that the judgment recovered may be executed against all personal property on which a distress for the sum can at the date of the execution be levied, and shall not be executed in any other manner. These words restrict the execution to precisely the property on which a distress can now be levied; and the Bill does not provide a personal remedy in the old sense of the word. The exceptional cases in which the rent is less than the tithe, or the property less than both, will stand in the same position as now. Where, then, is the hardship? I believe it is true that in some parts of Sussex the tithe exceeds the rent. In that case, says the right hon. Gentleman, you cannot recover. That is quite true, but neither can you now. The tenant would clearly have an action against his landlord if he were distrained upon under such circumstances. It seems to me, therefore, that the clause inflicts no hardship and no injustice.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. T. ELLIS: I am surprised that the Government are not willing to accept this Amendment. It is aimed at placing the cultivators of the soil in something like an equitable position. The Home Secretary says the provision of the Bill imposes a certain amount of hardship on the tenants. I beg to point out that you are placing a monstrous and intolerable hardship on a large number of the cultivators of the soil. It has been pointed out repeatedly that if this is a debt it is a debt from the landowner. According to the great national contract of 1836 the tithe rent-charge was to be paid by the landowner. So far so good. Not only was that so, but Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords and in declarations made all over the country said that hitherto the tenant had been placed under the inconvenience of having to pay a debt which was not his own debt. It was, he said, the debt of the landlord, and the landlord should pay it. Here is a case in which the landlord is not merely the debtor under the Act of 1836, but has entered into a contract with his tenant that he will pay the debt. When a tenant now refuses to pay the tithe, which is not his own debt, what do you on the other side of the House call him? You call him dishonest, and a Bishop of your own Church, the Bishop of Llandaff, says—

Because the tenant does not pay the debt of the landlord, that is how he is spoken of. Now, in this case the landlord solemnly covenants to pay the debt, and yet when my hon. Friend asks that the tenant shall not be distrained upon, the Government say they cannot accept the Amendment. Let me tell the Committee what may occur under this Bill. During the last four or five years agricultural distress has hit the agriculturists of Wales as hard as if not harder than any agriculturists in this country. They have been able to bear up better than might have been expected, because they live almost indescribably hard and thrifty lives. They have been able to keep their homes together and to keep on their farms owing to a life of very severe thrift and great sacrifice, and by denying themselves not merely the luxuries, but the very necessities of life. What is the result? In scores of cases when the tithe becomes due they are unable to pay it not merely out of the earnings of the year, but out of the accumulations of many years of thrift, and they have to borrow the money in order to pay the rent, which sometimes includes tithe. On the 1st of June they go to the landlord's office and pay over the rent plus the tithe. The very next week they may receive a note stating that the landlord has not paid his tithe, and that the tenant must therefore pay it. Unless under these circumstances the tenant does pay he has to face either distress or the County Court. But the Home Secretary says he has his remedy, because at the next rent day, some time in November, he can deduct the amount from the rent. The Home Secretary says he has an action. What a mockery to say that a yearly tenant can have an action against the landlord—the yearly tenant who can be turned from his home, and in many cases, has been because he has shot a rabbit or because he goes to a Nonconformist Chapel on Sunday. This is what is offered to the tenants in Wales and in England as compensation for the introduction of this wretched, monstrous, and preposterous Bill, every clause of which brings out some new iniquity or some shameful mistake in drafting or some shameful ignorance on the part of those in charge of it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I really do hope the Government will give way on this Amendment, because the clause is so unjust and so gross that if they do not we must go on discussing it until midnight or mid-day to-morrow. You are providing a means by which the tenants of England and Wales can be compelled to pay tithes. The Home Secretary says that if the tenant is such a weak and foolish man as to pay the tithe to the landlord he deserves all he can get. He is very ignorant, and this is not merely the commonest transaction in the world, but a transaction which the Act of 1836 contemplated, because the rent was to be inclusive of the tithe. It is only by that unfortunate system by which the landowners of England have always endeavoured to defeat every legislative provision in favour of the tenants that it has ever been otherwise. The Act of 1836 intended that the landowners should pay the tithe. The landowners of England combined to agree that they should not pay the tithe but should make the tenant pay it. That is exactly what happened in 1875, when the Legislature determined that the landowners should pay for the improvements of their tenants, and they instantly combined to contract themselves and to "notice" their tenants out of the Act. That is what the landowners have always done. They have always entered into conspiracies to defeat every arrangement of the Legislature in favour of the tenants. The hon. Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) said the other day that on the greater number of his farms the tenants paid the rent. Under these circumstances, the tenant does pay the tithe to the landlord, because in the rent he pays the tithe. Having paid the tithe in the rent to the landlord, on the understanding that the landlord should pay the tithe, what happens if the landlord becomes insolvent? The tenant then has to pay the tithe twice over. And then you offer him an action against an insolvent landlord. It is against compelling the tenant to pay the tithe twice over that this Amendment is aimed. Can anything be more simple? What is the use of the Government fighting us hour after hour on this point? Surely they must see that their opposition to the Amendment cannot be justified to their constituents. I cannot believe that the tenants and their supporters can refuse to give to the tenantry of England a protection of this kind, to which they are so plainly entitled.

difficulty of finding any other corpus against which a remedy could possibly be sought. The Government now make an excuse of the existence of that hardship for the creation of a new grievance of a very much graver character. They propose to turn the tithe into a personal debt against the occupier. Surely that is an extraordinary hardship and a great grievance. But now it appears that that grievance is to be placed on the occupier, even in cases where the landlord has contracted with the occupier that he will pay the tithe. I submit that that is a monstrous aggravation of the injustice. I do not think it has yet been observed that there is a positive advantage to the landowner in inducing the tenant to pay the tithe in reference to abatements of rent called for by the feeling of the country generally. If it is the habit in the district for the landlord to abate 10 or 15 per cent of the rent, the landlord who does not pay the tithe gives 10 or 15 per cent on less than the true rent, and on a smaller sum than the landlord who pays the tithe, and there are probably many clever landlords who expressly pay the tithes in order that they may be generous at a cheap rate. I have known a large landowner admit that that was the cause of the custom of payment of tithe by the tenant on his own estate. It does seem a most unreasonable thing to urge that men whose landlords have actually covenanted to pay the tithe should be compelled to pay it themselves.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I only wish to appeal to the sense of justice of Gentlemen opposite who are favourable to this Bill in reference to this Amendment. Just let us see what is the case the Government have made for the Bill. The Attorney General and the Home Secretary say the Bill is brought in to deal with the cases of tenants who can pay and will not pay, and that we need a speedy and easy mode of recovering the tithe rent-charge from tenants who are liable under their agreements to pay the tithe, and who, having the means to pay, will not pay. That is the point of view of the Government. I am not going to argue now whether they are right or wrong. We say that, admitting the grievance and the remedy, there is another class of tenants who have contracts with their landlords, under which the latter have

"Is to relieve both the tithe owner and the farmer from grievances under which they at present suffer—the tithe owner that he has to recover a tithe from the person who does not owe it, and the farmer from the grievance that, though he does not really owe, it he is called upon to it. I am aware that the farmer is put into that position by his own act—by an agreement made with his landlord—but the inconvenience of the process is unquestionably very great, because all variations in the amount of tithe fall upon the farmer, and are felt by him in bad times, causing much exasperation, owing to the farmer having to bear the brunt of the payment at a time when he can least afford it, and leaving him subject, if he does not pay it, to a process—that of distraint—which we know from experience is singularly calculated to excite popular feeling. . . There can be no doubt that it is the land, and the land only, that is liable for the tithe. The occupier never has been, and is not now, by law liable. What is liable is the gross produce of the land. If the land yields no produce then there is no tithe due. That has been the case hitherto, and that will still be the case under this Bill. Though the Bill makes the landowner liable for the tithe, it really only provides a change of procedure, substituting the simpler procedure of the County Court in the place of the ancient and exasperating procedure of distraint."

What was Lord Salisbury's principle? It was that it was altogether a mistake to make the occupier liable in any sense of the word, that the owner was the man liable, and that even if the occupier had entered into a contract the inconvenience was so great that the Legislature was bound to step in and deal with it. The Government now ask that where the landlord has agreed to meet what was his original obligation, but refuses or neglects to do so, the tenant is to be made liable, is to be County Courted, is to be distrained upon; and the Home Secretary, in his light and airy way, tells us that the tenant can bring an action for the recovery of the sum of money he has been most unfairly compelled to pay.

limit, seeing that since the settlement of 1836 there have been a considerable number of re-apportionments.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The more this Bill is debated the greater is the amount of light we get thrown upon it. It is not merely a Bill for the recovery of small sums, and the pretence that the measure is intended to enable poor clergymen, through the medium of the County Court, to recover these small sums has now disappeared. As the hon. Member who last spoke knows perfectly well, the Bill gives exceptional means for the recovery of large sums as well as of small. The hon. Member for Chelmsford has knocked on the head the favourite theory of the Attorney General that the Bill will only affect the tithes on small farms. I agree with the hon. Member for Cirencester, after what the Attorney General has said, that the enforcement of the tithe may be made most vexatious, and if the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman is correct—as to which there is some doubt—the Bill will certainly require amendment. That makes it all the more necessary why we should confine it to this limit. If you want the County Court Jurisdiction, take it as it is; strike out the words, "Whatever the amount of the sum may be."

MR. COSSHAM: I certainly heard the statement of the Attorney General with great surprise. If I have to sue a person who owes me £800 for coals, I cannot sue him four times for £200. The Attorney General is wrong in his law and in his facts.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): The hon. Member for Northampton, as a layman, expressed his surprise at the legal doctrine laid down by the Attorney General. I am not exactly a layman, though I am not supposed to be learned in the law, still, I join in the hon. Gentleman's expression of surprise. I have practised for several years in Irish County Courts—of course I do not pretend to understand English law—and if I attempted to argue there what the Attorney General has laid down as indisputable law, I should be laughed at. It has been laid down over and over again that you cannot split the cause of action for the purpose of giving the County Court jurisdiction.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The Committee are discussing this point mainly on account of an inaccurate expression of mine. I do not like to be misunderstood. I never suggested you could split a cause of action. My point was that tithe is a separate cause of action in respect of each piece of land. I have not looked up the matter, but my impression is that it is a separate cause of action.

MR. BRADLAUGH: That was not quite what you said.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I certainly meant to convey that there was a different cause of action in each case, and I apologise to the Committee if by an inaccurate expression I have misled them.

MR. BRADLAUGH: What I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say was, supposing the tithe on a piece of land is more than £50 the land can be divided into two portions.

MR. H. GARDNER: I cannot congratulate the Government upon the only support they have got from their own Benches. The hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Beadel) flatly contradicted the statement of the Attorney General. In certain cases there are what are called field apportionments, but there are instances in which the whole farm pays a large sum. The Attorney General says you are able to bring an action for the various portions of the tithe. The tithe owner is thus able to inflict on the tithe payer a very heavy penalty in the shape of costs. Supposing a man owes £300 in tithe split up in three lots or apportionments of £100 each. If the tithe payer can be sued in respect of each separate piece of tithe, he may possibly have to pay £40 or £50 in costs.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The Amendment would cause that. If the Amendment is carried there will be a temptation to split; if the Amendment is not carried there will be no temptation to split.

MR. H. GARDNER: I really think the Bill, as explained by the Attorney General, gets worse and worse as we proceed. It is quite bad enough that the tithe payer should be put to this penalty at all, which he is not subjected to under the existing law. And, according to the Attorney General, the penalty may be cumulative, amounting to a sum that we can hardly imagine.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: The revelation made by the hon. and learned Gentleman has almost taken away the breath of the Welsh Members. If the case is hard, as seen from the point of view of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden, how much more serious is it from the point of view of the Welsh Members? It is acknowledged that this is a measure aimed at Wales; it is a Penal Code applying to Wales; it is a measure of petty coercion. Now it appears it is in the nature of a cat-o'-nine tails. Under this legislation tithe receivers are distinctly invited to use the County Court expenses as a means of compelling tithe-payers to be prompt in their payments. If the tithe-owners carry out the full spirit of this legislation, they will undoubtedly take the opportunity now and again of dividing their claims for the express purpose of making them more penal and more severe. With the state of feeling which exists, and which is being fomented in Wales on this question, it is by no means beyond the point of possibility that there will be cases in which this mischievous use will be made of the clause.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Does the Attorney General mean to say that if a farmer has 50 closes, 50 actions can be brought against him? If that is so the law ought to be altered at once. We ought to suspend the proceedings on this Bill and bring in a short Bill changing such an iniquitous system. We are only asking the Committee to do that which the House did three years ago in the case of extraordinary tithe, and what was done last year by the Committee over which I had the honour to preside.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): There is a tithe map by which field apportionment is indicated, and I believe that under this Bill a tithe-owner could sue for a particular sum on each field. It is no answer to say that in some parishes there is no apportionment. If the Bill passes as it stands there will be an apportionment made in every parish. I think that as under this Bill the power is to be given to the County Court it ought to be given altogether.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. gentleman holds out to us the prospect that if the Bill passes in its present shape there will be apportionments made in parishes where it has not hitherto prevailed. I am not going to dispute the law laid down by the Attorney General that there may be a separate action brought in respect of every close, but let us consider what the effect may be. If a man has not paid his tithe, and the clergyman, or tithe-owner, thinks he is a cantankerous Nonconformist and that it would be a very good thing he should receive a lesson, and that it might be useful in the neighbourhood and might serve the cause of religion, the Attorney General has taught him what to do. He may be a small parson but a man of a large mind, and his tithe may be £100 a year, but it may be collected from 20 closes. Under the advice of the Attorney General, and under the cover of a "very small" Bill passed this Session, he can bring 20 actions and run up a bill of costs, say, of £100, in order to punish the cantankerous Nonconformist for his conduct. The tenant farmers will be absolutely at the mercy of the tithe-owner, who may wreak his vindictiveness and spite upon them if he chooses. I have known such a spirit as that exhibited with respect to burial; vindictiveness is often carried to the grave. If the Attorney General is right the first thing to do is to introduce a clause to prevent the tithe-owner bringing as many actions as he chooses.

MR. T. ELLIS: I think the discussion on this Amendment has proved quite clearly our contention last night that it is useless to deal with this complicated question in this one-sided way. In the first place, you have to distort the whole question of County Court jurisdiction and run counter to the very principles you upheld in Committee upstairs last year. A man may be County Court in respect of one close and distrained against in respect of another.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): The Attorney General has advanced the very best argument which could possibly be advanced in favour of this Amendment, because he has pointed out that in the event of the Amendment being carried an opportunity would be afforded in a case where tithe is apportioned to different closes of bringing an action in respect of each close. Again, let me ask what is the reason for imposing upon the County Court jurisdiction, which at present is very heavily burdened, other responsibility. The Attorney General felt the force of that objection, because he pointed out that an appeal would lie.

But that suggestion is not a very satisfactory one, because the same observation might be made in the case of every proposition for extending the jurisdiction of the County Court.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): If it will be possible for the titheowner to sue the tithepayer in respect of different apportionments, I am bound to say I cannot support Her Majesty's Government. Whatever else may be said about it, the clause as it stands is open to abuse, though I cannot say that the thing is much improved by the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite. I shall vote for any Amendment that may obviate the particular objections advanced by the other side, and which have not been met by the Attorney General.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I think the Government is bound to give us some further explanation on this subject. We have it from the Attorney General that if the Bill passes as it stands it is possible for the titheowner to sue in respect of every apportionment or close. Before we go to a Division I should like to know whether the Government will introduce a proviso which will render it impossible for any titheowner to bring an action in respect of each parcel of land.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. and learned Member is anxious for some words to be inserted in order to prevent a wicked clergyman from bringing 50 actions where one would do. I will not form an opinion as to what the clergy are likely to do on the representations of the hon. Gentleman; but if any section of the Committee think it necessary to insert a proviso that only one action shall be brought in respect of several closes, I shall not have the slightest hesitation in accepting it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think the statement of the Attorney General is perfectly satisfactory; but this only shows how useful these discussions are. We had these separate actions held out to us as a threat for an hour and a half, and it was not until representations came from behind the right hon. Gentleman as to the injurious consequences of this that an offer of concession is made. It is quite plain that the danger was infinitely great, and the candour of the Attorney General has revealed the magnitude of it to-night. We may accept what he has said, and I hope he will put into the Bill the security for which we contend.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): The Attorney General has said the accusation against the clergy of Wales came from this side; but he is mistaken, and, indeed, it was himself who suggested that the clergy might use this method of retaliation.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 130
Noes 143.—(Div. List, No. 303.)

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): According to the present wording of this remarkable Bill, a new assumption is declared as to what the tithe rent-charge is. As I understand a tithe rent-charge, and as the definition is laid down in the Act of 1836, it is different in two or three important particulars from an ordinary rent-charge. But in the present Bill it seems to me that tithe rent-charge is put in the same category as if it were identical with an ordinary rent-charge. But there are grave differences and distinctions which are recognised in the Act of 1836, and should be incorporated in this Bill. A rent-charge, I assume, is a charge on the inheritance by the owner; in the second place, it is a fixed unvariable sum; and, thirdly, it is recoverable in default of payment if necessary by the sale of the land. A tithe rent-charge on the other hand, is chargeable not on the land, but on the produce of the land; it is not a fixed charge; it varies from year to year; and thirdly, it is recoverable by distress or occupation of the land, and never by sale. But the wording of this Bill puts a new construction upon a tithe rent-charge, either through bad intention or bad draftmanship. I saw a case tried before the late Vice Chancellor Bacon, in 1885, and reported in the Law Reports, 30 Chancery Division, it has been laid down clearly that the owner of a tithe rent-charge is not entitled to a sale of the land for the purpose of recovering his rent-charge. The object of my Amendment is to make it plain in this new measure that this is the law, and to bring the Bill into conformity with the Act of 1836.

Amendment proposed, in page line 5, to leave out "on account of," and insert "in the nature of a."—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

Mr. Atherley Jones

Question proposed, "That the words 'on account of,' stand part of the Question."

MR. MATTHEWS: I am really unable to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. The Bill speaks of a remedy in the County Court in order to recover tithe rent-charge. You are not bound to sue for the whole but can sue for part on account, or for the unpaid portion; and I really cannot see what is gained by this Amendment. If it has any effect at all, it seems to me to extend the remedy proposed in the Bill to something that is not actually tithe rent-charge, but is in the nature of a rent-charge. I do not think we gain anything by that, and I confess I do not appreciate the hon. Gentleman's object.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think the object of my hon. Friend is clear enough. The difficulty of the Home Secretary is that among his multifarious duties he is under the disadvantage of not having been able to understand the question of tithe or tithe rent-charge at all, and the consequence is that his Bill is drawn as I have said before, and may repeat it a thousand times, in absolute ignorance of the whole subject. The objection of my hon. Friend is this, that the Bill calls that a rent-charge which is not a rent-charge. It is not a rent-charge at all, nor was it so treated in the Act of 1836. The draftsman talks of "a tithe rent-charge charged upon the land." But there is no such thing existing in law, and to describe tithe rent-charge in that way is a mere ignorant blunder. That is not the language of the Act of 1836. It would almost be well to move to report Progress, in order to give the Home Secretary an opportunity of studying the matter for half an hour. He evidently has not the elementary conception of what is the nature of a tithe rent-charge. Tithe is not a rent-charge—that is the first proposition—nor in the ordinary sense is it a rent-charge upon the land, so the draftsman of the Bill has simply made a blunder. The Secretary to the Admiralty is amused; but I think that, probably, he knows more about navigation than of tithe rent-charge, and I will try to explain it to him. The authors of the Act of 1836 did know the nature of a tithe rent-charge, they were very careful not to call it a rent-charge charged upon the land, and the language they employed materially affects the whole question. They said it is in the nature of a rent-charge, but it is not a rent charge properly so called, it is not charged on the land, but it "issues out of the land charged therewith." These are very careful words; but the words in this Bill are the vulgar slip-slop of a man with vague and cloudy ideas of what tithe is and what rent-charge is; and all that my hon. Friend desires to do is to introduce the language used by the lawyers of 1836. It is not immaterial, because in the case quoted by my hon. Friend, the consequence of it being so described was that it was declared that a tithe rent-charge owner was not entitled to recover by sale of the land. But your new and clumsy phraseology would change the character of the law altogether. This vague slip-slop would effect a revolution in the character of this property, and you would make the land from which the tithe rent-charge issues liable to sale for the recovery of the tithe rent-charge. What difficulty is there about accepting the language of the Act of 1836? Why not accept the Amendment taken textually from the Act of 1836? Surely it would be better to do so now than occupy two hours, and then ultimately accept it as you have done in regard to other Amendments.

MR. MATTHEWS: When the right hon. Gentleman uses such expressions as "vulgar slip-slop," "ignorant blunders," and so on, one is tempted to apply the epithets to his own argument. He has had the courage to tell the Committee that the words in the Bill are not used in the Act of 1836, but when I turn to section 55 of that Act I find the expression "Tithe rent-charge charged on the several lands," &c., and again I find a like expression employed in the 58th Section. The draftsman of this Bill, then, has not blundered through ignorance; he has used the very language of the Act of 1836, and has displayed, I think, more knowledge of the Act than the right hon. Gentleman himself. I must say the Amendment appears to me to be perfectly idle and meaningless. I do not know to what it may be pointed, for the hon. Member's speech did not enlighten us. There can be no possibility of mistake as to the meaning and intention of the Bill, because Section 4 has a direct reference to the Act of 1836.

*MR. LLOYD MORGAN: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that Section 71 of the Act of 1836 describes tithe in precisely the same language as that employed by my hon. Friend. If my hon. Friend's Amendment is rejected, then it comes to this, that by this section it goes forth that tithe rent-charge is a charge upon the land, and not upon the produce of the land. Now, it has already been pointed out, if the charge were upon the land the tithe owner would have a right to sell the land in respect to which his tithe was not paid. But as my hon. Friend has shown by reference to the decision of Vice Chancellor Bacon, in a case in which this very point was raised a few years ago, there is no such power of sale, because the charge is a charge on the produce of the land, and not on the land. I understood from that decision that it was perfectly clear what was the nature of the charge issuing out of the land. I imagined that the Government did not desire to make any alteration in the law further than to introduce a change in the manner of collecting tithe. It seems to me, however, that the Government are now attempting to make tithe a charge upon the land, and not, as it has hitherto been held to be by the Courts, a charge upon the produce of the land.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I think it is scarcely fair for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby to speak of the draftsman of this Bill in the way he has done. The draftsman is a gentleman of great experience, and the right hon. Gentleman has himself taken advantage of his experience as often as anybody. There is not the slightest ground for the suggestion that these words will alter the law in any way, as the interpretation clause defines the tithe rent-charge as tithe rent-charge payable in pursuance of the Act of William IV., and in the Act of William IV. there are a series of charging sections which treat the rent-charge as being charged on the land. There is no question as to its being a charge on the land in a technical sense, and no one can contend that we alter the law. There is a whole series of sections in the Act of 1836 in which the words "charged upon the land" are used. In my judgment this is a simple and concise repetition of the Act of 1836. If it altered the law in any way. I would accept the Amendment, but I appeal to the House to let the words stand.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Attorney General admits that this is not a rent charge in the ordinary sense of the word. I admit that there are sections in the Act of 1836 in which it is spoken of as "rent-charge charged on the land," but there is a larger description of it than that, and I should be content if the tithe rent charge were spoken of as "tithe rent-charge under the Act of 1836." If the words "charged on the land" remain there will be a danger of making the land liable to sale as in the case of an ordinary rent-charge. Why will you not accept my proposal?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: We desire to meet the right hon. Gentleman as far as we can. We do not care at all for the word "charged," our impression being that this is a false point, and we are willing to accept the words "issuing out of the land."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think it would be simpler to say "tithe rent-charge as hereinafter defined."

MR. MATTHEWS: I would point out that that will not do because the land must be specified. At present the distress can only be for the tithe on the land in which the rent-charge is charged, and in like manner the execution has to be confined to the particular close or farm on which the rent-charge is charged or out of which it issues.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have no objection to the words proposed to be substituted, but I would point out that in the definition clause the expression "tithe-rent charge" means tithe rent-charge payable in pursuance of the Act of 1836.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Why not specifically introduce the words of the Act of 1836? That would get rid of all the difficulty. It is obvious from this discussion that there is considerable ambiguity in the words originally proposed, and the Committee will agree that we cannot be too careful in drafting this new procedure.

MR. T. ELLIS: The Attorney General has said that, tithe is a tithe rent-charge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: So it is.

Mr. Matthews

MR. T. ELLIS: It is not. The Home Secretary has taunted us on this side with gross ignorance on this subject. I would ask him if he still holds that tithe is a rent-charge?

MR. MATTHEWS: What I said was that tithe rent-charge is a rent-charge.

MR. T. ELLIS: That comes to the same thing. Tithe rent-charge is not a rent-charge.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My hon. Friend's Amendment is practically accepted by the Government. They take the first words of his Amendment, and the other part of it is in the definition clause. They are willing to omit the words he objects to—namely, "charged on any lands."

MR. T. ELLIS: After it has been shown conclusively that tithe rent charge is not a rent-charge, I am willing to withdraw the Amendment, in order to accept the words the Government propose.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the words 'charged on' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'issuing out of' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment is in the name of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. C. Gray), and is follows:—Clause 1, page 1, line 6, leave out "and," and insert—

"Shall not after the commencement of this Act distrain for the same in manner provided by the Act of the Session of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter 11, intituled 'An Act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales,' but in the case of any tithe rent-charge."

This is clearly out of order, in view of the decision arrived at by the House last night.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Are we to take it that by rejecting all the Instructions last night the Government have defeated the Amendments they themselves propose—that, for instance, of the Home Secretary in line 11, after "debt," to insert, "Provided that he shall not be entitled to distrain for any sum after he has sued for it under this section"?

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter is one of some intricacy, and when I first considered it I felt very much in the position of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Maldon wishes to do away with the power of distraint in all cases, substituting for it the process of recovery provided in the Bill; but the Home Secretary leaves the alternative methods of procedure open to the tithe owner, merely providing that, after the procedure in the Bill has been availed of, the old process of distraint shall not be adopted.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In the Bill there are words which preserve the rights at present in operation, whilst they give County Court jurisdiction without prejudice to any other remedy. Is it not possible for us to strike out the words which preserve the existing rights?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): We propose to do so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Amendments of the Home Secretary come to the same thing as that of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division would deprive the tithe owner of the power of distraint—of the exercise of his volition in the matter. The scheme of the Government on the other hand leaves the tithe owner the power of distraint, unless he has resort to the course provided in the Bill, in which case he must abandon the alternative of distraint.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why is not such an Amendment as that of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division in order without an Instruction to the Committee? The Bill is one "To Amend the Law Relating to the Recovery of Tithe Rent-Charge," and why in connection with such a Bill is it not possible to introduce a clause abolishing the process of distraint? What reason can there be against it? Under the Bill the tithe owner gets a new remedy and can keep his old one. What is there to prevent anyone moving an Amendment to confine him to the new remedy?

THE CHAIRMAN: The tithe owner may take the new remedy, in which case he will abandon the old; he may elect. With respect to the question whether an Amendment of this kind can be moved without an Instruction, it is sufficient to say that to allow such an Amendment would be inconsistent with the decision arrived at on the Instruction of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex. It is within the power of the Committee to amend the process for the recovery of tithe rent-charge, but not to take away against the will of the tithe owner the remedy which he now has, without an Instruction from the House to that effect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There was no Instruction touching the question of distress moved last night, though there were Instructions as to the election of remedies. I submit that if the proposal of the Government is that the owner shall elect one of two processes, it is competent without Instruction for the Committee to reject one of them.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member moved an Instruction to the Committee yesterday to provide that the tithe rent-charge should be recoverable from the landlord only. That was rejected, the House holding that the tenant, from whose property on the land the tithe is recoverable by restraint, should remain liable. It seems to me, therefore, that the Amendment now proposed is not permissible unless authorised by the House.

*MR. C. GRAY: It will, perhaps, save the time of the Committee if I say that, even if my Amendment had not been ruled out of order, I should not have moved it, as I consider there is more to be gained by another Amendment dealing with the period of time—extending the one month to three months—which Amendment would be impossible if the power of distraint were done away with.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move, in lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert "three years." The history of the tithe in Ireland was well known, and the Irish Members are past masters in the art of abolishing the iniquity. If I may give a "griffin" to my Welsh friends, it would be "accumulate arrears." If the Irish landlord has to wait years for his rent, I see no reason why the English parson should not wait as long. It seems to me that the contention of Her Majesty's Government, that this tithe is a sort of national institution, will not hold water. In Wales we find a small minority exacting this tax from the majority, hence I think it reasonable that we should allow the tithes to run into arrears to as great an extent as possible. If you do not do that you will never have a remedy for the monstrous exactions on the people who do not believe in the Established Church. Accumulate arrears, otherwise Parliament will not come to the rescue; make this more or less a burning question. If my Amendment is accepted I think the people will run into three years' arrears, and will avoid the hardships of having to pay this money year by year.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert, "three years."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question, "That 'one month' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, page 1, line 7, after the first "may," insert "having previously demanded thereof in writing."—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I beg to move after the word "may" to insert the words "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge." It would be hard on the tenant to be called upon to pay that which his landlord has covenanted to pay. The landlord may be impecunious and become a bankrupt or run away, or the tenancy being near its termination he may be unable to recover from future rent any payment for which he has been sued by the titheowner, and I desire to avoid the necessity of compelling the tenant under such circumstances to pay twice over. I hope the Government will accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after "may," to insert "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will see on a moment's reflection that the liability of the landlord to the tenant cannot affect the rights of a third party, the tithe owner. If the tenant wishes to avoid a distress at present he has to pay. The only remedy the tithe owner has is to go to the occupier and, if he does not pay, to distrain. No doubt there is some hardship in it in cases where the landlord has covenanted to pay, but the occupier has been fixed upon as the person liable to pay for the sake of convenience, as it is sometimes next to impossible to find the owner. The occupier, of course, will not suffer, as he can deduct the tithe from the rent.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: The landlord may receive the money from the tenant and may not pay it to the tithe owner.

MR. MATTHEWS: The landlord where he has covenanted to pay will do so, otherwise the amount will be deducted from the rent.

SIR W. HARCOURT: As long as the money is obtained by distress it can be paid only out of the produce of the land; but the Bill now substitutes another remedy. It is said that the tithe is to be stopped out of the rent; but the right hon. Gentleman has never met the point which you, Mr. Courtney, raised on the first night of the Debate, that the rent may not amount to so much as the tithe, or the produce of the land may not be sufficient to pay either the tithe or the rent. It is quite plain that the tenant will be deprived of the security he now has where the produce of the land will not yield the sum claimed.

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman does not allow for the effect of the sub-section of the clause providing that the judgment recovered may be executed against all personal property on which a distress for the sum can at the date of the execution be levied, and shall not be executed in any other manner. These words restrict the execution to precisely the property on which a distress can now be levied; and the Bill does not provide a personal remedy in the old sense of the word. The exceptional cases in which the rent is less than the tithe, or the property less than both, will stand in the same position as now. Where, then, is the hardship? I believe it is true that in some parts of Sussex the tithe exceeds the rent. In that case, says the right hon. Gentleman, you cannot recover. That is quite true, but neither can you now. The tenant would clearly have an action against his landlord if he were distrained upon under such circumstances. It seems to me, therefore, that the clause inflicts no hardship and no injustice.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. T. ELLIS: I am surprised that the Government are not willing to accept this Amendment. It is aimed at placing the cultivators of the soil in something like an equitable position. The Home Secretary says the provision of the Bill imposes a certain amount of hardship on the tenants. I beg to point out that you are placing a monstrous and intolerable hardship on a large number of the cultivators of the soil. It has been pointed out repeatedly that if this is a debt it is a debt from the landowner. According to the great national contract of 1836 the tithe rent-charge was to be paid by the landowner. So far so good. Not only was that so, but Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords and in declarations made all over the country said that hitherto the tenant had been placed under the inconvenience of having to pay a debt which was not his own debt. It was, he said, the debt of the landlord, and the landlord should pay it. Here is a case in which the landlord is not merely the debtor under the Act of 1836, but has entered into a contract with his tenant that he will pay the debt. When a tenant now refuses to pay the tithe, which is not his own debt, what do you on the other side of the House call him? You call him dishonest, and a Bishop of your own Church, the Bishop of Llandaff, says—

"It is abominable dishonesty; it is comparable to the act of a man who takes money from his landlord's pocket."

Because the tenant does not pay the debt of the landlord, that is how he is spoken of. Now, in this case the landlord solemnly covenants to pay the debt, and yet when my hon. Friend asks that the tenant shall not be distrained upon, the Government say they cannot accept the Amendment. Let me tell the Committee what may occur under this Bill. During the last four or five years agricultural distress has hit the agriculturists of Wales as hard as if not harder than any agriculturists in this country. They have been able to bear up better than might have been expected, because they live almost indescribably hard and thrifty lives. They have been able to keep their homes together and to keep on their farms owing to a life of very severe thrift and great sacrifice, and by denying themselves not merely the luxuries, but the very necessities of life. What is the result? In scores of cases when the tithe becomes due they are unable to pay it not merely out of the earnings of the year, but out of the accumulations of many years of thrift, and they have to borrow the money in order to pay the rent, which sometimes includes tithe. On the 1st of June they go to the landlord's office and pay over the rent plus the tithe. The very next week they may receive a note stating that the landlord has not paid his tithe, and that the tenant must therefore pay it. Unless under these circumstances the tenant does pay he has to face either distress or the County Court. But the Home Secretary says he has his remedy, because at the next rent day, some time in November, he can deduct the amount from the rent. The Home Secretary says he has an action. What a mockery to say that a yearly tenant can have an action against the landlord—the yearly tenant who can be turned from his home, and in many cases, has been because he has shot a rabbit or because he goes to a Nonconformist Chapel on Sunday. This is what is offered to the tenants in Wales and in England as compensation for the introduction of this wretched, monstrous, and preposterous Bill, every clause of which brings out some new iniquity or some shameful mistake in drafting or some shameful ignorance on the part of those in charge of it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I really do hope the Government will give way on this Amendment, because the clause is so unjust and so gross that if they do not we must go on discussing it until midnight or mid-day to-morrow. You are providing a means by which the tenants of England and Wales can be compelled to pay tithes. The Home Secretary says that if the tenant is such a weak and foolish man as to pay the tithe to the landlord he deserves all he can get. He is very ignorant, and this is not merely the commonest transaction in the world, but a transaction which the Act of 1836 contemplated, because the rent was to be inclusive of the tithe. It is only by that unfortunate system by which the landowners of England have always endeavoured to defeat every legislative provision in favour of the tenants that it has ever been otherwise. The Act of 1836 intended that the landowners should pay the tithe. The landowners of England combined to agree that they should not pay the tithe but should make the tenant pay it. That is exactly what happened in 1875, when the Legislature determined that the landowners should pay for the improvements of their tenants, and they instantly combined to contract themselves and to "notice" their tenants out of the Act. That is what the landowners have always done. They have always entered into conspiracies to defeat every arrangement of the Legislature in favour of the tenants. The hon. Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) said the other day that on the greater number of his farms the tenants paid the rent. Under these circumstances, the tenant does pay the tithe to the landlord, because in the rent he pays the tithe. Having paid the tithe in the rent to the landlord, on the understanding that the landlord should pay the tithe, what happens if the landlord becomes insolvent? The tenant then has to pay the tithe twice over. And then you offer him an action against an insolvent landlord. It is against compelling the tenant to pay the tithe twice over that this Amendment is aimed. Can anything be more simple? What is the use of the Government fighting us hour after hour on this point? Surely they must see that their opposition to the Amendment cannot be justified to their constituents. I cannot believe that the tenants and their supporters can refuse to give to the tenantry of England a protection of this kind, to which they are so plainly entitled.

difficulty of finding any other corpus against which a remedy could possibly be sought. The Government now make an excuse of the existence of that hardship for the creation of a new grievance of a very much graver character. They propose to turn the tithe into a personal debt against the occupier. Surely that is an extraordinary hardship and a great grievance. But now it appears that that grievance is to be placed on the occupier, even in cases where the landlord has contracted with the occupier that he will pay the tithe. I submit that that is a monstrous aggravation of the injustice. I do not think it has yet been observed that there is a positive advantage to the landowner in inducing the tenant to pay the tithe in reference to abatements of rent called for by the feeling of the country generally. If it is the habit in the district for the landlord to abate 10 or 15 per cent of the rent, the landlord who does not pay the tithe gives 10 or 15 per cent on less than the true rent, and on a smaller sum than the landlord who pays the tithe, and there are probably many clever landlords who expressly pay the tithes in order that they may be generous at a cheap rate. I have known a large landowner admit that that was the cause of the custom of payment of tithe by the tenant on his own estate. It does seem a most unreasonable thing to urge that men whose landlords have actually covenanted to pay the tithe should be compelled to pay it themselves.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I only wish to appeal to the sense of justice of Gentlemen opposite who are favourable to this Bill in reference to this Amendment. Just let us see what is the case the Government have made for the Bill. The Attorney General and the Home Secretary say the Bill is brought in to deal with the cases of tenants who can pay and will not pay, and that we need a speedy and easy mode of recovering the tithe rent-charge from tenants who are liable under their agreements to pay the tithe, and who, having the means to pay, will not pay. That is the point of view of the Government. I am not going to argue now whether they are right or wrong. We say that, admitting the grievance and the remedy, there is another class of tenants who have contracts with their landlords, under which the latter have

"Is to relieve both the tithe owner and the farmer from grievances under which they at present suffer—the tithe owner that he has to recover a tithe from the person who does not owe it, and the farmer from the grievance that, though he does not really owe, it he is called upon to it. I am aware that the farmer is put into that position by his own act—by an agreement made with his landlord—but the inconvenience of the process is unquestionably very great, because all variations in the amount of tithe fall upon the farmer, and are felt by him in bad times, causing much exasperation, owing to the farmer having to bear the brunt of the payment at a time when he can least afford it, and leaving him subject, if he does not pay it, to a process—that of distraint—which we know from experience is singularly calculated to excite popular feeling. . . . There can be no doubt that it is the land, and the land only, that is liable for the tithe. The occupier never has been, and is not now, by law liable. What is liable is the gross produce of the land. If the land yields no produce then there is no tithe due. That has been the case hitherto, and that will still be the case under this Bill. Though the Bill makes the landowner liable for the tithe, it really only provides a change of procedure, substituting the simpler procedure of the County Court in the place of the ancient and exasperating procedure of distraint."

What was Lord Salisbury's principle? It was that it was altogether a mistake to make the occupier liable in any sense of the word, that the owner was the man liable, and that even if the occupier had entered into a contract the inconvenience was so great that the Legislature was bound to step in and deal with it. The Government now ask that where the landlord has agreed to meet what was his original obligation, but refuses or neglects to do so, the tenant is to be made liable, is to be County Courted, is to be distrained upon; and the Home Secretary, in his light and airy way, tells us that the tenant can bring an action for the recovery of the sum of money he has been most unfairly compelled to pay.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Judging from the way in which some of my observations have been received, I am afraid it is not much good making any distinct statement in this matter. All I can say is that if the injustice suggested by the right hon. Gentleman were brought home to my mind, I should be one of the first to vote for the Amendment; but it is because the right hon. Gentleman has, unintentionally of course, lost sight of the real position, that he has failed to see that injustice does not exist. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that the tithe receiver has no remedy against the owner of land. Whether or not an Act should be passed to alter the state of things is another matter; but at the present time, as the law now stands, as the law will stand after this Bill is passed, the tithe receiver has no remedy against the owner at all. We must bear that fact in mind. Our view is that we ought to get rid of the exasperating remedy by distress. We may be right or wrong, but, as Lord Salisbury said, we think a great deal of those troubles have come about because of the method in which tithe is to be recoverable. The process of distress, whether it be for rent or tithe, often has produced trouble, disturbance and turmoil in the districts in which it is resorted to, and therefore we are providing an alternative remedy. The right hon. Gentleman says we ought to provide that alternative remedy in cases where the landlord has covenanted to pay the tithe. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman applies to the law as it stands now. Where the tenant has paid what is called a higher rent, the tithe receiver has no alternative; he must distrain, he must go against the occupier as the law now stands. What we want is to induce people to resort to the County Court remedy, and not to the remedy by distress. The tithe receiver knows nothing about the covenants between the owners and the occupiers. The tithe receiver cannot tell whether the tenant is paying a rent whereby he is to pay tithe or not. [Mr. SEALE-HAYNE: He knows it by the agreements.] He cannot know it before he takes proceedings; he cannot tell whether the rent is one inclusive or exclusive of tithe. But whether the tenant is to pay the tithe or not, the only remedy the tithe receiver has got is to go against the occupier. We may be wrong, but we believe the alternative remedy suggested will remove the cause of disturbance in many cases. Why should we not be allowed to provide a resort to that which we believe will have a salutary effect? If we were to increase the burden on the occupier by a single fraction, I admit the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton would be right, but they will recollect that by Section 2 of Clause 1 the tithe receiver is only to be allowed to levy by execution on the same goods and under the same circumstances as the distress would be levied. I respectfully urge there is no reason for excluding from the operation of the Bill the particular case in which the tenant has got a remedy against the landlord.

MR. H. GARDNER: I am one of the last to wish to believe that Her Majesty's Government are anxious to stereotype injustice, but I am drawn against my will to say they are doing so. The Attorney General has admitted there is injustice under the existing state of circumstances. He has pointed to it as a matter which ought to be remedied, and yet in this Bill he stereotypes the very thing he admits to be an injustice. You have disturbed the settlement of 1836, and you are not ready to face the consequences. The Attorney General tells us the occupier has the remedy against the landlord of bringing an action. What is the reason for recovering from the owner, and through the occupier? One hon. Gentleman assigns as a reason, that the landlord is often a very mysterious person, whom it is difficult to get at. If such is the case, how is the poor tenant to fare? The Government have brought forward this measure in the interest of the tithe owner, and they will do nothing in the interest of the tithe payer.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): It is quite clear that the tithe owner may have great difficulty in knowing who the owner of the property is. In the case of the income tax the occupier is made the payer, because the Government has no means of knowing who is the actual owner. When a man makes a contract he knows with whom he is dealing. The tenant knows with whom he is dealing, but the tithe receiver does not of necessity know who the landowner is. I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton with regard to the stereotyping of injustice in this case. When the landlord and tenant agree that the landlord is to pay the tithe the tenant knows that he is primarily liable. He is liable to have his goods seized by way of distress. A jeweller whose shop is liable to tithe is liable to have every article of jewelry swept away. It is an entire mistake to suppose that the tithe rent-charge is only issuable from the produce of the land. The tithe rent-charge actually issues from the land, but every particle of property belonging to the tenant is liable to be seized.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I was very much puzzled by the reply of the Attorney General to the strong appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler). The hon. and learned Gentleman says the law as it at present stands gives the tithe owner no remedy against the landowner. I turn to the Bill which Lord Salisbury spoke of in the speech which has been quoted, and I present the Attorney General with the easiest way out of the difficulty. In the Bill introduced by the Government two years ago I find that in the first instance the landowner was to become primarily and only liable for the tithe. All the problems about the tithe rent-charge issuing out of the land and the produce of the land fall to the ground in face of the very measure which the Government brought in last Session. You only want to adopt a part of the clause of last year, and you get out of the difficulty at once. The words of last year's Bill are—

"After the commencement of this Act any owner for the time being of such land who has agreed to pay the tithe shall be liable to pay such rent-charge and all arrears thereon upon being due, and the same may be recoverable in the manner provided by this Act."

There you have an alternative remedy.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: The difficulty which arises here is that which would have arisen on an Amendment further down — namely, who is to be the person primarily liable, the occupier or the owner? Some of us have thought that, under all circumstances, the owner was the person to be held liable, and, above all things, that he should be liable under the circumstances stated in this Bill. It is said by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Ambrose) that there is some difficulty in finding who is the owner of the land. To my utter surprise I heard that statement cheered by the Leader of the House and the Home Secretary. If they will go into their own parishes and look at the rate books they will find there is nothing more certain than who is the owner of the land. The occupation of the land is sometimes uncertain, but the owner of the land is easily discoverable. Now, who should be liable, and should an agreement between the landlord and tenant be taken notice of? It is said that an agreement has been made between the landlord and tenant of which the tithe owner cannot know. If you are to take advantage of an agreement which makes the tenant liable, why not take advantage of an agreement which makes the owner liable? The landowner is the person who is properly liable.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The Attorney General confesses there is a gross injustice. Yet he says he is powerless to remedy it. It is said that the landlords will not benefit by this Bill, and I do not know that any class will particularly, and if this Amendment is rejected I fully expect that in county constituencies we shall have a walk-over at the next General Election. I cannot imagine any agricultural voter supporting the Attorney General. But I prefer to support the Amendment simply on the grounds of justice. The Amendment deals simply with the cases of landowners under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge. No doubt, in the first instance, the tenant will be liable for judgment and execution, and you have given him the remedy of action against the landlord. But supposing the landlord is abroad or that he is insolvent, how is he to get back the money he has wrongly paid? It seems to me you put the tenant under the harrow first and then you leave him to chance for his remedy. The argument that the landlord may not be known has, of course,

*MR. GEIDGE (Stockport): I agree that it is against the owner and not the occupier of the land that the primary remedy should lie when tithe rent-charge is not paid, and I hope a number of the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in support of that view will support me when we come to the point at which I shall propose to substitute owner for occupier, which will give the opportunity of applying the remedy where it ought to be applied. But for all that I cannot support the Amendment before us, and I will explain why. The Amendment is to this effect, that if there be a contract between occupier and owner, whereby the owner is to pay the tithe rent-charge, then the tithe-owner is to be deprived not of all remedy against the occupier, but only of the particular remedy in this Bill. The hon. Member does not propose to take away from the tithe owner the power of distraint upon the goods of the occupier, if there be such a contract between him and the landowner as is contemplated in the Amendment. That remedy would remain, and the only difference acceptance of this Amendment would make would be that the tithe owner, driven from this remedy, would be obliged to have recourse to distress against the tenant, and so practically this Amendment would give the contracting tenant no protection at all. There is this further hardship to the tithe owner, that he might not be able to find out whether such a contract existed until the defence was put in to his action, and he would then be mulcted in the costs. Of course the practical difficulty about the owner is not to find out who he is, but where he is. You may, as my hon. and learned Friend says, readily find out who the landowner is, but the difficulty is to find out where he is. It may be difficult to sue him, but really this question does not arise. It is not necessary for the occupier who pays under pressure tithe rent-charge, which the landlord has contracted to pay to sue the landlord, because he can deduct the amount from the next rent due, and so the occupier will have no grievance.

Mr. G. Osborne Morgan

I think I have shown the Amendment will not have the effect which is desired. That effect, however, will be gained by the Amendment of which I have given notice, and consequently I look forward to carrying that by a considerable majority.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Attorney General has alluded to an action against the owner, but that does not arise. The point really is, addressing myself to the Attorney General's argument, if this remedy which the Government propose was to be an absolutely substituted remedy there would be no alternative, and then, I admit, the Attorney General's argument would be a very difficult one to answer, but the case is this: the Government leave the old remedy precisely as it was, but this gives an additional and alternative remedy against this improper proceeding of tenants whom the tithe owner waits to punish. The Attorney General admits there is an injustice in the present arrangement, and he charges us with wishing to stereotype it, but that we do not wish to do. What we propose is that the present arrangement should remain as it is, that the produce of the land only should be liable, and that the tenant should be liable to distress in respect to that produce, and that that should be the only remedy the tithe owner should have against a tenant in the event of the tenant being under contract with his landlord not to pay tithe. The hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) assumes that the occupier is personally liable, but there is no provision in the law as to personal liability in respect to tithe-charge. The landlord is not liable, the tenant is not liable, there is no person in existence at the present moment who is liable. Now, the Government say we are going to make the tenant liable to be sued, and assuming that that is necessary, we say, do not extend that liability to those cases where the landlord has contracted to pay the tithe rent-charge. That is the point, and a good deal that has been said is beside the mark. As to finding the landlord, the tithe owner cannot do so now, nor can he touch the tenant, all that he can touch is the produce of the land, and we do not wish to interfere with that arrangement, we would have it remain as it is, the hay, the corn, the produce of the land being liable for the payment of tithe. When you enable these tithe-owners to put the occupier into the County Court, you give him the power of imposing upon the occupier the additional penalty of costs, no inconsiderable item. The Attorney General says how is the tithe-owner to know of the existence of the contract, and, of course, he would not know if the contract were a secret one, but I say that does not touch the case. If it was to be the only remedy, then the Attorney General's argument would be sound; but we do not interfere with the remedy existing, and there is always the produce upon which the tithe-owner can distrain. There is an alternative remedy, and what we say is let the status quo be preserved, do not make the occupier liable to twice payment of the tithe, plus the cost of the County Court proceedings.

*MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): We are told that the tenant can withhold the amount of the tithe from his rent; but may I ask what is to happen when the tenant's rent does not equal the amount of the tithe? It is not an impossible case, there are many acres in Wilts and Hants, and, I think, in Dorset also where the rent is less than the tithe. I certainly think the tenant farmer, under this Bill, may find himself in the position of being compelled to meet a demand for tithes, for which, owing to the smallness of his rent, he might not be able sufficiently to recoup himself.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): The question of the hon. Member who has just sat down will be of even greater importance if the Committee will remember that in addition to the tithe itself there will be the County Court costs. I am not quite sure whether the latter could be recovered from the landlord. The question is, where there is a covenant between landlord and tenant by which the landlord is to pay the tithe and does not do so, can the tenant recover both tithe and costs? It seems to me there is a considerable lapsus that may involve the tenant in serious responsibility. There are lands just within the verge of cultivation to which the question of tithe is just that which will decide whether the land shall go out of cultivation, and this, therefore, is a serious question from the producer's point of view. I am sure there is not a Member on this side who did not feel confident that the Government would accept this Amendment. What has become of all the Government promises, to look at this from the tenant's point of view, and that some part of the obligation should rest upon the landlord? I take last night's Division List as showing that the sense of the House is in favour of making this a landlord's charge instead of a tenant's charge, and this should make it obligatory upon the Government to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. It is a fact that ought to be stated that we should have been in a majority last night but that five of our Members were in prison.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM: We are losing sight of the essential point. It is admitted on both sides that the landlord is chiefly liable, and the whole of the talk seems to me to get him out of his liability and to put that liability upon some one else; but let us go straight to the point, if the landlord is liable let that be distinctly laid down. The landlord ought to be liable, and to be prohibited from contracting himself out of the liability, as employers are prohibited from contracting themselves out of the Employers' Liability Act.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: There appears to be some confusion in the minds of some hon. Members as to who is liable for the tithe rent-charge by law, but there is no doubt whatever that the occupier is the person liable for tithe rent-charge all over England, and upon the occupier only can the tithe owner come. [Cries of "No!"] And not only can the tithe rent-charge owner come upon the occupier for the produce of the land, he can come upon his personal property, his house or other property upon the land; even a railway station and its plant may be liable on tithe-paying land.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: There is a special Act.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: My hon. Friend interrupts me, but I think my knowledge of the law on this subject is equal to his. From the occupier because Section 4 has a direct reference to the Act of 1836.

*MR. LLOYD MORGAN: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that Section 71 of the Act of 1836 describes tithe in precisely the same language as that employed by my hon. Friend. If my hon. Friend's Amendment is rejected, then it comes to this, that by this section it goes forth that tithe rent-charge is a charge upon the land, and not upon the produce of the land. Now, it has already been pointed out, if the charge were upon the land the tithe owner would have a right to sell the land in respect to which his tithe was not paid. But as my hon. Friend has shown by reference to the decision of Vice Chancellor Bacon, in a case in which this very point was raised a few years ago, there is no such power of sale, because the charge is a charge on the produce of the land, and not on the land. I understood from that decision that it was perfectly clear what was the nature of the charge issuing out of the land. I imagined that the Government did not desire to make any alteration in the law further than to introduce a change in the manner of collecting tithe. It seems to me, however, that the Government are now attempting to make tithe a charge upon the land, and not, as it has hitherto been held to be by the Courts, a charge upon the produce of the land.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I think it is scarcely fair for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby to speak of the draftsman of this Bill in the way he has done. The draftsman is a gentleman of great experience, and the right hon. Gentleman has himself taken advantage of his experience as often as anybody. There is not the slightest ground for the suggestion that these words will alter the law in any way, as the interpretation clause defines the tithe rent-charge as tithe rent-charge payable in pursuance of the Act of William IV., and in the Act of William IV. there are a series of charging sections which treat the rent-charge as being charged on the land. There is no question as to its being a charge on the land in a technical sense, and no one can contend that we alter the law. There is a whole series of sections in the Act of 1836 in which the words "charged upon the land" are used. In my judgment this is a simple and concise repetition of the Act of 1836. If it altered the law in any way. I would accept the Amendment, but I appeal to the House to let the words stand.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Attorney General admits that this is not a rent charge in the ordinary sense of the word. I admit that there are sections in the Act of 1836 in which it is spoken of as "rent-charge charged on the land," but there is a larger description of it than that, and I should be content if the tithe rent charge were spoken of as "tithe rent-charge under the Act of 1836." If the words "charged on the land" remain there will be a danger of making the land liable to sale as in the case of an ordinary rent-charge. Why will you not accept my proposal?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: We desire to meet the right hon. Gentleman as far as we can. We do not care at all for the word "charged," our impression being that this is a false point, and we are willing to accept the words "issuing out of the land."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think it would be simpler to say "tithe rent-charge as hereinafter defined."

MR. MATTHEWS: I would point out that that will not do because the land must be specified. At present the distress can only be for the tithe on the land in which the rent-charge is charged, and in like manner the execution has to be confined to the particular close or farm on which the rent-charge is charged or out of which it issues.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have no objection to the words proposed to be substituted, but I would point out that in the definition clause the expression "tithe-rent charge" means tithe rent-charge payable in pursuance of the Act of 1836.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Why not specifically introduce the words of the Act of 1836? That would get rid of all the difficulty. It is obvious from this discussion that there is considerable ambiguity in the words originally proposed, and the Committee will agree that we cannot be too careful in drafting this new procedure.

MR. T. ELLIS: The Attorney General has said that, tithe is a tithe rent-charge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: So it is.

Mr. Matthews

MR. T. ELLIS: It is not. The Home Secretary has taunted us on this side with gross ignorance on this subject. I would ask him if he still holds that tithe is a rent-charge?

MR. MATTHEWS: What I said was that tithe rent-charge is a rent-charge.

MR. T. ELLIS: That comes to the same thing. Tithe rent-charge is not a rent-charge.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My hon. Friend's Amendment is practically accepted by the Government. They take the first words of his Amendment, and the other part of it is in the definition clause. They are willing to omit the words he objects to—namely, "charged on any lands."

MR. T. ELLIS: After it has been shown conclusively that tithe-rent charge is not a rent-charge, I am willing to withdraw the Amendment, in order to accept the words the Government propose.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the words 'charged on' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'issuing out of' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment is in the name of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. C. Gray), and is follows:—Clause 1, page 1, line 6, leave out "and," and insert—

"Shall not after the commencement of this Act distrain for the same in manner provided by the Act of the Session of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter 11, intituled 'An Act for the Commutation of Tithes in England and Wales,' but in the case of any tithe rent-charge."

This is clearly out of order, in view of the decision arrived at by the House last night.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Are we to take it that by rejecting all the Instructions last night the Government have defeated the Amendments they themselves propose—that, for instance, of the Home Secretary in line 11, after "debt," to insert, "Provided that he shall not be entitled to distrain for any sum after he has sued for it under this section"?

THE CHAIRMAN: The matter is one of some intricacy, and when I first considered it I felt very much in the position of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Maldon wishes to do away with the power of distraint in all cases, substituting for it the process of recovery provided in the Bill; but the Home Secretary leaves the alternative methods of procedure open to the tithe owner, merely providing that, after the procedure in the Bill has been availed of, the old process of distraint shall not be adopted.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In the Bill there are words which preserve the rights at present in operation, whilst they give County Court jurisdiction without prejudice to any other remedy. Is it not possible for us to strike out the words which preserve the existing rights?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): We propose to do so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Amendments of the Home Secretary come to the same thing as that of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division would deprive the tithe owner of the power of distraint—of the exercise of his volition in the matter. The scheme of the Government on the other hand leaves the tithe owner the power of distraint, unless he has resort to the course provided in the Bill, in which case he must abandon the alternative of distraint.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Why is not such an Amendment as that of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division in order without an Instruction to the Committee? The Bill is one "To Amend the Law Relating to the Recovery of Tithe Rent-Charge," and why in connection with such a Bill is it not possible to introduce a clause abolishing the process of distraint? What reason can there be against it? Under the Bill the tithe owner gets a new remedy and can keep his old one. What is there to prevent anyone moving an Amendment to confine him to the new remedy?

THE CHAIRMAN: The tithe owner may take the new remedy, in which case he will abandon the old; he may elect. With respect to the question whether an Amendment of this kind can be moved without an Instruction, it is sufficient to say that to allow such an Amendment would be inconsistent with the decision arrived at on the Instruction of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex. It is within the power of the Committee to amend the process for the recovery of tithe rent-charge, but not to take away against the will of the tithe owner the remedy which he now has, without an Instruction from the House to that effect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There was no Instruction touching the question of distress moved last night, though there were Instructions as to the election of remedies. I submit that if the proposal of the Government is that the owner shall elect one of two processes, it is competent without Instruction for the Committee to reject one of them.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member moved an Instruction to the Committee yesterday to provide that the tithe rent-charge should be recoverable from the landlord only. That was rejected, the House holding that the tenant, from whose property on the land the tithe is recoverable by restraint, should remain liable. It seems to me, therefore, that the Amendment now proposed is not permissible unless authorised by the House.

*MR. C. GRAY: It will, perhaps, save the time of the Committee if I say that, even if my Amendment had not been ruled out of order, I should not have moved it, as I consider there is more to be gained by another Amendment dealing with the period of time—extending the one month to three months—which Amendment would be impossible if the power of distraint were done away with.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to move, in lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert "three years." The history of the tithe in Ireland was well known, and the Irish Members are past masters in the art of abolishing the iniquity. If I may give a "griffin" to my Welsh friends, it would be "accumulate arrears." If the Irish landlord has to wait years for his rent, I see no reason why the English parson should not wait as long. It seems to me that the contention of Her Majesty's Government, that this tithe is a sort of national institution, will not hold water. In Wales we find a small minority exacting this tax from the majority, hence I think it reasonable that we should allow the tithes to run into arrears to as great an extent as possible. If you do not do that you will never have a remedy for the monstrous exactions on the people who do not believe in the Established Church. Accumulate arrears, otherwise Parliament will not come to the rescue; make this more or less a burning question. If my Amendment is accepted I think the people will run into three years' arrears, and will avoid the hardships of having to pay this money year by year.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 6 and 7, to leave out "one month," and insert, "three years."—(Mr. Blane.)

Question, "That 'one month' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, Clause 1, page 1, line 7, after the first "may," insert "having previously demanded thereof in writing."—(Mr. T. Ellis.)

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I beg to move after the word "may" to insert the words "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge." It would be hard on the tenant to be called upon to pay that which his landlord has covenanted to pay. The landlord may be impecunious and become a bankrupt or run away, or the tenancy being near its termination he may be unable to recover from future rent any payment for which he has been sued by the titheowner, and I desire to avoid the necessity of compelling the tenant under such circumstances to pay twice over. I hope the Government will accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after "may," to insert "if the owner of such lands is not under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will see on a moment's reflection that the liability of the landlord to the tenant cannot affect the rights of a third party, the tithe owner. If the tenant wishes to avoid a distress at present he has to pay. The only remedy the tithe owner has is to go to the occupier and, if he does not pay, to distrain. No doubt there is some hardship in it in cases where the landlord has covenanted to pay, but the occupier has been fixed upon as the person liable to pay for the sake of convenience, as it is sometimes next to impossible to find the owner. The occupier, of course, will not suffer, as he can deduct the tithe from the rent.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: The landlord may receive the money from the tenant and may not pay it to the tithe owner.

MR. MATTHEWS: The landlord where he has covenanted to pay will do so, otherwise the amount will be deducted from the rent.

SIR W. HARCOURT: As long as the money is obtained by distress it can be paid only out of the produce of the land; but the Bill now substitutes another remedy. It is said that the tithe is to be stopped out of the rent; but the right hon. Gentleman has never met the point which you, Mr. Courtney, raised on the first night of the Debate, that the rent may not amount to so much as the tithe, or the produce of the land may not be sufficient to pay either the tithe or the rent. It is quite plain that the tenant will be deprived of the security he now has where the produce of the land will not yield the sum claimed.

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman does not allow for the effect of the sub-section of the clause providing that the judgment recovered may be executed against all personal property on which a distress for the sum can at the date of the execution be levied, and shall not be executed in any other manner. These words restrict the execution to precisely the property on which a distress can now be levied; and the Bill does not provide a personal remedy in the old sense of the word. The exceptional cases in which the rent is less than the tithe, or the property less than both, will stand in the same position as now. Where, then, is the hardship? I believe it is true that in some parts of Sussex the tithe exceeds the rent. In that case, says the right hon. Gentleman, you cannot recover. That is quite true, but neither can you now. The tenant would clearly have an action against his landlord if he were distrained upon under such circumstances. It seems to me, therefore, that the clause inflicts no hardship and no injustice.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. T. ELLIS: I am surprised that the Government are not willing to accept this Amendment. It is aimed at placing the cultivators of the soil in something like an equitable position. The Home Secretary says the provision of the Bill imposes a certain amount of hardship on the tenants. I beg to point out that you are placing a monstrous and intolerable hardship on a large number of the cultivators of the soil. It has been pointed out repeatedly that if this is a debt it is a debt from the landowner. According to the great national contract of 1836 the tithe rent-charge was to be paid by the landowner. So far so good. Not only was that so, but Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords and in declarations made all over the country said that hitherto the tenant had been placed under the inconvenience of having to pay a debt which was not his own debt. It was, he said, the debt of the landlord, and the landlord should pay it. Here is a case in which the landlord is not merely the debtor under the Act of 1836, but has entered into a contract with his tenant that he will pay the debt. When a tenant now refuses to pay the tithe, which is not his own debt, what do you on the other side of the House call him? You call him dishonest, and a Bishop of your own Church, the Bishop of Llandaff, says—

Because the tenant does not pay the debt of the landlord, that is how he is spoken of. Now, in this case the landlord solemnly covenants to pay the debt, and yet when my hon. Friend asks that the tenant shall not be distrained upon, the Government say they cannot accept the Amendment. Let me tell the Committee what may occur under this Bill. During the last four or five years agricultural distress has hit the agriculturists of Wales as hard as if not harder than any agriculturists in this country. They have been able to bear up better than might have been expected, because they live almost indescribably hard and thrifty lives. They have been able to keep their homes together and to keep on their farms owing to a life of very severe thrift and great sacrifice, and by denying themselves not merely the luxuries, but the very necessities of life. What is the result? In scores of cases when the tithe becomes due they are unable to pay it not merely out of the earnings of the year, but out of the accumulations of many years of thrift, and they have to borrow the money in order to pay the rent, which sometimes includes tithe. On the 1st of June they go to the landlord's office and pay over the rent plus the tithe. The very next week they may receive a note stating that the landlord has not paid his tithe, and that the tenant must therefore pay it. Unless under these circumstances the tenant does pay he has to face either distress or the County Court. But the Home Secretary says he has his remedy, because at the next rent day, some time in November, he can deduct the amount from the rent. The Home Secretary says he has an action. What a mockery to say that a yearly tenant can have an action against the landlord—the yearly tenant who can be turned from his home, and in many cases, has been because he has shot a rabbit or because he goes to a Nonconformist Chapel on Sunday. This is what is offered to the tenants in Wales and in England as compensation for the introduction of this wretched, monstrous, and preposterous Bill, every clause of which brings out some new iniquity or some shameful mistake in drafting or some shameful ignorance on the part of those in charge of it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I really do hope the Government will give way on this Amendment, because the clause is so unjust and so gross that if they do not we must go on discussing it until midnight or mid-day to-morrow. You are providing a means by which the tenants of England and Wales can be compelled to pay tithes. The Home Secretary says that if the tenant is such a weak and foolish man as to pay the tithe to the landlord he deserves all he can get. He is very ignorant, and this is not merely the commonest transaction in the world, but a transaction which the Act of 1836 contemplated, because the rent was to be inclusive of the tithe. It is only by that unfortunate system by which the landowners of England have always endeavoured to defeat every legislative provision in favour of the tenants that it has ever been otherwise. The Act of 1836 intended that the landowners should pay the tithe. The landowners of England combined to agree that they should not pay the tithe but should make the tenant pay it. That is exactly what happened in 1875, when the Legislature determined that the landowners should pay for the improvements of their tenants, and they instantly combined to contract themselves and to "notice" their tenants out of the Act. That is what the landowners have always done. They have always entered into conspiracies to defeat every arrangement of the Legislature in favour of the tenants. The hon. Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) said the other day that on the greater number of his farms the tenants paid the rent. Under these circumstances, the tenant does pay the tithe to the landlord, because in the rent he pays the tithe. Having paid the tithe in the rent to the landlord, on the understanding that the landlord should pay the tithe, what happens if the landlord becomes insolvent? The tenant then has to pay the tithe twice over. And then you offer him an action against an insolvent landlord. It is against compelling the tenant to pay the tithe twice over that this Amendment is aimed. Can anything be more simple? What is the use of the Government fighting us hour after hour on this point? Surely they must see that their opposition to the Amendment cannot be justified to their constituents. I cannot believe that the tenants and their supporters can refuse to give to the tenants of England a protection of this kind, to which they are so plainly entitled.

difficulty of finding any other corpus against which a remedy could possibly be sought. The Government now make an excuse of the existence of that hardship for the creation of a new grievance of a very much graver character. They propose to turn the tithe into a personal debt against the occupier. Surely that is an extraordinary hardship and a great grievance. But now it appears that that grievance is to be placed on the occupier, even in cases where the landlord has contracted with the occupier that he will pay the tithe. I submit that that is a monstrous aggravation of the injustice. I do not think it has yet been observed that there is a positive advantage to the landowner in inducing the tenant to pay the tithe in reference to abatements of rent called for by the feeling of the country generally. If it is the habit in the district for the landlord to abate 10 or 15 per cent of the rent, the landlord who does not pay the tithe gives 10 or 15 per cent on less than the true rent, and on a smaller sum than the landlord who pays the tithe, and there are probably many clever landlords who expressly pay the tithes in order that they may be generous at a cheap rate. I have known a large landowner admit that that was the cause of the custom of payment of tithe by the tenant on his own estate. It does seem a most unreasonable thing to urge that men whose landlords have actually covenanted to pay the tithe should be compelled to pay it themselves.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I only wish to appeal to the sense of justice of Gentlemen opposite who are favourable to this Bill in reference to this Amendment. Just let us see what is the case the Government have made for the Bill. The Attorney General and the Home Secretary say the Bill is brought in to deal with the cases of tenants who can pay and will not pay, and that we need a speedy and easy mode of recovering the tithe rent-charge from tenants who are liable under their agreements to pay the tithe, and who, having the means to pay, will not pay. That is the point of view of the Government. I am not going to argue now whether they are right or wrong. We say that, admitting the grievance and the remedy, there is another class of tenants who have contracts with their landlords, under which the latter have

"Is to relieve both the tithe owner and the farmer from grievances under which they at present suffer—the tithe owner that he has to recover a tithe from the person who does not owe it, and the farmer from the grievance that, though he does not really owe, it he is called upon to it. I am aware that the farmer is put into that position by his own act—by an agreement made with his landlord—but the inconvenience of the process is unquestionably very great, because all variations in the amount of tithe fall upon the farmer, and are felt by him in bad times, causing much exasperation, owing to the farmer having to bear the brunt of the payment at a time when he can least afford it, and leaving him subject, if he does not pay it, to a process—that of distraint—which we know from experience is singularly calculated to excite popular feeling. . . There can be no doubt that it is the land, and the land only, that is liable for the tithe. The occupier never has been, and is not now, by law liable. What is liable is the gross produce of the land. If the land yields no produce then there is no tithe due. That has been the case hitherto, and that will still be the case under this Bill. Though the Bill makes the landowner liable for the tithe, it really only provides a change of procedure, substituting the simpler procedure of the County Court in the place of the ancient and exasperating procedure of distraint."

What was Lord Salisbury's principle? It was that it was altogether a mistake to make the occupier liable in any sense of the word, that the owner was the man liable, and that even if the occupier had entered into a contract the inconvenience was so great that the Legislature was bound to step in and deal with it. The Government now ask that where the landlord has agreed to meet what was his original obligation, but refuses or neglects to do so, the tenant is to be made liable, is to be County Courted, is to be distrained upon; and the Home Secretary, in his light and airy way, tells us that the tenant can bring an action for the recovery of the sum of money he has been most unfairly compelled to pay.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Judging from the way in which some of my observations have been received, I am afraid it is not much good making any distinct statement in this matter. All I can say is that if the injustice suggested by the right hon. Gentleman were brought home to my mind, I should be one of the first to vote for the Amendment; but it is because the right hon. Gentleman has, unintentionally of course, lost sight of the real position, that he has failed to see that injustice does not exist. The right hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that the tithe receiver has no remedy against the owner of land. Whether or not an Act should be passed to alter the state of things is another matter; but at the present time, as the law now stands, as the law will stand after this Bill is passed, the tithe receiver has no remedy against the owner at all. We must bear that fact in mind. Our view is that we ought to get rid of the exasperating remedy by distraint. We may be right or wrong, but, as Lord Salisbury said, we think a great deal of those troubles have come about because of the method in which tithe is to be recoverable. The process of distress, whether it be for rent or tithe, often has produced trouble, disturbance and turmoil in the districts in which it is resorted to, and therefore we are providing an alternative remedy. The right hon. Gentleman says we ought to provide that alternative remedy in cases where the landlord has covenanted to pay the tithe. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman applies to the law as it stands now. Where the tenant has paid what is called a higher rent, the tithe receiver has no alternative; he must distrain, he must go against the occupier as the law now stands. What we want is to induce people to resort to the County Court remedy, and not to the remedy by distress. The tithe receiver knows nothing about the covenants between the owners and the occupiers. The tithe receiver cannot tell whether the tenant is paying a rent whereby he is to pay tithe or not. [Mr. SEALE-HAYNE: He knows it by the agreements.] He cannot know it before he takes proceedings; he cannot tell whether the rent is one inclusive or exclusive of tithe. But whether the tenant is to pay the tithe or not, the only remedy the tithe receiver has got is to go against the occupier. We may be wrong, but we believe the alternative remedy suggested will remove the cause of disturbance in many cases. Why should we not be allowed to provide a resort to that which we believe will have a salutary effect? If we were to increase the burden on the occupier by a single fraction, I admit the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton would be right, but they will recollect that by Section 2 of Clause 1 the tithe receiver is only to be allowed to levy by execution on the same goods and under the same circumstances as the distress would be levied. I respectfully urge there is no reason for excluding from the operation of the Bill the particular case in which the tenant has got a remedy against the landlord.

MR. H. GARDNER: I am one of the last to wish to believe that Her Majesty's Government are anxious to stereotype injustice, but I am drawn against my will to say they are doing so. The Attorney General has admitted there is injustice under the existing state of circumstances. He has pointed to it as a matter which ought to be remedied, and yet in this Bill he stereotypes the very thing he admits to be an injustice. You have disturbed the settlement of 1836, and you are not ready to face the consequences. The Attorney General tells us the occupier has the remedy against the landlord of bringing an action. What is the reason for recovering from the owner, and through the occupier? One hon. Gentleman assigns as a reason, that the landlord is often a very mysterious person, whom it is difficult to get at. If such is the case, how is the poor tenant to fare? The Government have brought forward this measure in the interest of the tithe owner, and they will do nothing in the interest of the tithe payer.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): It is quite clear that the tithe owner may have great difficulty in knowing who the owner of the property is. In the case of the income tax the occupier is made the payer, because the Government has no means of knowing who is the actual owner. When a man makes a contract he knows with whom he is dealing. The tenant knows with whom he is dealing, but the tithe receiver does not of necessity know who the landowner is. I cannot agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton with regard to the stereotyping of injustice in this case. When the landlord and tenant agree that the landlord is to pay the tithe the tenant knows that he is primarily liable. He is liable to have his goods seized by way of distress. A jeweller whose shop is liable to tithe is liable to have every article of jewelry swept away. It is an entire mistake to suppose that the tithe rent-charge is only issuable from the produce of the land. The tithe rent-charge actually issues from the land, but every particle of property belonging to the tenant is liable to be seized.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I was very much puzzled by the reply of the Attorney General to the strong appeal made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler). The hon. and learned Gentleman says the law as it at present stands gives the tithe owner no remedy against the landowner. I turn to the Bill which Lord Salisbury spoke of in the speech which has been quoted, and I present the Attorney General with the easiest way out of the difficulty. In the Bill introduced by the Government two years ago I find that in the first instance the landowner was to become primarily and only liable for the tithe. All the problems about the tithe rent-charge issuing out of the land and the produce of the land fall to the ground in face of the very measure which the Government brought in last Session. You only want to adopt a part of the clause of last year, and you get out of the difficulty at once. The words of last year's Bill are—

"After the commencement of this Act any owner for the time being of such land who has agreed to pay the tithe shall be liable to pay such rent-charge and all arrears thereon upon being due, and the same may be recoverable in the manner provided by this Act."

There you have an alternative remedy.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: The difficulty which arises here is that which would have arisen on an Amendment further down — namely, who is to be the person primarily liable, the occupier or the owner? Some of us have thought that, under all circumstances, the owner was the person to be held liable, and, above all things, that he should be liable under the circumstances stated in this Bill. It is said by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Ambrose) that there is some difficulty in finding who is the owner of the land. To my utter surprise I heard that statement cheered by the Leader of the House and the Home Secretary. If they will go into their own parishes and look at the rate books they will find there is nothing more certain than who is the owner of the land. The occupation of the land is sometimes uncertain, but the owner of the land is easily discoverable. Now, who should be liable, and should an agreement between the landlord and tenant be taken notice of? It is said that an agreement has been made between the landlord and tenant of which the tithe owner cannot know. If you are to take advantage of an agreement which makes the tenant liable, why not take advantage of an agreement which makes the owner liable? The landowner is the person who is properly liable.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The Attorney General confesses there is a gross injustice. Yet he says he is powerless to remedy it. It is said that the landlords will not benefit by this Bill, and I do not know that any class will particularly, and if this Amendment is rejected I fully expect that in county constituencies we shall have a walk-over at the next General Election. I cannot imagine any agricultural voter supporting the Attorney General. But I prefer to support the Amendment simply on the grounds of justice. The Amendment deals simply with the cases of landowners under covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge. No doubt, in the first instance, the tenant will be liable for judgment and execution, and you have given him the remedy of action against the landlord. But supposing the landlord is abroad or that he is insolvent, how is he to get back the money he has wrongly paid? It seems to me you put the tenant under the harrow first and then you leave him to chance for his remedy. The argument that the landlord may not be known has, of course, been disposed of by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. Of course, the landlord will be known. I think the Amendment is simply justice.

*MR. GEIDGE (Stockport): I agree that it is against the owner and not the occupier of the land that the primary remedy should lie when tithe rent-charge is not paid, and I hope a number of the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in support of that view will support me when we come to the point at which I shall propose to substitute owner for occupier, which will give the opportunity of applying the remedy where it ought to be applied. But for all that I cannot support the Amendment before us, and I will explain why. The Amendment is to this effect, that if there be a contract between occupier and owner, whereby the owner is to pay the tithe rent-charge, then the tithe-owner is to be deprived not of all remedy against the occupier, but only of the particular remedy in this Bill. The hon. Member does not propose to take away from the tithe owner the power of distraint upon the goods of the occupier, if there be such a contract between him and the landowner as is contemplated in the Amendment. That remedy would remain, and the only difference acceptance of this Amendment would make would be that the tithe owner, driven from this remedy, would be obliged to have recourse to distress against the tenant, and so practically this Amendment would give the contracting tenant no protection at all. There is this further hardship to the tenant, that he might not be able to find out whether such a contract existed until the defence was put in at the action, and he would then be added in the costs. Of course there is a great difficulty about the owner finding out who he is, but where there is a contract, as my hon. and learned friend says, readily find out who the tenant is, but the difficulty is to find out where he is. It may be difficult to find him, but really this question will arise. It is not necessary for the tenant to pay under pressure of the tithe-charge, which the landlord has contracted to pay to sue the tenant, because he can deduct the amount from the next rent due, and so the tenant will have no grievance.

J. Osborne Morgan

I think I have shown the Amendment will not have the effect which is desired. That effect, however, will be gained by the Amendment of which I have given notice, and consequently I look forward to carrying that by a considerable majority.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Attorney General has alluded to an action against the owner, but that does not arise. The point really is, addressing myself to the Attorney General's argument, if this remedy which the Government propose was to be an absolutely substituted remedy there would be no alternative, and then, I admit, the Attorney General's argument would be a very difficult one to answer, but the case is this: the Government leave the old remedy precisely as it was, but this gives an additional and alternative remedy against this improper proceeding of tenants whom the tithe owner wants to punish. The Attorney General admits there is an injustice in the present arrangement, and he charges us with wishing to stereotype it, but that we do not wish to do. What we propose is that the present arrangement should remain as it is, that the produce of the land only should be liable, and that the tenant should be liable to distress in respect to that produce, and that that should be the only remedy the tithe owner should have against a tenant in the event of the tenant being under contract with his landlord not to pay tithe. The hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) assumes that the occupier is personally liable, but there is no provision in the law as to personal liability in respect to tithe-charge. The landlord is not liable, the tenant is not liable, there is no person in existence at the present moment who is liable. Now, the Government say we are going to make the tenant liable to be sued, and assuming that that is necessary, we say, do not extend the liability to those cases where the landlord has contracted to pay the tithe rent-charge. That is the point, and it is a good deal that has been said on this side of the mark. As to finding the tenant, the landlord, the tithe owner cannot find him now, nor can he touch the tenant, but that he can touch is the produce of the land, and we do not wish to do with that arrangement, we would it remain as it is, the hay, the corn, the produce of the land being liable for the payment of tithe. When you enable these tithe-owners to put the occupier into the County Court, you give him the power of imposing upon the occupier the additional penalty of costs, no inconsiderable item. The Attorney General says how is the tithe-owner to know of the existence of the contract, and, of course, he would not know if the contract were a secret one, but I say that does not touch the case. If it was to be the only remedy, then the Attorney General's argument would be sound; but we do not interfere with the remedy existing, and there is always the produce upon which the tithe-owner can distrain. There is an alternative remedy, and what we say is let the status quo be preserved, do not make the occupier liable to twice payment of the tithe, plus the cost of the County Court proceedings.

*MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): We are told that the tenant can withhold the amount of the tithe from his rent; but may I ask what is to happen when the tenant's rent does not equal the amount of the tithe? It is not an impossible case, there are many acres in Wilts and Hants, and, I think, in Dorset also where the rent is less than the tithe. I certainly think the tenant farmer, under this Bill, may find himself in the position of being compelled to meet a demand for tithes, for which, owing to the smallness of his rent, he might not be able sufficiently to recoup himself.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): The question of the hon. Member who has just sat down will be of even greater importance if the Committee will remember that in addition to the tithe itself there will be the County Court costs. I am not quite sure whether the latter could be recovered from the landlord. The question is, where there is a covenant between landlord and tenant by which the landlord pays the tithe and does not do so, can the tenant recover both tithe and costs? It seems to me there is a considerable lapsus that may involve the tenant in serious responsibility. There are lands just within the verge of cultivation to which the question of tithe is at stake, and that which will decide whether the land shall go out of cultivation, and this, therefore, is a serious question from the producer's point of view. I am sure there is not a Member on this side who did not feel confident that the Government would accept this Amendment. What has become of all the Government promises, to look at this from the tenant's point of view, and that some part of the obligation should rest upon the landlord? I take last night's Division List as showing that the sense of the House is in favour of making this a landlord's charge instead of a tenant's charge, and this should make it obligatory upon the Government to accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. It is a fact that ought to be stated that we should have been in a majority last night but that five of our Members were in prison.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM: We are losing sight of the essential point. It is admitted on both sides that the landlord is chiefly liable, and the whole of the talk seems to me to get him out of his liability and to put that liability upon some one else; but let us go straight to the point, if the landlord is liable let that be distinctly laid down. The landlord ought to be liable, and to be prohibited from contracting himself out of the liability, as employers are prohibited from contracting themselves out of the Employers' Liability Act.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: There appears to be some confusion in the minds of some hon. Members as to who is liable for the tithe rent-charge by law, but there is no doubt whatever that the occupier is the person liable for tithe rent-charge all over England, and upon the occupier only can the tithe owner come. [Cries of "No!"] And not only can the tithe rent-charge owner come upon the occupier for the produce of the land, he can come upon his personal property, his house or other property upon the land; even a railway station and its plant may be liable on tithe-paying land.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: There is a special Act.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: My hon. Friend interrupts me, but I think my knowledge of the law on this subject is equal to his. From the occupier that our tithe rent-charge owner able mental over his debt; and as for the landlord contracting to pay the tithe rent-charge, why such a thing cannot exist. The landlord can never contract to pay the tithe rent-charge. The only mode in which the landlord may become liable for the tithe rent-charge is by the tenant contracting with him that he will not deduct the tithe rent-charge which he pays from the rent; that is the only way in which the landlord becomes liable—by the deduction which the tenant by law is able to make from his rent for tithe rent-charge. Hon. Members seem to think that is an injustice, but it is in precisely the same position as the property tax. This cannot be levied on the owners, it can only be levied on the occupiers, and the occupiers have by law the right to deduct that income tax from the rent they pay their landlords. It is evident that it is impossible to get hold of and claim this from the landlord; he may live abroad, in France or in Australia; you can only come down upon the occupier and give him the right of deduction from the rent.

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: Just a word in reply to my hon. Friend and his reference to railway stations and engines being liable to tithe rent-charge. I may inform my hon. Friend that this question of railway stations is dealt with by special Act of Parliament.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The speech of the hon. Member opposite shows how necessary it is to continue these Debates. That a County Member who sets up as a great authority on the tithe question and writes letters to the Times should say that the occupier is liable shows such a condition of Cimmerian darkness that we must continue the process of education. The hon. Member is entirely mistaken. Not merely is the occupier not liable, but it is part of the contract—it is expressly provided in the Act of 1836—that he shall not be liable. The words of the Act are—

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: But his goods are liable.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not the same thing. That the hon. Member should fail to perceive this distinction between goods and occupier shows that he does not apprehend the very elements of the question. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire has appealed to the Government to give some satisfaction on this point. Suppose the tithe rent-charge should be greater than the produce of the land itself—which, notwithstanding what the Home Secretary has said, is a very ordinary occurrence—if the hon. Member were right the tenant would still have to pay it. The tenant in some cases pays the tithe in his rent to the landlord. Having paid it once he may be called upon to pay it over again. That is a grievous injustice, and I cannot understand how the Government can persist in refusing in some way to remedy it.

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot complain of the right hon. Gentleman urging his arguments; but I am afraid I can only give the same answer again. The right hon. Gentleman asks why the Government commit the injustice of making the tenant pay the tithe? He now says that probably the tenant pays a rent in which the tithe is included, which covers the tithe. What happens to the tenant now?

SIR W. HARCOURT: No doubt there is some sort of grievance arises now, but in making a new arrangement I say you ought to remedy this. It is no answer to say what is the course pursued now, because the Bill gives a new remedy, and, in giving it, we ought to protect the tenant from injustice.

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not admit that this is a new remedy which alters the incidence of the charge. I say that at the present moment, whatever rent the tenant pays, and whatever covenant the landlord has entered into, the land, for reasons of general convenience, in spite of the particular hardship, is the goods of that tenant on the lands are liable to be seized in instance. We do not enlarge liability by one hair's breadth. I say these very same goods on the same titheable lands shall still be to be seized, and none else; the difference is that they will be seized by the County Court bailiff, and not by private bailiff. There is no reason for upsetting what is, on the whole, a convenient arrangement, which the ience of 50 years has shown to be the only one possible, and which is adopted for income tax as well as for tithe rent-charge. The Bill renders the same goods of the occupier liable to be seized under the same circumstances.

MR. H. GARDNER: But not under the same covenant.

MR. MATTHEWS: The covenant has nothing to do with it. But I am assuming the same covenant, and that the landlord has covenanted to pay the tithe. If the Bill does not pass, the distrainable goods of the tenant upon titheable lands are liable to be seized, notwithstanding the covenant. The Bill says the very same goods on the same titheable lands shall also be liable to be seized, notwithstanding the covenant. To talk about that being a disturbance of the settlement of 1836 may do for a platform, but hardly for the House of Commons.

MR. H. GARDNER: This is a most important matter. The right hon. gentleman does not recognise the principle of his own Bill, and when he says that we are only going to do the same thing that was done in 1836 he forgets that under the Bill the tithe-payer can be County Courted, and that there will be costs against the defendant. That presents a very different state of affairs to that which existed under the Act of 1836. We are merely asking the Government to do an act of justice in asking them to allow the tenant who is to deduct the tithe from his rent also to deduct the costs of the County Court proceedings from his rent. If they do not agree to that it will be an injustice to the tenant, the landlord having covenanted to pay the tithe. I can assure the Government this Amendment will make the Bill work better, and I would strongly urge them to accept it.

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member is perfectly aware that the cost of the tithe can be deducted at present.

MR. H. GARDNER: Yes; half-a-

MR. MATTHEWS: No; the cost of the tithe is being by a man in possession. The costs of the levy and distress are as great as they are under the County Court. No preliminary costs under the County Court process would be heavier; what is this—the tenant now can deduct the costs of distraint, because it is his own fault if they prefer to curried.

*MR. GRAY: I cannot agree with the hon. Member. Tithe is not on the same footing with Income Tax, which bears a much smaller proportion to the rent. In many cases tithe is more than the rent. It is not the tenant-farmers who ask for this legislation; it is being forced upon them; and they have a right to ask that if a change is made they shall not be allowed to suffer. Take a case of this kind: a landlord has a farm on his hands; the man who has given it up has been struggling with adversity and has got the farm into a bad condition; the landlord goes to another farmer whom he knows, and in whom he has confidence, and says—"I cannot farm this land; I have not the means to spare; you must take it under easy terms;" and perhaps a bargain is agreed upon, whereby the farmer takes the land for the first year, rent free, the second year at 2s. 6d. an acre, and the third year at 5s. Under those circumstances, where the rent for the first year is absolutely nothing, how can you provide that the tenant can deduct the tithe he pays from the rent?

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon, &c.): I wish to see the saddle put upon the right horse and the owner made liable permanently; but I cannot accept this Amendment, because, if the goods of the occupier are not to be distrained upon when the owner is under a covenant to pay tithe, the tithe-owner will have no remedy at all. He cannot sue the owner of the land, because under the Act of William IV. no one is to be made personally liable. The Amendment does not give power to the titheowner to sue the landlord as if it were a personal debt.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: It leaves the right of distraint.

MR. SWETENHAM: That is true, but I am now dealing with the effect of the Amendment. I say it cannot be supported, because it would leave the tithe-owner without a remedy in a case where the landowner had covenanted to pay the tithe.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: From a Welsh point of view this question of costs is an important one. We regard this as a penal measure. Although hon. Members opposite may consider that our grievance is purely a sentimental one, we have a practical grievance, which is that the County Court may be made a vehicle for piling up costs against us. At present it is comparatively easy to make a certain amount of peaceful and orderly resistance, within the law, to the payment of tithe. That resistance is easy and economical—economical, because though the occupier was made liable to distress, he had the security in the Act of 1836 that the costs would only be of a moderate amount. It is a distinct breach of the contract of 1836 to come forward now and pile up costs against the occupier. At present in Wales it is not difficult to organise a sort of campaign against tithe. Personally, I have no sympathy in that.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, I think, has lost sight of the Amendment.

*MR. STUART RENDEL: I am sorry if I have done that. What I wish to point out is, that through the imposition of these costs it may possibly be made more difficult to carry on anything like a campaign, but that the mischief will only be driven underground.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. PHILIPPS: Hon. Members who support the Government seem to rely very much on the fact that the tenant who has to pay the tithe will be able to recoup himself by deducting what he pays from the rent. But do they know that in a large part of the country the tithe is more than the rent? I can say from my knowledge of the Wiltshire Downs that there are many thousands of acres of land there on which the tithe is double the rent. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would have been able to corroborate that. I fancy there is a good deal of land in Hampshire of which the same may be said, and I would appeal to the hon. Member opposite, who represents some portion of that county. I forget what Division he represents, but I refer to the hon. Member, who always speaks against the Bill and votes for it, to say whether my statement is not correct. In these cases the tenant cannot possibly recoup himself by deducting the tithe from the rent, because there is no rent, or very little rent. That is what makes this Amendment a remedy for a very practical grievance.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: By the Bill as it at present stands the tenant farmer is not only put in the position that he will have to pay a debt which the law declares to be the debt of his landlord, but if the claim happens to come at a time when it is not convenient to meet it, in one month he will have to pay with County Court costs which will not be recoverable. And he will have to do something else—having paid his landlord's debt he will have to wait until he can get the money back from the landlord. The tenant farmers are many of them very poor, having passed through bad times, and it may happen to be a very serious thing for them to have to pay this debt and wait two, three, four, or perhaps six months until the rent day comes round, and they can deduct the tithe from the rent. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, who represent agricultural constituencies, appear to be becoming pretty well agreed that in principle the burden ought to be removed from the occupier and placed on the shoulders of the owner of the land. When the proper time comes I hope we shall have a satisfactory Division to affirm that principle; but it does seem to me strange that these very same hon. Gentlemen, who have over and over again in the course of their speeches given their assent to the principle, should resist an Amendment which only goes half as far.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): As representing a division of a county in which the burden of these tithes is felt as much as anywhere else I desire to point out what I believe to be another difficulty. According to the law at present the remedy of distraint is a remedy upon the goods or property upon the particular land in respect of which the rent charge is claimed; but construing this section with the next, a County Court judgment under this Bill will not be limited to any particular property at any particular place.

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, it will.

MR. WADDY: All I can say is I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in that, and I have read the Bill as carefully as possible. Of course, if it is intended to limit the judgment, I am satisfied; but it seems to me that any of the personal property of the occupier may be affected by the judgment.

MR. MATTHEWS: Any of the property on which now there can be a distraint.

MR. WADDY: A man may have property in parish "A" and property in parish "B," and the judgment could be applied to either. ["No, no!"] Yes; the right hon. Gentleman will see that that is so if he looks carefully at the Bill. There is nothing to limit the distress.

*MR. GEDGE: I would point out that according to the Act of 1836, if several sums are due from the same occupier in respect of different closes held under the same owner the distress may be levied on all these sums put together on all the closes, and this Bill leaves the matter precisely as before.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I regret that after the Home Secretary's admission, that a serious grievance was possible under the clause as it stands, the Government refuse to accept this Amendment. Before going to a Division I desire to warn hon. Gentlemen opposite to think well what they are about to vote for—it is for setting up under the provisions of this Bill the possibility of the tithe-payer having to pay tithe rent charge twice over. This would be a gross injustice to tenant farmers, and it is a pity the Government have made no effort to meet the present proposed Amendment of this Bill, which is a Bill for the purpose of "remedying the law," and not of setting up an injury.

MR. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I think this is a fair Amendment. The landlord should not be relieved from the covenant he has entered into, although the Government, in refusing the Amendment, seem to desire that he should. I have been for the past two days exercising my mind to discover what object the Government can have in pushing on this measure. As was said on the Second Reading—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not entitled to repeat a Second Reading speech.

MR. P. MORGAN: The Attorney General said he preferred the County Court remedy to the remedy of distress. I desire to point out why, in my opinion, the hon. and learned Gentleman prefers the one remedy to the other.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must keep to the Amendment.

MR. P. MORGAN: I will only say that the Government can have no other object in refusing to entertain the Amendment than this—that they wish to relieve the landlord from a covenant which he has entered into. I see no earthly reason why the land itself should not remain liable for the tithe.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Unless the Amendment is adopted the state of things will be this—that if the landlord chooses to be dishonest the tenant has first to bear the cost of the distraint; and, secondly, he has to bear the sacrifice of the produce. This is a new and novel remedy. It is admitted that if the landlord covenants to pay and does not pay he is dishonest, and yet, by this Bill, the Government propose to punish the tenant by two modes for the dishonesty of the landlord. Under the old system the tenant could not be made a bankrupt in respect of tithe, but this will no longer be the case.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 139; Noes 150.—(Div. List, No. 304.)

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: I have now to move another Amendment to Clause 1—namely, in page 1, line 7, to leave out the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be." I say it is contrary to justice that the tenant should be liable to be sued in the County Court for the landlord's tithe, and that the powers of the County Court should be enlarged for this purpose in the way proposed by the Bill. It is about five hours since I called the attention of the Home Secretary to the provisions of the Act of 1866, in which the powers of the County Court, with regard to extraordinary tithe, are limited to £50, and no reply has been given to the question, if that were considered a proper limitation in regard to extraordinary tithe in 1886, why are we in 1889 to have the powers of the County Court extended in order to meet the case of a few Welsh parsons? It would be a monstrous injustice to strain the law for such a purpose; and I protest against our being kept here to the end of August, and possibly the beginning of September, over a measure of this kind, when matters of far greater importance—such, for instance, as the Indian Budget—are being kept in the background. But Her Majesty's Government regard the well-being of 250,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects as nothing compared with a measure providing the means of enabling a hundred or so of the Welsh clergy to recover tithes from the tenant farmers. I trust Her Majesty's Government will agree to the omission of these words, and that they will afterwards accept a further Amendment which would limit the power of the County Court to £50.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman has already been decided. The Committee has refused to maintain the limit of £50, which is the County Court limit.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes; but on the point of order I would say that that is only the County Court limit in a particular case, and it has been pointed out that £50 is not the general limit. In many cases the jurisdiction of the County Court extends to £100, and even to £500 or £1,000. The Committee has, I admit, declined to impose a £50 limit, but this Amendment is a proposal of a different character; and I submit that though these words "whatever the amount of the sum may be," cannot be governed by an Amendment imposing a limit of £50, yet we are proposing to omit words which are now in the Bill, words which entirely alter the whole condition of the existing County Court jurisdiction. I hope we may be allowed to take a Division on this proposal, because we desire to enter our protest.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is not speaking point of order; he is addressing to the Amendment.

G. OSBORNE MORGAN: May I either it would be in order to the omission of the words referred to in the Amendment, in order to insert "in cases not exceeding £100"?

CHAIRMAN: Possibly, if the omission of the words is moved with the intention to insert a limit of £100, such an Amendment might be in order. The Member who has moved the Amendment referred to at the end of his speech has moved to a limit of £50 as that which he intended to substitute; but, apart from that, the effect of the omission of the words would be to introduce the County Court limit of £50, and the Committee have already refused to maintain that limit.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: That would hardly be the case if we were to stop at this Amendment, which only proposes to omit the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be." I propose to fix a limitation further on, but that is not before the Committee now.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid I have not made myself intelligible. If the hon. Member has some other Amendment on the Paper which will bring this Amendment within the scope of admissibility I will allow it to be moved; but as it now stands, it is strictly in itself inadmissible.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Would it be in order to move the omission of the words referred to in order to insert the words "in cases not exceeding £100"?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise to order. My hon. Friend below the Gangway has asked a question which I beg to repeat. You, Sir, have ruled that, inasmuch as the Committee have already decided against a £50 limit, the Amendment to omit the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be" cannot be moved; but if it be proposed to omit those words in order to insert the words "in cases not exceeding £100," that would not be the limit of the County Court jurisdiction, but would be an entirely new proposition. Therefore I propose to move the omission of the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be" in order to insert the words "in cases not exceeding £100."

THE CHAIRMAN: I carefully restricted myself to pointing out that the Amendment was out of order as it stood; but I did not say it was impossible to move the Amendment in connection with another amount.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But if the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be" remain, it would be impossible to insert the words "in cases not exceeding £100." Therefore, in order to insert the latter words, we must get rid of the first; consequently, I beg to move the omission of the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be," so that afterwards, in the proposed place, I may move to insert words raising the limit from £50 to £100.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman now proposes to put before the Committee a complete, intelligible, and consistent Amendment, which I will accept.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out the words "whatever the amount of the sum may be."—(Sir William Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. T. M. HEALY: The effect of that Amendment would be a very rational one—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Surely it is needless to occupy the time of the Committee as to the admissibility of an Amendment which is now before the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I apprehend that if the Amendment now before the Committee is carried, it will be possible afterwards to insert a limitation of £100, which I think would only be reasonable seeing what takes place in the English County Courts. I hope we shall have from the Attorney General to-night his view of the practice of the English and Welsh County Courts. We heard a great deal from him last year as to the inadvisability of giving those Courts jurisdiction beyond a certain sum, and it was urged that they ought not to be allowed to deal with very large amounts. But now we have come to this—that in the view of the Government the County Court Judges may safely deal with the largest sums, provided they are connected with the difficult and complicated question of tithes, where the parsons and Ecclesiastical Commissioners are the creditors; but where it is a mere case of shopkeeper and customer they must not go beyond a small specified limit. The County Court Judges are, in my opinion, most competent to deal with ordinary Civil contract debts; but when we come to questions of this character, I agree with the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore I have great pleasure in supporting his Amendment.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 127.—(Div. List, No. 305.)

MR. MATTHEWS: The object of my next Amendment is to enable the tithe-owner to use either the present remedy of distress or the County Court procedure. He cannot have both; he must choose between the two.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the words "may be," to insert the words "if he has not distrained for the same."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. STAVELEY HILL: I am happy to find that at last the Home Secretary is coming round to our view and is admitting a remedy which many of us have suggested. I shall have great pleasure in accepting this Amendment.

MR. H. GARDNER: I beg to move, Sir, that you do report Progress. The discussions this evening have thrown a flood of light on the Bill, and it would be a good thing now if hon. Members were to go home and meditate on what has taken place, especially after the decreasing majorities of the Government.

HON. MEMBERS: Increasing.

MR. H. GARDNER: Hon. Members opposite must be grateful for very small mercies.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Herbert Gardner.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would appeal to the hon. Member to be reasonable, and not to insist upon his Motion, especially at this period of the Session.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: On the other hand, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is reasonable at this period of the Session for the Government to go on with this Bill? That is a more pertinent question, considering the character of the opposition offered to the progress of the Bill, and considering the number of votes by which it is supported. I venture to say that proceeding with this Bill on the part of the Government is contrary to all Parliamentary custom, certainly since I have sat in this House. When the Government at the end of a Session takes the whole time of the House, it has always been on the understanding that it is for the purpose of closing Committee of Supply, and of dealing with what is non-contentious business. That is the well-established rule and practice of Parliament. The Irish Votes have been interrupted for the purpose of taking the most contentious measure that it is possible for the Government to bring forward. It is plain, also, that we are only at the beginning of the discussion. We have succeeded, with great difficulty, and by dint of long discussion, in introducing a great many of our Amendments, and we have also induced the Government to put down some Amendments of their own. I think in these circumstances that the Motion of my hon. Friend is perfectly reasonable, and I hope he will press it to a Division.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We have recently had bitter experience of what takes place at 12 o'clock and after half-past 5 on Wednesday, for on the interruption of business the right hon. Gentlemen has promptly moved the Closure. Therefore, before this Motion is withdrawn, I think we ought to have some pledge from the right hon. Gentleman that he will not at 12 o'clock Closure this Amendment, which, from what I can see of its effect, is an important one. If there is any chance, however, of the Amendment being discussed in the few minutes which remain before midnight without the First Lord of the Treasury moving the Closure, there will be no objection to proceeding. But this is doubtful, judging from past experience, and therefore I suggest that the Motion to report Progress should be agreed to. I think the Amendment of the Government is a most objectionable method of proceeding in dealing with tithe, because it will tell against the Welsh farmers, who are the parties immediately concerned. Will the Government give us a pledge that on this momentous question we shall not be Closed?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! The hon. Member is not at liberty to discuss the conduct of the Chair, with whom the responsibility for putting the Question rests.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will suggest that the Government should undertake to give us to-morrow reasonable time for discussing this Amendment.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Member does not appear to realise that this Amendment has been brought forward to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. If they are not prepared to accept it, of course it must be withdrawn. As to the strong language used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby as to Her Majesty's Government persevering with this Bill, the right hon. Gentleman appears to be oblivious of the fact that this Bill is included among the measures which the Government announce it to be their intention of passing into law.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

COINAGE (LIGHT GOLD) BILL.

(No. 321.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*MR. S. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I hope the Government will accept the new clause which stands in my name. I am not at all opposed to the Bill as far as it goes, but I think it would be wise to insert this clause. The Government are proposing to assume the responsibility for the wear and tear of the gold coinage, and they have assumed it not only by introducing this Bill, but also by declarations of the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the right hon. Gentleman will agree to consider this matter, and bring it up on Report, I will not press it further.

New Clause (Defacing gold coin under weight not to be obligatory.)—(Mr. Montagu,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not prepared to accept this clause. It would open up a very large question, and it must be remembered that I introduced this Bill purely as an experimental measure; therefore, I am not willing to go further than I have already gone. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not delay the progress of a Bill, the passing of which is so much desired by the commercial classes in this country.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order be deferred till to-morrow."

MR. T. M. HEALY: Are we to understand that the Scotch Education Vote, and not the Irish Votes, is to be taken immediately after the Tithe Bill is disposed of?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): As I explained yesterday, it will be necessary to take at least the Scotch Education Vote before the Irish Estimates.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely this is a most unreasonable course to adopt. The consideration of the Irish Votes was suspended on Friday on the distinct understanding that there was some pressing ecclesiastical necessity to take the Tithes Bill. Now we are told the Scotch Votes are to be taken, meaning that the Irish Members who are farthest away from their homes are to be consulted last.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): Yes; but Scotch Members are quite as far away from their homes.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Am I to understand that the Government propose to take a single Scotch Vote, and then allow another interval before taking the remaining Scotch Votes? If so, that is exceedingly inconvenient. I hope that whenever the Scotch Votes are taken they will all be taken together.

Question put, and agreed to.

JUDICIAL RENTS (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 368.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have no objection to raise to the Second Reading provided the Government give the House some assurance as to what their future course with regard to the Bill will be. As the Bill now stands, we cannot accept it. The object of the Bill is to fix fair rent on what may be called the face value of the land; in other words, that the tenants should be deprived of the benefits of their improvements. I think it would be most calamitous to the tenants if the Bill were adopted in its present shape. One way of meeting the difficulty would be to allow every legal Commissioner to take one or two Sub-commissioners more than he now has. But there is another way of getting over the difficulty, and that is that the County Courts should be opened to the tenants. We protested against the County Court Clause in the Bill of 1881 as unfair to the tenants, and in view of our protests the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian withdrew it and substituted the Land Commission. The result is that whenever a tenant goes into the County Court the landlord moves that the case be removed into the Land Commissioners' Court. I think the Government might do much to get rid of the present block in the land cases if they allowed the tenants to go into the County Courts absolutely unless for just cause shown. If the County Courts got into the swing they would greatly relieve the pressure. For instance, there is Mr. Hamilton's Court in County Cork; Mr. Ferguson's, in the West Riding; and Mr. Waters, in Waterford, which would be resorted to. In Tipperary, where Mr. Anderson is the County Court Judge, I think the tenants would be willing to have the cases dealt with in the County Court, and I think the tenants would also be willing to go to the County Courts in Meath, Westmeath, and Longford, Leitrim and Cavan, Tyrone, Mayo, and Limerick. In those parts of Ireland with which I am acquainted I am sure the tenants would largely avail themselves of the County Courts if they were opened to them. Again, the present appeal system is very mischievous, for it permits a re-hearing of a whole case, and enables the landlord to spring new and quite unexpected points on the tenant. The landlord ought to be pinned to the precise point with respect to which he wishes to appeal. A Bill dealing with the matters with which this Bill deals is undoubtedly necessary in order that the pressure upon the Land Courts may be relieved; but the measure in its present shape is not, in my opinion, reasonable.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): This is a very important matter on which there should be ample opportunity for discussion, and of the taking of which ample notice should have been given to the Irish Members. I cannot help remembering the attitude of the Government last year on the question, and I shall finish my speech and close the debate by simply uttering the words, "I object."

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

GENERAL POLICE AND IMPROVEMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT (1862) AMEND- MENT BILL. (No. 252.)

Considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; Bill read the third time, and passed.

POLICE AND SANITARY REGULATIONS BILLS (SPECIAL REPORT).

Special Report from the Select Committee brought up, and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 321.]

Minutes of Proceedings to be printed. [No. 321.]

POOR RELIEF (ENGLAND AND WALES.)

Return ordered.—

"Of Statement of the Amount expended for In-maintenance and Out-door Relief in England and Wales during the half-year ended Lady Day 1889."

"And, similar Statement for the half-year ended Michaelmas 1889."—(Mr. Long.)

Return presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 322.]

MOTIONS.

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to continue various Expiring Laws, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 376.]

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES.)

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That the Order made upon the 19th day of June last for presenting to Her Majesty an humble Address that She would be graciously pleased to give directions that there should be laid before this House a Return relative to Intermediate Education (Wales) be read, and discharged."—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

MR. T. ELLIS: It is impossible that the Joint Education Committee to be formed under this Act can do their work efficiently unless they have the necessary information respecting endowments. I asked the representative of the Charity Commissioners whether, seeing that this Return would be useless, he would be ready to give a pledge that the Charity Commissioners would in some other way obtain the information which is desired. He has referred me to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson), and I wish to ask that hon. Member whether, in view of the fact that the Act will come into operation in November, and that most of the County Councils have given notice that they will put it in operation, the Treasury will afford us facilities to obtain the information that is necessary for the working of the Act?

*MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member an answer at once, but I will endeavour to ascertain.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill will be circulated to-morrow?

*MR. JACKSON: I cannot say it will be circulated to-morrow, but it will be in a few days.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 14th August, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—MR. M'DERMOTT, R.M.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether it is a fact that, in the case of the three men in custody charged with shooting at a man named Trahan, near Pullorglin, County Kerry, Mr. M'Dermott, R.M., has refused their solicitor permission to see them; and, if so, why, and by what authority?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this question until another day. I have not yet obtained the information that would enable me to answer it.

DERRY GAOL—THE DEATH OF M'GEE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I observe in the newspapers to-day that the Coroner's inquest upon the body of M'Gee, who died on his release from Derry Gaol, has been adjourned until the 22nd instant. Will the Solicitor General be good enough, before that date, to lay on the Table all the information he can in regard to the illness of this man?

MR. MADDEN: I will confer with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and will consider in what manner the information required by the right hon. Gentleman can be given.

JAMAICA SUGAR ESTATES.

Ordered—

"Address for Returns of the quantity of land in the Island of Jamaica under cultivation of sugar cane, distinguishing the estates which are above 200 acres; above 100 acres and under 200 acres; above 50 acres and under 100 acres; above 10 acres and under 50 acres; and, of the holdings under 10 acres, those in canes of 1 acre and less than 3 acres; those in canes of 3 acres and less than 5 acres; those in canes of 5 acres and less than 7 acres."—(Mr. Alfred Pease.)

THE LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND)
BILL AND THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I feel it my duty to bring under your notice what I regard as a breach of the privileges of this House. I shall make no speech, but perhaps I had better read the letter which a number of the Members of the Committee have had the honour of addressing to you, Sir, yesterday:—

"August 13, 1889.

"MR. SPEAKER.—We, whose names are here-to appended, respectfully desire your advice and ruling:—

"1. We are members of the Grand Committee on Trade, to which has been referred the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill.

"2. At the beginning of to-day's sitting the Chairman announced: 'I will rule out of order every Amendment which is hostile to the Bill as a Bill.'

"3. Various Amendments were so treated. As an illustration take the following:—Clause 4, Sub-section 2, reads thus, 'The Treasury may, subject to limitations as to amount in this Act contained, agree that the undertaking may be aided out of public money, either by a capital sum or by an annual payment, or partly in one way and partly in another.' The minority objected to grants of cash drawn even when this clause only proposed such to existing railways. But in the Committee the Government have accepted Amendments which bring mere promoters into the clause, and this has intensified the objections originally raised. Under these circumstances one of our number moved to omit the words:—'Either by a capital sum or,' so that the aid might be by annual payment only for a fixed term of years. The Solicitor General for Ireland rose to order, on the ground that the Amendment was hostile to the Bill, and thereupon the Chairman ruled the said Amendment out of order.

"We desire your counsel and ruling on the following points:—(a) Are not the discussions in Grand Committee in lieu of discussions in Committee of the whole House, and therefore subject to the same rules? (b) Would not the above-stated Amendment have been a perfectly orderly and proper Amendment in Committee of the Whole House? (c) Whether the refusal to submit such Amendment was not in the nature of a breach of the privileges of Members of this House? (d) What is our remedy, so that this and other proper Amendments, even though hostile, may be discussed in Committee?"

"We are, Mr. Speaker, your obedient servants—

"Samuel Storey,
 "Halley Stewart,
 "John Barran,
 "James Craig,
 "Arthur B. Winterbotham,
 "William Abraham,
 "Thomas Bart,
 "Joseph G. Biggar,
 "Handel Cosham,
 "Alexander Blane."

I may say that there were two other hon. Members who left the House after giving their assent to this letter, and whose signatures we did not get in consequence. I refer to Mr. Robertson and Mr. George Howell. Those hon. Members are, however, in full accord with the action we have taken. Without any further remark, I beg, Sir, to ask for your ruling in the matter.

*MR. SPEAKER: I received last night a letter signed by the hon. Gentleman, and also a protest signed by himself and nine other Members of this House, and I gave it at once my most respectful consideration. I at once indicated to him, and I have to inform the House now, that I do not regard the matter as one of privilege. At the most, it is only a question of order. But I should like to say, regarding as I do all questions of order that may be raised in Grand Committee upstairs, that I cannot allow appeals to be made to me on points of order rising in Grand Committee, there being no such appeal, in my opinion, from the decision of a duly-constituted Chairman of a Grand Committee. The hon. Member asks me whether, as a general rule, Amendments could be admitted which were hostile to the Bill. I cannot, on an abstract proposition, recognise the propriety of that statement. I do not know what were the circumstances that arose in Committee, or what the difficulties may have been; but, speaking without prejudice, I hope I may be allowed to say that I cannot admit that, as a general rule, Amendments hostile to the Bill may not be admitted. I may instance the feeling I have in the matter by saying that, in regard to the particular Amendment which the hon. Member has just brought under my notice—namely, to omit the words "either by capital sum," so as to leave the amount to be granted out of the Consolidated Fund by annual payment instead of by one capital sum—I see no reason why that Amendment, though hostile to a portion of the Bill, should not have been admitted. It is clearly within the powers of a money clause passed by this House, and the money powers given to the Committee. The Committee, I think, would not have exceeded its powers; but they wished to restrain the Bill within such limits as they thought proper. Under these circumstances, I wish to say that I should have admitted whole House. They are so far in lieu of proceedings in Committee of the whole House that there is no stage of Committee of the Whole House in the case of a Bill which has been referred to a Grand Committee. When the Bill comes up on Report there will be ample opportunity for any Member who considers himself damnified or the cause he has in hand injured in the Grand Committee to move such Amendments as he considers necessary, and then full opportunity will be given him of redressing any grievance under which he may consider himself to labour. I hope the matter will not go further now. It is not, as I have said, one of privilege. At the most, it is one of order, and I think I have answered categorically all the questions which have been put to me.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think, Sir, it will be useful to the House if we can have your ruling upon another point. You have stated that the proceedings of the Grand Committee are in lieu of the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole House to this extent—that when a Bill has been referred to a Grand Committee there can be no Committee of the Whole House upon it. Will you also give us your ruling as to whether or not the rules which govern this House when in Committee with reference to Amendments on various points should be, and are, precisely the same rules as those which govern the consideration of Amendments in a Grand Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: I think it must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman that the rules which are applicable to proceedings in Committee of the Whole House cannot be altogether applicable to proceedings in a Grand Committee, seeing that there are powers possessed by the Chairman of Committees which could not be exercised by the Chairman of a Grand Committee. In accordance with the Standing Orders of the House, the course of proceeding applicable to a Standing Committee is that which regulates the proceedings of a Select Committee, and as far as the Rules of this House can be applicable, they are applicable to the proceedings of Grand Committees in the way I have indicated.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The material point I wish to raise is whether the rule which governs the admissibility or otherwise of Amendments in Committee of the Whole House is one which should also govern Amendments proposed in a Grand Committee.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think that would be so. As a general rule, the same regulations which would apply to Committees of the Whole House would, in this respect, apply to the Grand Committees.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH): May I ask you, Sir, in connection with this matter, whether the Chairman of a Standing Committee has not a discretion to refuse to put Amendments which are obviously frivolous, and intended merely to delay the consideration of a Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a matter upon which I think I ought to decline to express an opinion. The question of discretion is a very difficult one. A very large amount of discretion is necessarily vested in a duly-constituted Chairman selected and appointed by a Committee which enjoys the confidence of the House. I should be sorry to express an opinion that the large discretionary powers entrusted by the House to the Chairman of a Grand Committee can be otherwise than properly exercised.

MR. STOREY: I am very much obliged to you, Sir, for the information you have given to the House, and I have no desire to carry the matter further. There is only one question which I will venture to ask. The position in which we are in is this. The serious and operative clause has already been passed without discussion.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I rise to order. I would ask you, Sir, if the hon. Member has any right to discuss the matter after you have ruled that it is not a question of privilege?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am clearly of opinion that it would be out of order to discuss the matter now. The hon. Member must wait until the Committee have reported.

MR. STOREY: The question I was going to ask has nothing to do with the proceedings of the Committee. I wish to know if it will be competent when the Committee present their Report to move that the Bill be re-committed, so that it may be considered by a Committee of the Whole House?

*MR. SPEAKER: A Motion would have to be made to suspend the Standing Order.

MR. STOREY: Then I beg to intimate, under those circumstances, on behalf of myself and the other Members of the Committee with whom I am acting, without exception, that we intend, with the full consent of our leader, to withdraw from the Committee.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL. (No. 272.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the words "may be," to insert the words "if he (the tithe owner) has not distrained for the same."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): May I venture to ask you, Mr. Courtney, whether we are to understand that by your ruling yesterday, the question of the entire abolition of distraint having been discussed upon an Instruction, it cannot be discussed again?

THE CHAIRMAN: In reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I wish to say that the ruling I gave last night was that it was out of the power of the Committee to do away with the remedy of distress altogether, but that the Amendment of the Home Secretary gives an alternative remedy—namely, of suing in the County Court.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: Then I would venture to submit that if your ruling is correct—[cries of "Order!"] Then I must really ask for the ruling of the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is quite irregular.

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I only wish to put the matter in this way. If, in spite of the arguments, Mr. Courtney, which have been placed before you, you still adhere to that ruling that we are debarred from considering the question of doing away with distraint, I am at a loss to see how the present Amendment can be put, because it does, to a certain extent, withdraw the power of restraint.

THE CHAIRMAN: I explained this point to the Committee at considerable length last night, and I pointed out that my ruling was supported by what took place in the House itself upon the Instruction. The House entertained a Motion that it should be an Instruction to the Committee to provide in the Bill that tithe rent-charge shall be recoverable against the owner only. If that Instruction had been carried, it would have been in the power of the Committee to make the alteration, but the present Amendment leaves the power of distraint as it now stands, and does not remove it. The process provided by the clause now under discussion is not a process forced on the owner which he is bound to take, but one which is offered as an alternative. In my opinion, the Committee, although they have no power without an Instruction from the House to take away, absolutely, the power of distress, are entitled to provide an alternative upon which the tithe-owner may elect to proceed.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I understand that the question which hon. Members desire to discuss is whether or not there shall be an alternative remedy—namely, the remedy by distraint, or the remedy by suing in the County Court. Now, I do not think that that question can be fairly discussed upon the present Amendment. I would therefore suggest that the matter should be deferred till the Committee have considered the more important question of "owner" or "occupier," which will arise a few lines lower down in the clause. I do not think we can usefully discuss the question whether there is to be an alternative remedy, and to what extent it is to go, until we have decided, in the first place, whether the County Court process is to go against the owner or the occupier.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I understand the ruling of the Chairman to be that we cannot discuss the question at all—that, in point of fact, the result of the course taken by the Government upon the Instruction is, no discussion can take place upon the matter, but that distraint must remain in full force as it did before, with the addition of an alternative. That is the ruling we have just heard. I bow to it, although, I confess, that I do not understand it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is labouring under a misapprehension. There is no objection, in point of form, to the discussion of the question to which he refers.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am glad to hear it. That, however, was the express subject of the Instruction.

THE CHAIRMAN: The object of the Amendment, as I understand it, is to help the Committee by inserting a few words in the clause. Of course, the word "owner," which is to be discussed later, is of the utmost importance.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is right that I should say that the Government are disposed to accept the Amendment to substitute the word "owner" for the word "occupier," so as to make the owner primarily liable for the payment of the tithe. The result will be that a good many of the Amendments which have been put down on the Paper for the purpose of altering the Bill so that the remedy may be against the owner, and not against the occupier, will become, of course, unnecessary. The Government will be ready to insert certain other clauses, in order to meet the cases where the tithes are greater than the rent, which have been referred to by so many Members, so that the owner should only be liable to the extent of the rent received. In these circumstances, I would suggest that we should postpone the present Amendment until this alteration can be made.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have to express my gratification at the announcement of the Attorney General. It shows that the patient and arduous exertions of the Opposition have not been in vain. I will say nothing about the reproaches which have been addressed to me. I will say no more than that, as we are going to have a new Bill, I am very happy to think that none of the Instructions that have been rejected by narrow majorities will stand in the way of re-constituting the Bill altogether in its most material particulars. But I am not sure that the owner is to be substituted in the Bill for the occupier, as the Attorney General has not explained what the new clauses are that will be inserted. A whole scheme will be necessary, and, therefore, I think that the best course would be to postpone the further progress of the Bill. Indeed, I am not sure whether, under these circumstances, before we waste a morning that may be given to more useful work, we ought not to hear something of the new clauses which will bring about so material a change. Therefore, to put myself in order, I will conclude with a Motion, that you, Sir, do report Progress. The Government have already pointed out that the change made in the Bill by putting the onus of the payment of tithes directly upon the occupier is a great and material alteration in the Act of 1836, which declared that the owner should not deal with any person whatever. The action under this Bill prima facie and entirely is against the occupier, although with restrictions as to the manner in which judgment is to be levied, and we think that is an unjust and unfair proceeding. The principle for which we have been contending for so many days is that if an action is to be brought personally against anybody it should not be against the occupier but against the owner. That principle, I am happy to say, has been recognised by the Government, who thus acknowledge that the view we have been maintaining is a right one. The prima facie liability is upon the occupier, and from that point of view, if a judgment is to be levied upon the property of the occupier, the process is a simple one. But if the Government are going to change that and to levy the judgment upon the owner, who is not in possession and has no goods on which judgment can be levied, it is quite plain that an entirely new mode of procedure is to be inaugurated. At present I am in the dark as to the new clauses of the Attorney General. That the tithe charge upon the land should be borne by the owner is obviously fair, and after this announcement on the part of the Government it is only too plain that they are going to make an entire change in the whole system, which represents immense interests and millions of money in this country. Before we postpone so great and material an Amendment like the one before the Committee, the least we can ask of the Government is that the new Tithes Bill, founded upon new principles, shall appear on the Paper. Therefore, I move, Sir, that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir W. Harcourt.)

*MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): The statement we have heard from the Attorney General so materially alters the character of the Bill that I shall at once support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman to report Progress. At the same time, I may take this opportunity of saying that the proposal to throw the onus of payment upon the landlord is a principle which I entirely approve.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen): We have now arrived at a point in regard to the Bill when I would recommend the Government to consult the learned Lord Advocate, seeing that they have accepted a principle that has been imposed in Scotland for hundreds of years—namely, that the landlords should pay the tithes. The Scotch system is based upon the principle that if the landlord does not pay he has always a representative—namely, the tenant whose rent is due or becoming due, and a simple process of attachment is put in force. There is, consequently, a double security for the tithe owner.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I feel obliged to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) for the reference he has made to my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate. I am sure that the experience which the House has had of the great ability of my right hon. Friend fully justifies the reference of the hon. Gentleman. I acknowledge that it is only reasonable that the Motion which has been made should be conceded by the Government. We shall lose no time in putting those clauses on the Paper which are necessary to give effect to the proposal which has been made by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. Under these circumstances, I trust that the House will now lose no further public time, but will at once proceed to the consideration of the other business standing on the Paper.

one of those who have urged the Government to convert the Bill from a bad one into a good one, to express my great gratification at the changed position of affairs. I trust the Government will lose no time in pushing on the Bill in its new shape, and will devote sufficient time to it to make it a good measure.

MR. LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I have no objection to the alteration which the Government propose to make in the Bill; but when the Government first began the Bill, they announced that they would proceed with it de die in diem. I hope that that promise will be kept, and that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) will say whether he is prepared to proceed with the Bill to-morrow.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I think the departure on the part of the Government practically opens out a new Bill for discussion. There is a feeling, not alone on this side of the House, as to whether the opportunity for reporting Progress ought not to be utilised to put off the Bill until next Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to put a question in reference to the remaining business upon the Paper, because if no satisfactory arrangement is made it will be open for any hon. Member to move, when the Speaker takes the Chair, that the House do now adjourn. We went into Committee on this Bill on the understanding that the Government proposed to take the Bill de die in diem; but they have now abandoned that course.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I should like to say how heartily I agree with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse.) This measure has always been viewed by me with but "partial affection," omitting, as it does, that most important provision—namely, that tithe should be paid direct by the landowner to the tithe owner. This I have always contended for, and the clause or power now to be added is, in my opinion, worth the whole Bill put together. No measure will ever be complete, however, that does not provide for the redemption of tithes.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): The hon. and learned Member for Longford must remember that there are other Members of the House besides Irish Members. The convenience of Irish Members is a very important matter, and I agree that the Government ought to consult it; but I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will bear in mind that many English Members have given up many engagements, and stayed in the House at great inconvenience to themselves, in order to support the Government in passing this Bill, which they believe to be a necessary Bill. I therefore hope we may be able to get through the Bill without any unreasonable delay.

*MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell the section of the House most deeply affected by this Bill when it is likely to be taken again; and, further, I hope he will give us an opportunity of considering this entirely new Bill before we come to discuss it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is impossible to go on with the Bill to-morrow. The Amendments will not be on the Paper until to-morrow morning, and of course the question is a very grave one. It affects very large interests, and we cannot be expected to pronounce an opinion offhand.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I at once acknowledge that I am very glad the Government propose to make this change. I think, however, that the loyal supporters of the Government have got much to complain of. The Government have put their supporters in a very false position by saying and arguing most strongly that the method proposed in the Bill is the only way the thing can be carried out, and then, without the slightest notice, making a change of front. However good the change may be in itself, that is not a fair way to treat their supporters. For my part I want a complete measure on this subject, dealing especially with redemption. It now appears we are going to have a half-and-half measure in consequence of expressions of opinion from all parts of the House—opinions which, with very little trouble, my right hon. Friend might have learnt long ago. I repeat that that is not fair treatment to the supporters of the Government, and I hope we shall never see it again. The change the Government propose is great, grave, and important, and I hope the clauses inserted will be such as will be fair, reasonable, and just to those concerned.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not think my hon. and gallant Friend was in the House when I stated that the interests to which he referred should be protected. I am to a certain extent personally responsible for not making the announcement earlier; but it seems to me it is not unreasonable that we should put upon the Paper clauses which will protect the landlord, who is to be called upon to pay. One of our clauses will, of course, reserve to the landlord his remedies against the tenants under existing contracts.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I should like to point out to my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir W. Barttelot) that there is another Motion that could be made on this subject—perhaps the most pertinent Motion—on which all the questions he desires to raise could be discussed—namely, that the Order for the Bill be discharged. The Attorney General has said quite truly that he is personally responsible, for he has been arguing with all his legal knowledge and ability that the tithe could not be levied on the owner.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: My speeches are fortunately on record. I never said anything of the kind.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then, no doubt, the mistake is due to the natural obtuseness which prevails on this side of the House. However, it may perhaps be better that we should report Progress now. When the Bill comes on for consideration again, and we have seen the Amendments of the Government, then, if the Government think it worth while to prolong the Session for the purpose of passing the Bill, hon. Members can consider whether a Motion should not be made to discharge the Order for the Bill, and whether a great measure such as this should not be postponed to a future Session.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I have taken a great deal of interest in this Bill from the commencement, although I have not addressed the House upon it so far. But I desire to express the opinion that this Committee should have, before Progress is reported, some definite statement from the Government as to what their real and ultimate intentions are. When the Bill was introduced it was comparatively simple and limited in its character. We have had one or two very important modifications of its provisions, and now the Attorney General has made an announcement of very critical importance, of such great importance that he and the First Lord of the Treasury admit it is reasonable the Committee should ask for a suspension of the consideration of the Bill until the situation is thoroughly recognised. The Attorney General has intimated that certain clauses are to be introduced, one with regard to the limitation of the liability of the landlord to the amount of the rent. I would ask him to tell us if he proposes also to limit the liability of the tenant as to the payment of the tithe rent-charge to the amount of the rent payable by him. I think, too, the Government ought to give us some information as to the general course of business.

*Mr. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I appeal to the Government to consider whether, under the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, it would not be better to drop the Bill altogether. It is now the middle of August, and we are confronted with a new Bill which will require many days to properly discuss. If the Government persevere in their present intention the House will probably be kept sitting until the end of September.

Mr. A. S. HILL (Staffordshire, Kingwinford): A great many of us are afraid that by the present measure the additional power of recovery will increase the capital value of tithes. Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Government will be prepared next Session to bring in a Bill so that this measure may not have this effect?

Mr. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to congratulate the Government on the step they have taken, and also to congratulate the House on the effect of its decisions and deliberations. Then I want to know whether the Government will embody in the new Bill some of the clauses proposed by Lord Salisbury in the Bill of 1887? If the Government are going to transfer payment to the owner, I think they ought to protect him to some extent as well as the occupier. Will the Government insert clauses in the new Bill dealing with the case where there is no rent to pay tithe?

Mr. A. O'Connor

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the best thing for the Government to do is to inform the House what is to be the course of public business to-day and to-morrow. Is it intended, after having suddenly suspended the consideration of the Irish Votes, as suddenly to take them up again? Do the Government propose to take Supply to-day and the Tithe Bill to-morrow?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: If the Irish Members object to take the Irish Votes which are on the Paper to-day the Government will not press them. Then it is only reasonable that the Government should not proceed with the Tithe Bill to-morrow. We hope to put down on the Paper to-morrow the Amendments which are to be proposed, and I hope it will be possible to proceed with the Bill on Friday. Arrangements will be made, as far as possible, to meet the views of hon. Members who desire to consider the Estimates, and in making the arrangements last week for the consideration of the Irish Estimates the Government had entertained the hope that four days would have been sufficient for their consideration. I admit that the hope was an illusory one, but such was the expectation last week. In the course of the afternoon I will endeavour to come to an arrangement for the convenience of hon. Members as to the business for to-morrow, and I will state at the close of the Sitting what the business will be. In making the changes proposed we have endeavoured to meet what we believe to be the general desire of both sides of the House, but circumstances have rendered it unavoidable that these changes should be announced without much notice to the House. I appeal to hon. Members to give fair consideration to the proposals made by the Government, because they will be framed in such a manner as will meet all the objections against the measure, and conciliate the support of those hon. Gentlemen who sit behind the Government and all those who desire to see such a measure connected

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): When are we to understand the Irish Estimates will be taken?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government are anxious to consult hon. Members from Ireland as to the order in which the Estimates should be taken. I understand that the Irish Members wish to take the Vote for the Land Commission first, and after that to take the Votes in their natural order—that is to say, the Lord Lieutenant's Vote and the Chief Secretary's Vote and so on.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): Do the Government intend to take to-day the Interpretation Bill and the Technical Instruction Bill? With regard to the Interpretation Bill, I must offer the strongest opposition to one of the clauses; and with respect to the Technical Education Bill, I understand many hon. Members on this side of the House have objections either to the Bill itself or to certain clauses.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The first-named Bill is important, and I think the hon. Member stands alone in his objection to any portion of that measure. It is not generally opposed in any part of the House. Strong representations have been made to me by hon. Friends of the hon. Gentleman regarding the Technical Instruction Bill, and pointing out that it should be passed this Session. I am anxious that an opportunity should be afforded for the consideration of the Bill; but if the measure is strongly objected to the Government, of course, must give way.

Question put, and agreed to.

COINAGE (LIGHT GOLD) BILL.

(No. 321.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause (Defacing gold coin under weight not to be obligatory).—(Mr. Montagu.)

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHAIRMAN called on Sir R. Fowler.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): On a point of order, Sir, I beg to remind you that I was in possession last night at 12 o'clock when the discussion closed.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no right to resume Debate on that account.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): I merely wish, in relation to this clause, to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the very bad state in which a great deal of the gold coinage in circulation is at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, quite aware of this, and I will only mention it as a question of some gravity, to which I hope during the Recess the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give attention, and that he will see his way to deal with the subject next Session.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I understand that last night the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the insertion of this clause, and I confess I think his objection was well founded, for the clause would destroy altogether such security as we have against the circulation of depreciated gold coins and damaged gold coins, which certainly it is very necessary to maintain. There is no doubt the condition of the coinage of the country has fallen into a state not creditable to the greatest commercial country in the world. Everybody must admit that. For a short time when I was at the Exchequer I had to consider the subject, and I certainly thought it required immediate attention. The estimate made at that time of the sum that would be required to put the gold coinage in a proper condition was between £600,000 and £700,000, and no doubt the three years that have since elapsed have still further deteriorated the coins and they are in a worse condition, so that the sum required is still larger. It is not creditable to England which has a gold currency—and I am very glad we have—that we should have this gold currency depreciated to the amount of half a million sterling. Our gold coinage has been for a long time the basis of the monetary system of, I may say, the whole world, and I think one of the first duties of the Government should be to put that coinage into a proper condition. I am very glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has begun this duty, though in a tentative and experimental way, for, of course, it is only with a small part of the question that this Bill deals. I am glad of it, for many reasons, but particularly because it indicates that the Chancellor of the Exchequer still intends that we shall keep gold as the basis of the currency of the country, and that he has not adopted any new-fangled ideas of bi-metallism, which would certainly have the effect of driving gold from the country, and all the money spent on the restoration of the gold coinage would be so much wasted expenditure. This Bill can only be justified on the assumption that the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to maintain gold as the basis of our currency. Of course, the first question the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to consider is, who is to bear the cost of restoring the gold coinage of the country?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; but he is not speaking to the clause before the Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would ask indulgence at this time of the Session, otherwise I must move the postponement of the Bill, in order that I may have more latitude in discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is well aware that I have forwarded the progress of this Bill, and I understood that I should have the opportunity of making a statement on this subject; but, unfortunately, there seem to be so many restrictions surrounding us now, that I scarcely know how it is possible to express an opinion on this or any other subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the opportunity for a general statement is on the Second Reading, and it arises again on the Third Reading; but a general statement cannot be made on the question of inserting a particular clause.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is useless to talk of discussion upon the Third Reading, because, at this period of the that stage is an idle form. I have thought that one might be allowed to make some observations on this clause; but if that is

I can only regret that a Bill of such importance should be passed without discussion in the House of Commons.

A. O'CONNOR: I regret that at this stage it is not competent for the right hon. Gentleman to pursue an interesting topic, but probably he will find the opportunity to do so on the consideration of the Report. In regard to the clause which it is proposed to add, I desire to urge upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the very reasonable character of the proposal embodied in it. At present the law in regard to light gold coins is of a very extraordinary character. Anyone being tendered a gold coin below a certain standard of weight is bound there and then, being provided—and the law contemplates that he shall be provided—with a pair of scales, to take out the scales and weigh the coin.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Sir, I rise to order. This is the very argument I was trying to pursue on this clause. It was upon the liability to replace light gold coins that I was speaking, and I thought it was most material in reference to this clause which proposes that no person shall have imposed upon him the liability to destroy a light gold coin, as is the law now; I had agreed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in opposing the clause, and was about to refer to what had been done in former times when you, Sir, stopped me. I was speaking on this clause, as I thought, in the most legitimate way.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry if I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, and interrupted him in the discussion of the clause. I confess I was greatly deceived, for I thought he was entering upon a wider discussion embracing such questions as bi-metallism, the maintenance of the gold standard, the cost of the coinage, &c. If he will confess that he is not perfect in his knowledge of the subject, I will be perfectly satisfied.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am very sorry to be so out of the way, and had I had the opportunity to pay for the Bill, I would have been able to do so.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to hear that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am very sorry to hear that.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to hear that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I am very sorry to hear that.

tendered a piece of light gold is then and there required to weigh, cut, break or deface it. That is an obligation thrown upon every member of the community, which I will venture to say in 999 cases out of a 1,000 it is perfectly impossible to discharge. It is an obligation the discharge of which is attended with considerable risk; in point of fact, it is an obligation impossible to discharge. But see the absurd position in which the Government may be placed under the existing law. If I cash at a post office an order for £1 and receive the money from an agent of the Government, I am not only entitled, but I am bound to examine the money, and if it is light, as it very often is, I am required to deface the coin. Suppose, therefore, an individual goes to a post office and defaces, in accordance with the directions of the Statute, the money which the Government hand him in discharge of their fiscal obligation, what is the position of the Government? They will be bound to replace at their own expense this coin so defaced, unless, indeed, they prefer to make the unfortunate postmaster responsible for the money he is using on their account, they not having supplied him with money of standard weight. The whole position is perfectly unreasonable, and may be made by those who choose to indulge in this kind of freak perfectly ridiculous. The Post Office would be placed in a very inconsistent and embarrassing position if this, which is open to any member of the community, were actually done. What can be the use of perpetuating this clause of the Act of 1870? There is no practical benefit arising from it, and, under the circumstances, I think the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, is one that ought to commend itself to the Government.

*Mr. BARING (London): I only want to point out one thing. I am quite aware that the law is as the hon. Member for Donegal has stated it, and that the obligation lies upon all persons, but, as a matter of fact, it is attended to by no one except the Bank of England. Now, if this clause is passed, the Bank of England will be morally prevented from doing what it now does to keep the currency of the country in as good a state as by this means is possible. If we pass this clause the Bank of England will be bound to return light gold to its depositors instead of making it unfit for circulation, and thus to assist in the circulation of light gold, and I do not think that is desirable.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: What about the position of the Post Office?

*SIR R. FOWLER: May I suggest that if the Bill were set down as the first order to be taken after midnight it would give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity for making that interesting speech, to which I am sure we should be glad to listen.

SIR W. HARBOUR: I have no desire to make an interesting speech; what I want to do is to discuss the clause, and that has been my object from the first. This clause, as I understand, is directed to the question of relieving the holders of light gold from liability in respect to its being below standard weight, and on that I was desirous of making some observations, and will endeavour to do so, and if I have the misfortune to be out of order I will sit down again. Under the present law the last holder is responsible for the lightness of a sovereign. I can remember the extreme inconvenience people sustained when Sir R. Peel put the coinage in order more than 40 years ago, and when shopkeepers kept scales, weighed sovereigns, and charged customers 6d. or 8d. for depreciation. It is not possible to return to a system like that now. Even under the pressure of the American War, when Lord North replaced the coinage, the State bore the cost, not the last holder, and that was also done in the time of William III., when Sir Isaac Newton was Master of the Mint. The cost now will not be much larger than it was in the time of Lord North. This Bill adopts the principle that the State is to bear the cost of replacing the coin. This clause proposes to discharge everybody, including the Bank of England, from liability in respect of light coin. When light gold comes to the Bank of England it is clipped and taken out of circulation. The coinage would not have been in its present condition if the Bank of England had discharged that duty better and more extensively. When I was at the Exchequer I found the Government itself issuing light sovereigns—a most improper proceeding. That is to say light coins were paid into the Post Office, the Customs, and the Inland Revenue in large quantities, and of course the first duty of the Government is to obey the Act, and either to pay the light gold into the Bank of England or see that it is not repaid by the Government. I gave stringent orders that no Government Department should re-issue any light gold. The difficulty in the provinces is that in many great towns there are no branches of the Bank of England, and therefore money received by the Post Office and other public departments is paid into private banks, which re-issue the light gold. The country bankers keep all the best sovereigns and send them to the Bank of England, and the light sovereigns they pay to the public. That is one of the reasons why the coinage has got into such a bad state, and this clause would make it worse by relieving the Bank of England from any obligation whatever in this respect. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Baring), who upon this subject speaks with some authority, will allow me to observe that I think the Bank of England, in reference to the coinage as well as to other matters, ought to render more service to the public in having more branches in the country. There is no other country in which national banks do not offer greater facilities by means of branches than the Bank of England does in this; and it ought to do more in return for the remuneration it receives from the State and the advantages it enjoys under its charter. All Governments in succession have been responsible for the coinage being in its present condition, as it is more than 40 years since anything has been done to replace light coins. The life of a coin may be said to be 20 years, and after that it begins to be light to a slight extent, so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not too soon in beginning to do something. But, after all, the coinage of 40 years ago being dealt with, there will remain coinage since then in almost as bad a condition. I was about to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what fund he proposes to meet the cost, or what he proposes to do, and perhaps I may be allowed to say this—The Chancellor of the Exchequer has at his disposal a considerable fund derived from the surplus upon silver amounting out of that the gold coin great wind surplus at something not a thing. Every of England universal of the world; as coinage glad to go carry assurance of their value, and send them to be melted for bullion abroad, so that, in point of fact, we are assaying bullion for foreign merchants. I shall be glad of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will bear this in mind when he is considering the whole question, and consider if any further security can be taken that the English Mint shall not be employed in assaying for foreign countries for melting purposes. It is obvious that there is a great loss on the coinage by this means. While I concur with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in opposing this clause, I agree with others that the responsibility for the lightness of coins ought not to be put upon the last holder; but as this is only a temporary measure, it is not expedient to discharge everybody from the liability of endeavouring to protect the coinage. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take these larger matters into consideration, and, when he is able to place the gold coinage in a sound condition, that he will take every precaution against its ever falling again into its present condition, and to prevent its being used illegitimately by being melted into bullion as soon as coined.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps I may say in reply to the right hon. Gentleman that I am quite favourable to taking these larger questions into consideration. But it would be premature to lay before the House the plans of the Government before I have reduced them into proper form. I fully admit the importance of dealing with the question to which the right hon. Gentleman has called attention with regard to the taking of gold coins from this country, but, perhaps, exaggerated ideas of the loss sustained will be avoided if I say that the total annual cost of the coinage of gold is not much more than £2,000 a year. We ought not to lose sight of the advantages we gain by the high standard and the universal currency of our sovereign. Next Session I hope to introduce a measure dealing with the incidence of the loss on light coins.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has not referred to the issue of light coins by the Post Office. The Customs no longer receive light gold as they did some years ago, but the Post Office Authorities still issue light gold in direct contravention of the Statute.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not propose to make any change in the law; but the hon. Gentleman, as I understand, calls on me to make a change in the practice. His proposal, as it seems to me, would make it necessary that the Post Offices generally should clip the coins, and I am bound to say I think it would give rise to a good deal of complaint to introduce that practice just upon the eve of our dealing with the whole question. I think it would cause considerable dissatisfaction, and I doubt whether the advantage that would arise from the adoption of that practice for six months would be equal to the public inconvenience it would cause. Of course it would be necessary to supply the post offices with the necessary plant, and to instruct the officials as to how to use it, and I am doubtful whether the cost of doing so would not equal the saving that might arise from taking of the light gold out of circulation at the expense of the holders.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer altogether appreciated the point of my hon. Friend's remarks. It is not thought necessary that the Post Office should clip the sovereigns and charge the last holder for it, but that when the Post Office receives light gold it should pay it into the Bank of England, and allow the Bank of England to charge the Department with the loss. If it were paid into the Bank it would not be re-issued. I understand that the practice of the Post Office is to pay it into local banks. If that course is followed, of course the local banks re-issue it. The objection that has always been urged against my proposal is that there are no branches of the Bank of England into which the Post Offices can pay the money. I am quite opposed to the Post Offices having scales and marking the gold when received. I do not think the public would stand such an inconvenience as that. I do think, however, it is an evil that any public department should be the means of re-circulating light gold.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I appreciate the point put by the hon. Member and emphasised by the right hon. Gentleman. If the law were revised now it would doubtless be the duty of the Government to deal with this matter. I certainly think it would be unwise to enforce the law strictly with regard to clipping coin, but I will once more with pleasure look into the question of the responsibility of Post Offices for the re-issue of light coin. I will see what regulations can be made on the subject. It may be difficult to carry out the suggested practice in the smaller Post Offices; but, at any rate, I will take the matter into my consideration.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The point I wish to bring out is, that the last holder when he takes his money to the Bank of England is penalised to the extent of the loss of weight, but he might protect himself if he followed the provisions of the existing law. The Post Office Authorities are breaking the law, because they do not avail themselves of that same provision, and they are still saddling this charge on the unfortunate private holder.

Question put, and negatived.

Several verbal Amendments agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

INTERPRETATION BILL. [Lords] (No. 364.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th August], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In asking the House to read this Bill a second time, I wish to say that it is a measure which has been received with almost universal approval. It has been introduced in order to make it clear, without putting in technical clauses, that Acts of Parliament should have a certain meaning. An hon. Gentleman opposite has objected, with regard to future Acts, to the word "England" including "Wales." Of course I cannot myself express much sympathy with his view, but if the hon. Member will kindly put down such Amendments as he thinks necessary to carry out his meaning, I will endeavour to see whether the operation of the Act can be made entirely retrospective. Subject to this, I hope the House will consent to the Second Reading, the Bill being one which I am very desirous of seeing passed.

Mr. Goschen

MR. T. ELLIS: I am glad the hon. and learned Member has made this concession. The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) last year said he had no objection to a similar proposal, and it was inserted in the Local Government Act of last year. I desire to say that unless the Amendment be inserted in this Bill, I shall oppose it on its future stages.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I quite sympathise with the suggestion of my hon. Friend, and I am sorry to hear the Attorney General say he does not sympathise with the national feeling of Wales on this subject. There is a strong feeling that Wales is more distinct from England than probably any other parts of the United Kingdom.

*MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I hope that, if this point affecting the national feeling of Wales can be satisfactorily settled, no further opposition will be offered to this Bill. It is a most valuable measure, calculated not only to save the time and trouble of Members of this House, but also the public time and money by reducing the bulk of our voluminous Statute Book.

*MR. S. RENDEL: I desire to confirm what has fallen from my hon. colleague, and to assure the Government that there is a very widespread feeling on this matter in Wales. If that feeling is not satisfied it will be our painful duty to make our voices heard on the subject.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday.

ARBITRATION BILL [LORDS.] (No. 367.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th August], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question put, and agreed to (Queen's Consent signified).

Bill read the third time, and passed with an Amendment.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL (No. 360.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th August], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that the House will consent to the Bill being now read a second time. There is, I think, a general desire to see it pass into law.

*MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I should like to ask a question as to the interpretation of this Bill and as to its scope. It is a Bill of which I cordially approve, and I rejoice that the Government are making up their minds to pass it. I wish to know, however, whether it will be competent under it for the Local Authorities to make grants for the purposes of dairy and agricultural education? The whole tenour of the Bill deals with the Science and Art Department. I believe that the £5,000 which the House voted last year for agricultural education was placed in the hands of the Agricultural Department of the Privy Council, and I fear very much that, unless a very wide interpretation is given to the 5th section of this Bill, we shall find ourselves tied up to those classes of instruction which are under the Department of Science and Art. The Government have now for the first time adopted the principle of giving grants to agricultural education, but there is no reason, I think, why Local Authorities should not be allowed to vote money out of the rates, with the full consent of the ratepayers, for the support of agricultural education. Dairy schools are springing up in a satisfactory and even a surprising manner, and the £5,000 voted last year for agricultural education has been largely expended; but, in my opinion, it would be far more satisfactory if Local Authorities were distinctly allowed to support schools, giving the technical instruction they desire. To take my own county, I do not know why the Cheshire County Council should not be allowed to support agricultural and dairy education throughout the county, as much as other technical education for the mechanics of Crewe or the chemical workers of Northwich. The matter could be dealt with in Committee, but we are anxious that the Bill should get through Committee after 12 o'clock at night, so that we wish all contested points cleared away. If there are any differences they should be disposed of now, when the Bill cannot be stopped by a formal objection. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council to say whether it would be possible to extend this education to agricultural subjects within the terms of the Bill as they at present stand, or, if not, whether he would allow me to insert some words to provide that agriculture shall be included within the scope of the measure. All that would be necessary would be to add after the Department of Science and Art the words "and Board of Agriculture," or whatever the exact designation of the new Department may be. If the right hon. hon. Gentleman would agree to that, it would be largely availed of and would prove an immense boon to the agricultural community of the country. There is a growing feeling on the part of the farmers, and country people generally, that we ought to do something to improve our knowledge of agriculture and dairy produce. We spend a fabulously large amount in this country in buying foreign dairy produce, and most of that money might be retained at home if dairy technical instruction were properly developed. There is an indefinite and almost infinite amount of dairy produce required in this country. I cannot help expressing regret that the School Boards are not to be one of the Local Authorities to take this matter in hand. They would be, it seems to me, a much better authority than that proposed where they exist. Where they do not exist, I should be willing to try any other authority. I know that that is a point upon which the Government will not give way; therefore I hope the matter will not be pressed. We must make the best of it, and trust that, at some future time, the Act may be extended to School Boards, and made wider in its application.

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL FOR EDUCATION (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): By the leave of the House I would explain this point. The difficulty in the hon. Member's mind no doubt arises from the ancient difficulty of drawing up any exact definition of technical instruction. The Definition Clause first mentions the different species of instruction already sanctioned by the Science and Art Department to which grants are given, and then come the words "or any other form of instruction which may for the time being be sanctioned by the Department." I presume that the point to which the hon. Member refers will be favourably received by the Department when a demand is made for the recognition of that particular form of instruction. As I understand, the fact of the Government having given a grant already in favour of dairy farming will not prevent such instruction being extended under the Bill.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S. E. Gorton): In rising to support the Bill as it is to be amended, I desire to say that in its present form it could not have been acceptable to this side of the House. I am happy to say, however, that the Government have accepted Amendments which will touch the point raised by the Member for Crewe, and will in no way interfere with the present functions performed by School Board districts, while at the same time they will enable the Bill to be of the greatest use in country districts where no School Board Authority exists. I feel that it is important that we should at this period of the Session come to an unanimous decision to pass the Second Reading of the Bill to-day, in order that we may at the earliest time make a commencement in that new departure in practical education, which is so necessary for the welfare of the country. I deplore, as most of my friends deplore the fact that the Bill of the hon. Member for South Manchester was not accepted by the House. It was a Bill comprehensive in its scope and wide enough to take in all questions of manual and technical instruction, from education in infant schools to higher and secondary education. But, of course, it is difficult in a Bill of that kind, raising contentious points, to get the House generally to agree to it, particularly at a late period of the Session. The Government, as I understand, have now introduced a Bill which eliminates for the time being the questions of denominational and School Board education, and which starts from the point at which science and art teaching and technical instruction may be undertaken by Local Authorities, constituting themselves authorities for the purpose, or by School Boards, or, failing the one or the other, by Local Authorities under a rate of 1d. in the £1. I can assure the House that if the Bill passes with the Amendments which have been suggested to the Government, it will become at once a very great boon to our industrial and manufacturing districts, and also to those districts which the Member for Crewe represents. I have taken it for granted from the first that schools necessary to promote the interests of the agricultural classes are included in this Bill. Some of my friends consider that the Bill constitutes another educational authority in large towns and School Board districts. If I thought so, it would be impossible for me to support the Bill; but the Government have undertaken that Amendments shall be put into it providing that where School Boards exist, and are now exercising such authority as is necessary to promote technical education, they shall have the power to demand from the Local Authority such means as they may require, in order to promote the well-being of their schools. The School Boards of our large towns have already undertaken very important work in that direction, and the Science and Art Department receive now a grant in aid for the work they do in connection with the higher branches of technical instruction. But there is a want of funds, and the fees are so high that the working classes cannot avail themselves as much as is desirable of the benefits which such schools are capable of supplying. Instead of there being some hundreds of children of from 14 to 17 years of age attending the night schools, and also the schools that the School Boards have established for technical instruction, very few boys from the elementary schools are able to attend, consequently very little good is done. But there will be an opportunity of extending this work into other branches of education. There will be laboratories and manual training, and the technical training of various kinds will be adapted to the wants of the different districts. Under these circumstances we can all appreciate the enormous advantage that will accrue to the industrial classes from the passage of this Bill during the present Session. I fully sympathise with the desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council that this Bill should be read a second time to-day without any undue discussion. I sincerely trust that we may this afternoon be enabled to obtain an expression of opinion both from those who support the Bill and from those who are in doubt with regard to the Amendment which, we are told, will be accepted, in order that the House may hereafter have an opportunity of making the measure one that will be satisfactory not only to the friends of education generally, but to the country at large.

MR. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): There are some of us on this side of the House who are in a difficulty with regard to this measure. As the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken admits, it is not so perfect as to enable him to give it his full support in its present form, although he says he is prepared to vote for the Second Reading, because in private conferences he has had with the heads of the Educational Department they promised to insert Amendments which, in his opinion, will render the Measure acceptable to the House.

MR. MATHER: Allow me to say there were no private conferences at all. What has taken place has been the result of long negotiations with hon. Members on this side of the House who have for many years been connected with the movement in favour of technical education, who have been Members of the Royal Commission on Technical Education, and who have had this question much more at heart than many hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches.

MR. ROWLANDS: I was not a member of the Royal Commission on Technical Education, but at the same time I may say that I have made myself conversant with the needs of the working classes on this subject, and, having passed through the workshop myself, I think I have some knowledge of what is required. We have at the present time a grand school in the Technical Institute, and I have taken an active part in that work. The mistake which has been made is that a certain number of gentlemen constitute themselves the guardians of technical instruction, and act by themselves, whereas they might have taken us into their confidence and allowed us to have something to say on the subject. Well, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mather) tells us he has arrived at some conclusion in consultation with his friends that will tend to make the Bill complete, and I think that before we read it a second time—I do not suggest that we should be responsible for throwing it out, because technical instruction is a very important matter—we ought to have some indication as to the way in which it is proposed to amend the measure. We have, however, learnt that it is intended to put the Educational Authorities throughout the country in what is said to be their proper place, by sweeping away those that have existed since 1870, and placing in their stead Local Authorities, who at present have nothing to do with education. This, to me, is a most surprising proposition, and one that renders the Bill thoroughly objectionable. If, however, the Amendments that are to be accepted will have the effect of putting the Local Authorities of the great towns in their proper position, I should be glad to accede to them; but we ought at least to know how far this result will be achieved. It would be a good thing if the right hon. Gentleman would state to the House before the Bill is read a second time what are the Amendments the Government are prepared to accept.

*MR. H. STEWART (Spalding): I would point out that we are now discussing an Amended Bill that has been altered in order to meet the wishes of many hon. Members, but I may say, for myself, that I have been no party to what has been arranged, and therefore do not feel myself bound by it. I would remind the House that we are now entirely re-opening the question as settled by the Education Act of 1870. I desire to see whatever powers may be granted by this Bill placed under the control of educational authorities elected by the people. We are simply anxious to continue the development of the educational work commenced in 1870, and we want to see an efficient control given to the elected educational authorities of the towns and districts in which the education is to be given. If this be the spirit of the Amendment conceded by the right hon. Gentleman, it will, I think, not only commend itself to the House; but to all who feel the slightest interest in this important matter.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Derwent): I congratulate the Government and the House on the manner in which this Bill has been received. The Government have indicated that they are prepared to accept Amendments which hon. Members opposite are desirous of inserting in the Bill, and I think there is reason to hope that there will be no limited in its character. We have had one or two very important modifications of its provisions, and now the Attorney General has made an announcement of very critical importance, of such great importance that he and the First Lord of the Treasury admit it is reasonable the Committee should ask for a suspension of the consideration of the Bill until the situation is thoroughly recognised. The Attorney General has intimated that certain clauses are to be introduced, one with regard to the limitation of the liability of the landlord to the amount of the rent. I would ask him to tell us if he proposes also to limit the liability of the tenant as to the payment of the tithe rent-charge to the amount of the rent payable by him. I think, too, the Government ought to give us some information as to the general course of business.

*MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I appeal to the Government to consider whether, under the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, it would not be better to drop the Bill altogether. It is now the middle of August, and we are confronted with a new Bill which will require many days to properly discuss. If the Government persevere in their present intention the House will probably be kept sitting until the end of September.

MR. A. S. HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): A great many of us are afraid that by the present measure the additional power of recovery will increase the capital value of tithes. Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Government will be prepared next Session to bring in a Bill so that this measure may not have this effect?

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to congratulate the Government on the step they have taken, and also to congratulate the House on the effect of its decisions and deliberations. Then I want to know whether the Government will embody in the new Bill some of the clauses proposed by Lord Salisbury in the Bill of 1887? If the Government are going to transfer payment to the owner, I think they ought to protect him to some extent as well as the occupier. Will the Government insert clauses in the new Bill dealing with the case where there is no rent to pay?

Mr. A. O'Connor

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the best thing for the Government to do is to inform the House what is to be the course of public business to-day and to-morrow. Is it intended, after having suddenly suspended the consideration of the Irish Votes, as suddenly to take them up again? Do the Government propose to take Supply to-day and the Tithe Bill to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the Irish Members object to take the Irish Votes which are on the Paper to-day the Government will not press them. Then it is only reasonable that the Government should not proceed with the Tithe Bill to-morrow. We hope to put down on the Paper to-morrow the Amendments which are to be proposed, and I hope it will be possible to proceed with the Bill on Friday. Arrangements will be made, as far as possible, to meet the views of hon. Members who desire to consider the Estimates, and in making the arrangements last week for the consideration of the Irish Estimates the Government had entertained the hope that four days would have been sufficient for their consideration. I admit that the hope was an illusory one, but such was the expectation last week. In the course of the afternoon I will endeavour to come to an arrangement for the convenience of hon. Members as to the business for to-morrow, and I will state at the close of the Sitting what the business will be. In making the changes proposed we have endeavoured to meet what we believe to be the general desire of both sides of the House, but circumstances have rendered it unavoidable that these changes should be announced without much notice to the House. I appeal to hon. Members to give fair consideration to the proposals made by the Government, because they will be framed in such a manner as will meet all the objections against the measure, and conciliate the support of those hon. Gentlemen who sit behind the Government and all those who desire to see such a measure connected with tithe carried. In these circumstances, I ask the Committee to consent to report Progress.

MR. A. S. HILL: What is to be done as to future legislation?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it is quite enough for the Government to deal with the business they have in hand at present.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): When are we to understand the Irish Estimates will be taken?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government are anxious to consult hon. Members from Ireland as to the order in which the Estimates should be taken. I understand that the Irish Members wish to take the Vote for the Land Commission first, and after that to take the Votes in their natural order—that is to say, the Lord Lieutenant's Vote and the Chief Secretary's Vote and so on.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): Do the Government intend to take to-day the Interpretation Bill and the Technical Instruction Bill? With regard to the Interpretation Bill, I must offer the strongest opposition to one of the clauses; and with respect to the Technical Education Bill, I understand many hon. Members on this side of the House have objections either to the Bill itself or to certain clauses.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The first-named Bill is important, and I think the hon. Member stands alone in his objection to any portion of that measure. It is not generally opposed in any part of the House. Strong representations have been made to me by hon. Friends of the hon. Gentleman regarding the Technical Instruction Bill, and pointing out that it should be passed this Session. I am anxious that an opportunity should be afforded for the consideration of the Bill; but if the measure is strongly objected to the Government, of course, must give way.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.

COINAGE (LIGHT GOLD) BILL.

(No. 321.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

New Clause (Defacing gold coin under weight not to be obligatory).—(Mr. Montagu.)

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHAIRMAN called on Sir R. Fowler.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): On a point of order, Sir, I beg to remind you that I was in possession last night at 12 o'clock when the discussion closed.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no right to resume Debate on that account.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): I merely wish, in relation to this clause, to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the very bad state in which a great deal of the gold coinage in circulation is at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, quite aware of this, and I will only mention it as a question of some gravity, to which I hope during the Recess the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give attention, and that he will see his way to deal with the subject next Session.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I understand that last night the Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the insertion of this clause, and I confess I think his objection was well founded, for the clause would destroy altogether such security as we have against the circulation of depreciated gold coins and damaged gold coins, which certainly it is very necessary to maintain. There is no doubt the condition of the coinage of the country has fallen into a state not creditable to the greatest commercial country in the world. Everybody must admit that. For a short time when I was at the Exchequer I had to consider the subject, and I certainly thought it required immediate attention. The estimate made at that time of the sum that would be required to put the gold coinage in a proper condition was between £600,000 and £700,000, and no doubt the three years that have since elapsed have still further deteriorated the coins and they are in a worse condition, so that the sum required is still larger. It is not creditable to England which has a gold currency—and I am very glad we have—that we should have this gold currency depreciated to the amount of half a million sterling. Our gold coinage has been for a long time the basis of the monetary system of, I may say, the whole world, and I think one of the first duties of the Government should be to put that coinage into a proper condition. I am very glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has begun this duty, though in a tentative and experimental way, for, of course, it is only with a small part of the question that this Bill deals. I am glad of it, for many reasons, but particularly because it indicates that the Chancellor of the Exchequer still intends that we shall keep gold as the basis of the currency of the country, and that he has not adopted any new-fangled ideas of bi-metallism, which would certainly have the effect of driving gold from the country, and all the money spent on the restoration of the gold coinage would be so much wasted expenditure. This Bill can only be justified on the assumption that the Chancellor of the Exchequer means to maintain gold as the basis of our currency. Of course, the first question the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to consider is, who is to bear the cost of restoring the gold coinage of the country?

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman; but he is not speaking to the clause before the Committee.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I would ask indulgence at this time of the Session, otherwise I must move the postponement of the Bill, in order that I may have more latitude in discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is well aware that I have forwarded the progress of this Bill, and I understood that I should have the opportunity of making a statement on this subject; but, unfortunately, there seem to be so many restrictions surrounding us now, that I scarcely know how it is possible to express an opinion on this or any other subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the opportunity for a general statement is on the Second Reading, and it arises again on the Third Reading; but a general statement cannot be made on the question of inserting a particular clause.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is useless to talk of discussion upon the Third Reading, because, at this period of the Session that stage is an idle form. I should have thought that one might have been allowed to make some observations on this clause; but if that is not so, I can only regret that a Bill which is certainly of very considerable importance should be passed without discussion in the House of Commons.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I regret that at this stage it is not competent for the right hon. Gentleman to pursue this interesting topic, but probably he will find the opportunity to do so on the consideration of the Report. In regard to the clause which it is proposed to add, I desire to urge upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the very reasonable character of the proposal embodied in it. At present the law in regard to light gold coins is of a very extraordinary character. Anyone being tendered a gold coin below a certain standard of weight is bound there and then, being provided—and the law contemplates that he shall be provided—with a pair of scales, to take out the scales and weigh the coin.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Sir, I rise to order. This is the very argument I was trying to pursue on this clause. It was upon the liability to replace light gold coins that I was speaking, and I thought it was most material in reference to this clause which proposes that no person shall have imposed upon him the liability to destroy a light gold coin, as is the law now; I had agreed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in opposing the clause, and was about to refer to what had been done in former times when you, Sir, stopped me. I was speaking on this clause, as I thought, in the most legitimate way.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry if I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, and interrupted him in the discussion of the clause. I confess I was greatly deceived, for I thought he was entering upon a wider discussion embracing such questions as bi-metallism, the maintenance of a gold currency and the cost of restoring the gold coinage. If he was discussing the clause, which I confess I thought he was not, he has a perfect right to continue to do so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I had made a parenthetical remark upon bi-metallism and had passed away from that and was discussing the question of who was to pay for the replacing of light gold, and at the moment you stopped me, Sir, I was about to refer to the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and what had been done in previous periods.

THE CHAIRMAN: To discuss the point is scarcely relevant, for I have invited the right hon. Gentleman to proceed.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I was observing upon the conditions imposed by the existing law whereby any person being tendered a piece of light gold is then and there required to weigh, out, break or deface it. That is an obligation thrown upon every member of the community, which I will venture to say in 999 cases out of a 1,000 it is perfectly impossible to discharge. It is an obligation the discharge of which is attended with considerable risk; in point of fact, it is an obligation impossible to discharge. But see the absurd position in which the Government may be placed under the existing law. If I cash at a post office an order for £1 and receive the money from an agent of the Government, I am not only entitled, but I am bound to examine the money, and if it is light, as it very often is, I am required to deface the coin. Suppose, therefore, an individual goes to a post office and defaces, in accordance with the directions of the Statute, the money which the Government hand him in discharge of their fiscal obligation, what is the position of the Government? They will be bound to replace at their own expense this coin so defaced, unless, indeed, they prefer to make the unfortunate postmaster responsible for the money he is using on their account, they not having supplied him with money of standard weight. The whole position is perfectly unreasonable, and may be made by those who choose to indulge in this kind of freak perfectly ridiculous. The Post Office would be placed in a very inconsistent and embarrassing position if this, which is open to any member of the community, were actually done. What can be the use of perpetuating this clause of the Act of 1870? There is no practical benefit arising from it, and, under the circumstances, I think the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, whom I am sorry not to see in his place, is one that ought to commend itself to the Government.

*Mr. BARING (London): I only want to point out one thing. I am quite aware that the law is as the hon. Member for Donegal has stated it, and that the obligation lies upon all persons, but, as a matter of fact, it is attended to by no one except the Bank of England. Now, if this clause is passed, the Bank of England will be morally prevented from doing what it now does to keep the currency of the country in as good a state as by this means is possible. If we pass this clause the Bank of England will be bound to return light gold to its depositors instead of making it unfit for circulation, and thus to assist in the circulation of light gold, and I do not think that is desirable.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member behind me has in a very few words stated the main objection to the clause moved by the hon. Member opposite. I admit there are such imperfections in the law that it has broken down to a great extent; but still there remains the security that the Bank of England does watch over the gold circulation, and does not allow light gold to get into circulation. As we are dealing with only a small part of the question it would not be wise to repeal the existing safeguards against the circulation of light gold. The right hon. Member for Derby shares the view that the present protection ought to be maintained. Large sums might in light sovereigns be sent from abroad, and might pass into circulation; but these are now clipped when received, and so their passing into circulation is stopped. The removal of the existing protection would increase the amount of light gold current in the country, and thus aggravate the evil which we are now attempting to deal with. Therefore I cannot accept the clause now proposed. No doubt the three years that have passed since the estimate was made of the loss from gold coinage have aggravated the evil, and have caused it to be somewhat greater than it was calculated to be at that time. I should be glad if it were possible to put down the Third Reading of the Bill at a time when the right hon. Member for Derby could speak on the interesting subject of the coinage; but in the present state of business I cannot pledge myself to any such arrangement, although I gladly acknowledge the assistance I have received from the right hon. Gentleman, and should be happy if I could return his courtesy by affording him a fuller opportunity of discussion than is afforded by this clause.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR: What about the position of the Post Office?

*Sir R. FOWLER: May I suggest that if the Bill were set down as the first order to be taken after midnight it would give the right hon. Gentle-in Scotland it is 12·3; so that, while in Scotland we have a higher standard than England and an increased age, the number of children in school attendance is proportionately less than in England at the present moment. This is a result which cannot be termed very satisfactory. Another point has reference to the school supply. The Scotch Education Department tell us that, in 1882, there was accommodation for 274,000 children. In 1872 the Board of Education took statistics as to the amount of school accommodation in Scotland, and they divided it under three different heads—namely, good, bad, and indifferent. These facts were most carefully tabulated; but we have it represented here by the Department as if the figures only related the amount of accommodation provided in the State-aided schools, whereas it was known there were other schools superior to those on the annual great list which gave accommodation of a kind that could not be impeached. If the Scotch Education Department wished to make a fair comparison they had nothing more to do than to give us the statistics of the Board of Education, which set forth the amount of accommodation existing in 1872, and then to compare that with the accommodation now provided. It is not as if the Scotch Education Department were not aware of this. Their attention has been called to it for years, and the only explanation of their action is that they are wilfully persisting in a wrong system. At the end of their Report they give us a table which is very significant, and shows the fallacious principle on which their statistics are made up. They say that about one seventh of the children in Scotland attend the higher schools in which the payment is paid a week and upwards. Well, the Scotch Department know that that is not true. By a Return issued about a year ago it was shown that the number was not much more than one-half of that. This table brings them to a most extraordinary result. If this table is correct, there is not a single child in Scotland between the ages of 7 and 12 who is not attending school, deducting of course the one-seventh found in the higher schools. That is a most marvellous result. I venture to say it is a result which is unprecedented in any part of the world. But that is not all. To show the perfection with which the Scotch Education Department work their statistics let me also point out that there are on the school registers, 23,885 more children between the ages of 7 and 12 than there are children of such ages in Scotland. The Department have had their attention called to this because they have taken the trouble to calculate the percentage of the children on the school register compared with the children in existence. The Department know quite well that there are not one-seventh of the children between the ages of 7 and 12 in non-State-aided schools. They know that for years past the School Board system has been working down all the private schools, indeed, they themselves have issued a Return showing clearly that there are not more than 70,000 or 80,000 children in non State-aided schools, whereas they represent that there are between 120,000 and 130,000 children in such schools. The Department themselves find great fault with the school attendance, but perhaps, before dealing with the question of school attendance I may refer to that of the school supply. I find that last year the average attendance increased by 4,500, while the school supply was increased by 9,500 places. If one look back at the Reports of the Department he finds that, according to the Department, the school supply in Scotland is practically complete. In Scotland the school accommodation is a heavy burden upon the local ratepayers, and in the Highlands especially is the cause of the distress in school matters. We are told that there is in Scotland school accommodation for 687,000, and yet the average attendance is only 496,000. That is to say, we have accommodation for 200,000 more children than there are in average attendance, and this, too, after we have increased the space requisite to 10 square feet per child. This state of things represents an enormous waste in the shape of interest on money expended, and is the cause of a considerable amount of hardship throughout Scotland. With regard to school attendance, the Department tell us they calculated there would be 804,625 children on the Register, and 670,000 in average daily attendance. I should like to know how in the world under present conditions, or under any similar conditions, could the Scotch Education Department expect there would be so many as 804,625 on the Register? According to the Education Act, a child is required to pass Standard V. in order to be relieved from school attendance. Standard V. may be passed in six years. That is a well understood fact, because the attendance necessary in order to pass a standard is 125 full-day attendances, or 250 half-day attendances. A standard may be easily passed by a child of ordinary intelligence who makes the attendance I have mentioned. Taking children of from five to 12 years of age, I find that the total number of children in Scotland is 661,000, so that if you put the children in non-State-aided schools at 60,000, you have 600,000 who naturally ought to be at school. If you have your educational system in proper working order in Scotland, the utmost number you should have on the roll in State-aided schools in Scotland would be about 600,000. In order to get the average attendance you would have to make a deduction of about 23 per cent., but we find we are not getting the results we might reasonably expect. In comparing England and Scotland we have to take into consideration the differences between the two countries. The standard of education varies, and, whilst in Scotland the compulsory age has been raised to 14 years, in England it remains at only 13 years. Another important factor in the situation is that in England the schools are limited by the Act of 1870 to elementary education, whilst in Scotland there is no such limit. We might, therefore, reasonably expect that we should have in Scotland a higher percentage of passes in the higher standards. We find, however, that England far surpasses Scotland in this respect. I find that last year the increase in passes in the standards from four upwards amounted in England to 36 per cent, whilst in Scotland the increase was only 17·6 per cent. If England were to adopt the law of Scotland, making Standard V. compulsory, and if it were also to adopt the provision of the Scotch Factory Act that no child shall be allowed to work full time in a factory until it has reached the age of 13, or passed Standard V., it would completely surpass Scotland in the matter of education.

There is one curious result to be ascertained from the Returns. For instance, I find that in Standards III. and IV. during the past year there has been an actual deficiency in presentation. The Scotch schools keep back some of the children, whereas the English schools present all they have. During the past year the average attendance in Scotland has increased by 4,500, and yet the number of children presented to the Inspector has decreased by 2,000. If the Scotch teacher is so cautious as to take care that children who are not likely to pass are not presented when the Inspector makes the examination, of course the percentage will go up. During the past year, whilst 14·8 per cent of the population were presented in England, only 14 per cent were presented in Scotland. England presents 90 per cent of her register, and Scotland 77 per cent of her register. Another curious fact is that whilst Standards III. and IV. have increased during the past year, Standards V. and VI. have not increased. It shows that in Scotland you are working down the secondary schools, and the children are being sent into the Board Schools. You consequently have an increase of the passes in the standards above the compulsory standard, owing to the class of children you are getting into the Board Schools. The increase is therefore not one which we should rejoice at. It means that you are reducing the number of private schools in Scotland year by year, and that the children who have been attending private schools are now swelling the numbers of those who are passing out of the compulsory standards. What is more significant still is the fact that when we deal with Standards III. and IV., in which we might expect to find a great improvement as regards the mass of the population, we actually find a decrease this year. This leads one to consider the effect of the action of the Scotch Education Department upon the secondary or private schools in Scotland at the present moment. Those who are interested in private schools denied for a long time that secondary education was on a decline in Scotland, and I remember the right hon. Gentleman who is now Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) bringing forward a whole host of statistics to show that that was not the case. The Government Department had, however, eventually to confess that secondary education was on the decline in Scotland, and they appointed a Departmental Committee to investigate the subject, with the result that the Committee had to confess that it was on the decline. There can be no doubt that the School Boards have been competing with the secondary schools in such a way as to render it practically impossible that secondary education can exist. Take the case of Glasgow. According to the tables of the Scotch Education Department, we should have expected that one-seventh of the children in Glasgow would have been found in the higher schools, and paying about 9d. per week. There are about 84,000 children in the City of Glasgow, and, therefore, 12,000 ought to be in the higher schools. As a matter of fact, the number is only 3,800, and that number includes about 2,300 who receive their education at the expense of endowments or at the cost of the ratepayers. Therefore, only about 1,500 children are receiving education at the sole expense of the parents, and paying above 9d. per week. Even the 1,500 do not all come from the City of Glasgow, because about half of them are brought in from country districts. I say, then, that the whole of the education in Glasgow is being centred in the School Board, and private enterprise now finds it practically impossible to exist. Some of the private schools have now only a nominal existence, because it is impossible for them to provide satisfactory teachers. The children who are driven out of the private schools are necessarily going into the Board Schools, and have necessarily increased the attendance, and the higher standard passes in those schools. It has been the policy of the Scotch Education Department to kill out the secondary schools. How is it done in Glasgow? In order to get over the objection of parents to allowing their children to attend schools which every other class of children attend, the Glasgow School Board have graded the schools socially. Standards I. to V. are taught at 1d. a week in one school, whilst in another for the same standards, two or three times that amount is charged, and in another, four or five times that amount. The object is to get certain classes of the community in certain schools. The unfortunate result is that the bursaries and scholarships which were intended for the poor are being given to the richer classes. At the same time the secondary schools are going back year after year, and the attendance at the Universities is getting less and less. This is probably a rough but significant way of testing the results of your educational system in Scotland. If your system were on the basis that you are going on improving your elementary education, it would reflect itself in the secondary education, and again in University education. But the reverse is the case, your secondary education and your University education are going down, and as for your elementary system, you are taking children out of it by bringing in secondary education; you are taking from one and putting on to the other, just as you did with your school attendance. There are various means of improving secondary education proposed by the Department. They propose that we shall have secondary schools in Scotland, and how are they to be properly maintained? No doubt theoretically, a man sitting in his office in London and looking at the educational question, and bent on some means of improving secondary education would think "if we get secondary schools with proper appliances and the attendance of children we shall get better results than we can in elementary schools." This may seem so in theory, but then we have to consider the habits of the people and the sparse population in many parts of Scotland. You may have secondary schools here and there, but the problem is how to get the children into them. We have experience of the system of John Knox under which the teacher was a man of education, who looked forward to secondary education as the ultimate end of all his teaching, and it was his greatest ambition to lead his pupils on and send as many as possible to the Universities. The teacher inspired an enthusiasm for secondary education in his scholars. It would be a great mistake to suppose that all you have to do is to open secondary schools, have teachers and appliances, and conclude that parents, knowing the value of secondary education, will send their children there. Nothing of the kind. It will be found, as regards the children who were sent to the Universities in the olden time, that they were picked out as the ablest by the teachers, and their education was worked up to a certain point, because the teacher inspired in his pupils an enthusiasm to go on into higher education. But that is exactly what you are killing in Scotland at the present moment. You may establish well-equipped secondary schools, but the most important element is to get the children into those schools. Let us see how your free education system works in regard to secondary schools. The Lord Advocate admits that secondary schools are badly manned and equipped, and are not in an efficient state, but if the secondary schools find it hard to exist now existence will be doubly hard under the new system. You will widen the gulf between secondary and Board Schools to such an extent that hard as it has been for secondary schools to exist in competition with Board Schools it will become impossible within the next few years. So we have this matter clearly brought out, that the system under which you are proceeding is not a system tending to educational improvement, it is simply a reversal of the system that has made Scotch education what it is, and your new system is practically ruining secondary education and University education. Reference has been made to the examinations going on of secondary schools in Scotland. I admit that the Department must satisfy itself as to the state of these schools, and I have no doubt that all the schools will claim to be inspected, because they know that without it existence would be impossible under present circumstances, that they could not possibly be worse off, and their only hope is that if they submit to inspection they will have some claim for Government assistance. I can quite understand how Scotch teachers recognise their own interest in this way, and place their schools under the inspection of the Department; but I must say I do not view with any great confidence this system of inspection. The result will be that certain educational results will be brought out, and it may seem paradoxical that anyone should say that inspection could possibly do any harm. It will be said inspection may possibly do no good, but it could do no harm. But I apprehend it may do harm, and in this way: the inspection practically fixes the teaching of the whole school, and the teacher has not that free hand which is so essential in a proper educational system, because he will have regard to the important fact that the examination will take place at the end of the year, and that he must make his teaching subservient to the passing of his scholars at the end of the year. That will be the result of the Department getting the whole of the education of Scotland into their clutches. [Cries of "Divide!"] I am sorry to try the patience of some hon. Members; but be it remembered that we have not had an opportunity of discussing this Vote for three years, and there are special circumstances that make discussion desirable now. There is another point to mention in regard to school inspection. The Scotch Department have got it into their heads that if they can get hold of a man with an English Degree he must necessarily be a better man for an Inspector than another with a Scotch University degree. It would be interesting to have a Return showing how much stress is laid upon this point, and how often, as between men of equal ability and experience, the English Degree gets the preference. We had an experience of the result in the appointment of an Inspector in Stirlingshire whose want of practical sense and experience to an almost ludicrous extent, University "don" though he was, set the whole district in rebellion. It is pretty generally known that the Scotch Education Department is really a one man department, that the Secretary for Scotland is the Education Department. Though naturally there is a Board of Education, yet in point of fact the members only formally meet and pass such matters as are put before them. This is one reason for the strong feeling that exists in Scotland as to the mismanagement of educational matters, because there is not that free discussion there should be from the presence in the Department of men of independent views in relation to matters in which it cannot be supposed that the Secretary for Scotland is especially interested and specially understands. Nobody supposes that he will go into details sufficiently, and so it is that the man who possesses a certain Degree is marked for promotion as Inspector. Now, I will venture to say that all those who have been through the University know perfectly well how little value should be attached to a Degree. When a man is young he applies himself to working up for the Degree, and when he secures it, that is a mark of his ability then. But the taking of the Degree is no mark of success in later life. The taking of a Degree represents an amount of industry for the time being, but more important are the practical experience and the industry that follow the University life. Yet these are ignored in favour of those men who happened to have secured a Degree, especially an English Degree. There is much complaint on this account among the teaching profession. Therefore, I maintain that this educational report which the Department have issued, instead of being a report calculated to give the public a fair and true knowledge of the progress of education in Scotland, is of a most misleading character. I have endeavoured to point out that the effect of the educational system being pursued in Scotland is killing the secondary schools. I do not intend to divide the Committee, or put any issue before them, but I think it is for the interest of education that these matters should be discussed, and I do not think that Scotch education has ever occupied an undue share of the time of the House.

Mr. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I will not imitate the hon. Member in the length of my remarks, for I am well aware there are many Members interested in this subject. The hon. Member has complained of the Scotch Department in London, and he said there are great grievances felt in Scotland in regard to the action of the Department. But I do not agree with him there. I have taken the trouble to sift different allegations made as to mismanagement by the Scotch Education Department, and those who are supposed to be principal actors in the work of the Department, and in almost every case I have found that the Department have taken the greatest trouble to arrive at a right and true understanding of questions before them. I have found that good sense has prevailed, and that what has been done by the Department has been done with all the care and discrimination that might be anticipated. The hon. Member has referred to the appointment of Inspectors, and this is one of the matters I have taken the trouble to inquire into, and the result of my inquiries is that I have found that where they have appointed men with University Degrees the Department have selected the very best men they could find to fill the position of Inspectors. You cannot blame the Department if, in making a selection among men equally qualified, they choose the man with a Degree, passing over others not so distinguished. They have generally taken the best men as Inspectors, though I confess I at one time shared the view of the hon. Member, but inquiry dispelled that impression. I would like to see the Scotch Education Department combined with South Kensington, for I believe that by that arrangement a very large sum of public money would be saved, and education would be advanced, especially technical education. When the working of the Department is blamed it should be remembered that the main lines upon which they work have been laid down by Parliament, and if there is blame it should not fall upon the Department. There is one grievance to which I wish to call the attention of the Lord Advocate—that is the proposal to stop the grant for cookery and drawing unless the two are combined. We cannot expect to have cookery universally taught, whereas it is different in the case of drawing. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will continue the grant for cookery and also a separate grant for drawing. I take it that this is a matter for the Treasury rather than for the right hon. Gentleman, but I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will use his influence in this direction with the Treasury. I am sure if he will send to my suggestion it will have the approval of all School Boards, certainly those in the country districts. I should have liked to have said a word or two upon secondary ed every day, for some place in the country districts to which to send children after the elementary school and before sending them to a University, or to which, even if they do not go to a University, they may be sent to continue their education. Such a school might be established in certain groups of parishes, or in a large parish. There are many parents in the position of land agents, and others, who really want to give their children a better education, but cannot send them far from home because of the expense and difficulty.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): There is a question I should like to ask in reference to Section No. 32 A. I put the question some time ago and I should now like to know what has occurred since. As I understand this Section 32 A, it suspends the 17s. 6d. limit in reference to Highland parishes. In the Code for 1886, by some means Caithness and Sutherland were dropped out and four counties only were exempted. The Secretary for Scotland admitted this was an error, and, with the assent of the House, these grants have been made in the counties I have mentioned until the present year, when, as I understand, the Auditor General has expressed doubts as to the legality of the payments, although made with the assent of the House and of the Treasury. In consequence of the question raised by the Auditor General, the grants have ceased in Caithness and Sutherlandshire, and the schools there, expecting these grants and not getting them, are in rather a bad condition. I should like to know why it is these grants have been stopped, and whether the Treasury will issue a Minute or take means of removing the scruples of the Auditor General, and placing the legality of the payments beyond doubt.

*MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): There is an increase in the Vote of £14,554; but I am not going to criticise that. I am sorry I have not the Report of the Educational Department with me, for I intended to make some remarks thereupon; but I may observe generally that I do not attach much importance to the various statistics, though, no doubt, they relate to important matters of administration. I look more at the new departure of the Department in reference to inspection, and I hope that the policy will be in the direction of a relaxation of the rules that are applied to both Inspectors and teachers. I agree that there is great difficulty in carrying these changes out when money grants depend upon the work done in the schools; but I hold that the more we trust to the teachers and Inspectors the more will it be the interest of education in Scotland. A great deal has been said as to the qualifications of the Inspectorate. I have no doubt that some years ago preference was given to candidates from the English Universities, and that it was a great grievance amongst teachers of experience and high qualification that they should be subject to inspection by men of this kind. The complaint was made that the Inspectorships were not open to teachers with the necessary experience and qualifications, but I understand that to a considerable extent this grievance has been removed. The complaints one used to hear are now not so frequent. I consider that the educational policy which should obtain in Scotland, necessitates the appointment of Inspectors from amongst the body of teachers, in whom the public generally have the greatest confidence. I hope and trust that the future policy of the Scottish Education Department will be to throw more responsibility on the Inspectors, and not to tie them down in such a way as to make them mere machines. I am sorry I do not notice on the part of the Education Department any tendency to make a new departure in this regard. I had hoped, further, that the Department would have indicated some policy in regard to doing away altogether with denominational training colleges. I do not say that they are not performing their work in a very efficient manner. Efficiency is not the question, but I think that something ought to be done in the direction of nationalising the training colleges, as at present a great waste of money is involved in the maintenance of so many institutions for the training of teachers. The number of denominational schools might also be reduced with advantage, having regard to the costly public machinery for education existing everywhere in Scotland. It is a source of satisfaction to me to see that these schools are diminishing in number to some extent, but I should like to see a greater diminution, but I think the Department might offer inducements in that direction. These schools should be under the School Boards. As to secondary education, I am not aware that anything can be done to advance it by trying to engraft it on primary education. It is, to my mind, a matter that deserves a distinct policy of its own. Moreover, I think it should be dealt with without delay, and I hope, therefore, that it will be one of the matters which the Education Department will now take into consideration. As to one of the points brought under the notice of the Committee by the hon. Member for Caithness, I am bound to say it took me very much by surprise. It astonished me very much to hear that the County of Sutherland, as well as Caithness, was excepted from the grant which the Education Department took such credit to itself for having obtained for the assistance of the Highlands. I cannot approve of the policy of the Department in the matter, neither can I approve of their action in treating Lewis exceptionally. The control of the Schools there is taken out of the hands of the elected Board, for what reason I cannot conceive. The Department may say that, considering that they are making extra grants, they ought to have extra control, but I cannot see the justice of the demand, and am clearly of opinion that the Local Authorities should have the same control as heretofore. On the whole I must say I regard the Report of the Education Department as satisfactory on all points, except the one to which I have referred. On the whole, I see no reason for anything but congratulation.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I rise to move the reduction of one item, namely, the grant for Denominational Training Colleges, but before proceeding to deal with that subject, I should like to make a passing allusion to one or two points mentioned by previous speakers. With reference to the reflections that have been made on the Scotch Education Department, I desire to enter my protest against the entire system of the management of that Department. I do not believe that the people of Scotland will long submit to a system whereby the control of one of the most important interests in Scotland is practically in the hands of a few professionals who live and move and have their being in London. I object to the State subvention which is the basis of the Report before us. The system of giving grants out of the Imperial Exchequer to Local Boards misleads the people, who think they get their education paid for, whereas it is like taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. That delusion is the only ground on which the present system rests. I do not believe education in Scotland will be satisfactory so long as it is managed by a body of professionals in London. With regard to the specific complaint that has been brought forward in reference to the appointment of Inspectors, I can only say that the matter is the subject of general complaint in Scotland. I do not know whether, as has been stated, the matter has mended in any degree of late. I do not know why it is that persons with English University Degrees are selected for the office of Inspector. The mere fact of a person possessing a Degree—even a London Degree—is not a disqualification, but I want to know why such persons should be selected in preference to teachers of high standing in Scotland? Surely men who have risen by sheer merit to prominent positions in the teaching profession in their own country have a right to aspire to those positions, and are the persons best qualified to fill them in the interest of education. I cannot for the life of me see how the Government can justify the appointment to the position of Inspectors of young English graduates who come to their work in a state of abject ignorance of its practical necessities. I do not think matters have in any way mended in this respect. My information is to the contrary. I am not aware that any single master has yet been appointed Chief Inspector, although one or two may have been given the post of Sub-Inspector. I think if the appointments of Inspectors were to be examined into we should be able to trace them distinctly to University influence other than Scotch. I now beg to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £28,706, the amount of the grant for training colleges. The Debate has come upon us by surprise, and the result is that we are compelled to discuss this important matter in an empty House.

Mr. A. Sutherland

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): On a point of order, and in order that we may not be shut out from discussing the question of Inspectors, I beg to move an Amendment to reduce the vote for Sub-inspectors and Inspectors by £100. This raises a question of considerable interest to schoolmasters and School Boards in Scotland, and I believe there exists an almost unanimous opinion in Scotland against the system of taking English graduates as Inspectors of schools, and relegating teachers to the lower ranks of Assistant and Sub-inspectors. Anyone who has experience of the working of our system of inspection knows very well that the distinction between Inspector, and Sub-inspector, and Assistant Inspector, is very hollow—that the only distinction is in the payment they receive and not in the nature of the work they do. It is impossible to grade the work of inspection in such a way as to justify for one single moment the inequality of payment. Therefore, this system of inspection may be looked at from two points of view. From one point of view it is a mode of saving the State expense by substituting inferior for superior Inspectors and giving inadequate salaries instead of adequate salaries; and the other point of view is that the salaries of teachers are low, and, therefore, they can be made assistants without getting as much as they would if they acted in the capacity of Inspectors. We have great complaints made of the present system of inspection. It is notorious that some of the Inspectors make the Assistant Inspectors do the work, and it appears to me that the whole of that system should be swept away. We ought to have only one class of Inspectors, and each Inspector should be put in charge of a district sufficient for him to overlook. I do not say that the salaries of the Chief Inspectors are not too high. Some of them, I think, are decidedly too high, but at any rate the whole principle on which the thing proceeds is ridiculously wrong. So far from experience as a teacher being, as at present, a disqualification for the office of Inspector, I hold that no man ought to be allowed to become an Inspector who has not had some years' experience as an elementary teacher. There can be no doubt that the present system of inspection is open to many objections, principally on account of the want of experience of the gentlemen who are appointed, and who laboriously endeavour, at the expense of the public, to learn the business they ought to have known before their appointment. There are difficulties constantly arising between the teachers and the Inspectors because of the capricious and varying standards the Inspectors adopt. It certainly seems to me, in the interest of the profession of teaching, that promotion to the office of Inspector should be open to all the teachers in Scotland. Every teacher of an elementary school ought, so to speak, to carry the baton of any Inspector in his knapsack. The possibility of rising to that position ought to be before every teacher when he commences his career, because I hold that the difficulty of obtaining the best class of men to become teachers of elementary schools arises from the lack of promotion. It seems to me that to give them this prospect of promotion would be greatly to improve the system of education. For these among other reasons I have moved the reduction of the Vote. I must express my regret that the Government should have taken the Scotch Members unawares by bringing on the Scotch Vote to-day, when we have not the facts, figures, and materials to hand for the discussion. It was a great scandal that the Scotch Votes should be brought on so late as August 14. The mismanagement of our business in this House is rapidly approaching a crisis. These Votes ought to have been taken a long time ago, and not left over to a time when there are not one-sixth of the Scotch Members present.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—
“That Item C, Salaries of Inspectors, be reduced by £100.”—(Mr. Hunter.)

*MR. HOZIER (Lancashire, South): I am strongly of opinion that schoolmasters should be eligible for promotion to Inspectorships, and should be so promoted as often as possible. Every profession ought, in my opinion, to have its own prizes, and I see no reason for the scholastic profession being an exception. Such a system of promotion would be of direct advantage not only to the profession, but also to the country. There is no doubt that Inspectors who come straight from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge have a very curious idea as to what the standards ought to be; and I, for one, most certainly think the Inspectors should be chosen from among those who have experience of teaching.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I do not know whether schoolmasters will make the best Inspectors or not, but I am perfectly certain that young graduates do not. They are the outcome of a bad system of education. For many years past I have never met an intelligent, well-educated young friend, without a particular trade or profession, who did not want an Inspectorship of schools. In the circumstances, I do hope Her Majesty's Government will hold out some prospect that in future the Inspectors will be men of mature experience.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is an error to suppose that inexperienced men are appointed to Inspectorships in Scotland. As a matter of fact, no Inspector has recently been appointed who has not had practical experience as a teacher. It is said that it is most desirable that the teachers in public schools should be able to look forward to the position of Inspectors. I would point out that they are in nowise precluded from that office; but it should be understood that no rigid rule is followed by the Department in these appointments, or it would narrow the selection. It is not considered expedient to promote by seniority, but the Department hold a free hand, and no class is excluded from consideration. It is not the fact that the present Inspectors are inexperienced, for there is not one of them who has not been engaged in teaching. With regard to the Sub-inspectors, they do not possess the same powers as the Inspectors, being unable even to make a report without the countenance of the Chief Inspectors. The intermediate grade between the Inspectors and Sub-inspectors was established by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). These Assistant Inspectors are chosen from the certificated teachers, and there is thus communication established between the two bodies—the Inspectors and the teachers.

Mr. Hoxier

MR. CALDWELL: As an instance of the manner in which the appointments to Inspectorships are made, I would point out as a remarkable fact that two head-masters of a school on the Duke of Richmond's estate were successively appointed to be Inspectors. The selection is based not so much on qualification as upon influence. Though it is true that teachers are appointed to be Assistant Inspectors, there is no movement upwards from the one class to the other. I put a question to the late Lord Advocate on the subject, but all I could get out of the Department was "We are appointing Assistant Inspectors." I never could learn that anything was being done to enable these men to rise higher. The Department says, "We appoint the best men." We want to ascertain whether there is such a thing as gradations of service. And we are entitled to know whether, when seniority is disregarded, there is any special reason for passing it by. If there be any special reason, then the public will be satisfied. Undoubtedly the onus lies upon the Department to substantiate the usefulness of their appointments. As regards Sub-inspectors, we find that they do the whole work of the Inspectors, except merely signing the documents; and the complaint is that Sub-inspectors are not promoted to Inspectorships. I think the men who have been doing the work should have the chance of promotion, other things being equal, or unless there be special reasons to the contrary. I ask the Lord Advocate whether within the last few years any Sub-Inspector has been appointed to an Inspectorship when a vacancy has arisen. When it is found that certain people in some parts of Scotland are appointed through influence, while others who have served for years are passed over, naturally public feeling is aroused in Scotland. I support the Amendment.

*MR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): There is one grievance which the people of the Highlands suffer from, and that is the appointment of Inspectors who do not speak Gaelic as well as

English. It is impossible that the Inspector who does not know Gaelic can make allowance for children who do not speak English properly. Necessarily there must be deficiencies. Those Inspectors who know Gaelic can make allowances, and I hope in future that the Government will appoint Inspectors who are able to speak Gaelic. I have been a teacher myself in my day, and I have seen that the Inspector who could speak Gaelic was able to get more into sympathy with the children, who got along better with him than could the merely English-speaking Inspector. In reference to the promotion of Sub-inspectors in Scotland, I cannot understand the system at all. Is there any other branch of the Public Service where a man has not the hope of promotion from the lower to the higher ranks? The Sub-inspector in Scotland has no such hope. I join with my hon. Friend in asking whether any Sub-inspector has ever been appointed to an Inspectorship? Perhaps the Lord Advocate will explain. If the Sub-inspectors have not the necessary degree, let the Government tell them so; and if they have the hope of promotion, these men will qualify themselves for it. They could easily come to London to take the necessary degrees. But the Government tell them no such thing. The English M.A. is very much more thought of, and young men are appointed to the Inspectorships over the heads of men of 20 years' experience. I know one of the ablest men in the Sub-inspectorate of Scotland, who has been passed over in this way; all the life is taken out of him; he has to do the work of the Chief Inspector, who gets most part of the pay.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I should like to take note of the fact that in this discussion there has been an absolutely unanimous expression of opinion on the part of Scotch Members on this great education question. The principle of that unanimity—I am quoting almost the words of the hon. Member (Mr. Hozier), whose speech I was delighted to hear—is that the Inspectorships should be regarded as the prizes of the profession of the elementary teachers of Scotland. That is the principle which we are going to assert in this Division. Now, the statement of the Lord Advocate, although to some extent satisfactory, did not meet the principle I have stated. It may be that recent appointments have not been quite so bad, but the Lord Advocate did not assert that these appointments are made from among those who have had experience of teaching in other departments; nor has he given any assurance that the principle will be respected by the Scotch Educational Department in future.

*MR. A. SUTHERLAND: Sir, while I am not prepared to agree with some of the remarks of hon. Members, I deprecate the system which shuts out Assistant Inspectors from rising to higher grades. I also deprecate the system of patronage which has been used in the appointments to higher offices. I know the case of a gentleman, already referred to by the hon. Member (Dr. M'Donald), who has been passed over repeatedly by his juniors who had nothing like his experience and knowledge, and who have given nothing like the useful service which he has rendered. To mark my want of sympathy with such a system I intend to vote with my hon. Friend.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: In answer to the hon. Member (Dr. M'Donald), I have to state that there are on the staff of Inspectors five who have been promoted. Another point is of a personal character. Something has been said about the injustice of the appointment of Mr. Stewart by the Duke of Richmond. I find he was appointed solely on his merits, and that he had been 14 years an Inspector before he was promoted.

MR. HUNTER: The right hon. Gentleman has hardly met the main point of the objection. We objected that the class of Assistant Inspectors had salaries which were far too low—beginning at £150, and rising to £300 a year. I find that 42 per cent of the schoolmasters in Scotland have salaries as good as have Assistant Inspectors, and, therefore, there is no promotion. Not only that, but I find that 180 of the teachers in Scotland have salaries above £100, which is the maximum salary of the Sub-inspectors. My objection is that Assistant Inspectors are under-paid and over-worked, and that in point of fact it is a mere subterfuge to pretend that teachers ought to be Inspectors, while you practically deny them the valuable appointments which are given to those who have not their qualifications. I should say that no man ought to be appointed an Inspector or a Sub-inspector who has not been seven years a teacher in an elementary school. From that class, and that class alone, ought Inspectors to be taken; and, moreover, there ought only to be two grades. I think the work is the same in all cases, and the pay ought to be the same.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): In Scotland I find they have some £25,000 as pay for 40 or 50 Inspectors, while in Ireland we have 83 Inspectors receiving only £30,000. I sympathise with the Motion of the hon. Gentleman and with his object to make the appointments of Inspectors from the class of persons who have had practical training in teaching.

DR. CLARK: The Assistant Inspectors who do the work of examining schools begin at £150 a year, and the consequence is that you get young and inexperienced men to review and examine the work of teachers who are receiving double their pay, and who have had 20 years' experience. It is a matter worthy the consideration of the Treasury whether the salaries of these Assistant Inspectors should not be commenced at £200 a year in order that a better and more experienced class of men may be obtained. Their Reports would not display such ignorance as they do at present, and would have more effect on elementary teachers than they now have.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 135.—(Div. List, No. 306.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. Hunter

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL (No. 372).

Consideration of the Lords' Amendment.

Question proposed, "That the House do proceed with the consideration of the Lords' Amendments."

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope the House will allow me to state the course which, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield, I propose to take with reference to these Amendments. The Amendments are bulky, apparently, in size, but they are easily divisible into three classes—verbal Amendments, Amendments of procedure, and Amendments in substance. So far as the verbal Amendments and Amendments in procedure are concerned, they have been inserted in the Bill mainly at the instance and under the supervision of Lord Herschell and with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, and I think the House may be content to accept these improvements of verbal phraseology and procedure without discussion. There might, of course, be some criticism possible on the procedure Amendments; but I would exceedingly deprecate any friend of the Bill raising a question of that kind. That brings me to the three Amendments in substance which the House of Lords have made in this Bill. The first is in reference to the hours in which children are to be allowed to sell newspapers and other articles in the streets. As the Bill left this House, the hours after which children were not to be employed in the streets were fixed at 10 o'clock at night in summer and 8 o'clock in winter. The House of Lords has thought fit to fix 10 o'clock as the hour all the year round. Some objection might, no doubt, be made to this alteration; but it must be borne in mind that power is reserved to the Local Authority to further extend or restrict the hours, and those of us who are anxious that this clause should work with as little friction as possible will be satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Local Authority. The next Amendment of substance is with regard to the position of a wife in regard to giving evidence against her husband. As the Bill left this House it provided that the wife should be a competent and compellable witness. The House of Lords has seen fit to alter that; and as the amended clause was drawn by Lord Herschell, I think the words are entitled to great weight. What is now proposed is that the wife shall be required to attend the Court and be competent as a witness; but, upon her refusal to give evidence, shall not be compellable. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, and I should be sorry to express any dogmatic opinion. When men of the eminence of Lord Herschell and the Lord Chancellor think this the most desirable manner of dealing with this point, I do not think it would be well to ask the House of Commons to disagree with the Amendment. That brings me to the third, and really the only, substantial alteration that has been made in this Bill, and that is with reference to the licensing of children under 10 years of age for theatrical performances. The House will recollect that we carried by large majorities, both in Committee and on the Report, a provision that no child under 10 should, under any circumstances, be allowed to sing or play for profit, either in a theatre or in a circus. We applied the Factory Act to theatrical performances. I am not going to justify what the House did on that occasion; but the alteration which the House of Lords has made is this—although it leaves the clause precisely as it was with reference to children under seven years of age, as to children between 7 and 10, power is given to a Petty Sessional Court to grant licenses for such employment. No Magistrate would be able to grant a license at his residence; it must be done in a public Petty Sessional Court, and the license will be subject to such conditions and restrictions as the Court may think fit to impose. Now, I regret that Amendment; but we have to deal with this matter as practical men. I would not only ask the House to attach some weight to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield, but I would also urge them to accept that of a gentleman who is largely responsible for the outside opinion which has produced this Bill—I mean the Rev. Mr. Waugh. I think, too, I have some claim to be heard on this question; for when it was originally proposed to exempt theatrical performances from the operation of the Bill, I led the revolt. Of course, my sympathy goes in the direction of extending this clause as far as possible; but, looking to the state of public business and the fact that this Amendment had the support of Her Majesty's Government in the other House and that they are not likely to assent to its abandonment, I would urge that these Amendments be assented to. I do not wish to reflect in any way on the action of the Government. I think, as a matter of common justice, that if this passes into law, all of us who are deeply interested in it will be very much indebted not only to the First Lord of the Treasury, but also to the Attorney General, without whose assistance the Bill could not have been passed this Session. Therefore I am not reflecting on the action of the Government when I say I am persuaded that the majority of this House would decline to upset this compromise. If this Amendment is not agreed to by the House of Commons, the result will be a wrangle between the two Houses and the inevitable loss of the measure. Under these circumstances, having regard to the fact that this is a vexed question upon which many people just as philanthropic as ourselves take different views, and that a fair compromise has been obtained, I hope that the House will, as a matter of wise and judicious policy, agree with the Amendment, and thus permit the Bill, which will be a great boon to the children of this country, to become law without any further delay.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords' Amendments, considered.

On Amendment with regard to the employment of children in theatres,

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I ask the indulgence of the House while I make a few remarks on this question. I have a very strong feeling about the mistake which, in my humble judgment, the House of Lords have made in introducing this particular Amendment; and I deeply regret the course that the House of Lords has adopted. Still I recognise the enormous advantages of the Bill, even as amended, and I will not take the responsibility of any risk of delaying its passing, and am therefore prepared to agree with the Lords' Amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe also desires me to state that he will not move the Amendment standing in his name. And now I wish the House to allow me to say a few words on the moral question. I used words in this House on a recent occasion which I wish to withdraw. They are incapable of absolute proof. There is a great difference of opinion on the matter, and I find the statement is considered exaggerated by many persons who are as likely to be right as those on whose information I based it. As my words caused a great deal of pain to virtuous girls who follow this employment, I wish to withdraw the words I used to the effect "that the great majority, when they ended their dancing days, entered upon lives on the streets." I wish to withdraw publicly what I said publicly; but, at the same time, I do not desire to withdraw my grave protest against this door being specially opened to little girls to enter a profession full of danger to their purity and morality. With regard to this Amendment, I may add that, though it is agreed to at present, it will not prevent the fight from being renewed and carried on until the labour of all children under 10 years is, without exception, prohibited.

Lords' Amendments agreed to.

COTTON CLOTH FACTORIES BILL.

(No. 366.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE SITES BILL. (No. 244.)

Reported from the Select Committee.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 323.]

Mr. Winterbotham

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for to-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 377.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House do now adjourn."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In accordance with the promise I made early in the afternoon, I desire now to state what will be the course of business. To-morrow we propose to take Classes IV. and V. of the Civil Service Estimates, and as soon after 11 o'clock as possible progress will be reported to enable the Report of the Irish Vote for the Resident Magistrates to be taken.

MR. SEXTON: When will the remaining Irish Votes be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government are anxious to consult the convenience of hon. Gentlemen as to the order of the Irish Vote. I propose to take the Vote for the Land Commission next, and the remaining Votes in their order, if that suits hon. Gentlemen from Ireland.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): Is it intended to have a Saturday Sitting?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That must depend on the course of business to-morrow. I am sure the House is desirous of coming to a conclusion with public business as rapidly as possible, and without appealing to the House, or any section of it, to take any business to which they have strong objection, I think it may be necessary to ask hon. Members to sit on Saturday for business which may not be strenuously opposed.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Will the Tithe Bill be taken on Friday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes; that is our intention.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it would not meet the views of all sections of the House to drop the Tithes Bill?

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at one minute before Six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*LORD DENMAN, in moving "That Standing Order No. XXXIII. be suspended until an adjournment for more than two days, or until a prorogation," said, that he did not anticipate much opposition to the Motion, because in consequence of the House not being full enough to sustain a Division it had been necessary to throw over business for a day, in the case of one Bill which had to be re committed, which was inconvenient.

*VISCOUNT CROSS did not think there had been any cause shown for this Motion, as no difficulty of the kind referred to had arisen.

On Question, resolved in the negative.

PRIVATE BILLS (ALTERATION OF MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION.)

Report from the Select Committee considered (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: I have to present to your Lordships the Report of the Joint Committee appointed by your Lordships' House and the other House to consider the subject of Bills which involved alterations in the Memoranda of Association of Joint Stock Companies. Your Lordships will remember that the appointment of the Committee arose out of the circumstance that a Bill which had been read a second time and passed in the other House, with the sanction of the Chairman of Committees, in this House did not pass the Second Reading, inasmuch as it was thought that the matter should be considered and dealt with how far Joint Stock Companies registered under the Act of 1862 ought to be permitted to invoke the aid of Parliament to alter their Memoranda of Association. Accordingly, a Joint Committee of both Houses was appointed in order that some uniform system might be laid down applicable to both Houses. I have now to present their Report. They recommend, in the first place, general legislation to enable companies without the necessity of resorting to Parliament, under strictly defined conditions and limitations, which are specified in the Report, to make alterations in their Memoranda of Association with the sanction of the Court, giving full opportunity to all those whose interests might be affected to be heard, and to show cause against any such alteration, and leaving the matter (subject to any opposition) to the determination of the Court. But the Committee, feeling that until any such general legislation is passed it would not be right that there should be an absolute barrier to companies obtaining an alteration of their memoranda, suggest that Parliament should, in the meantime, deal with the matter upon the same lines as those which they propose the Court should deal with it hereafter in the case of general legislation—that is to say, that the alteration, if it involves the creation of new objects, should be only permitted where those objects are cognate with, or ancillary to, the existing objects, and where the necessity has arisen or the application is based upon circumstances which have developed themselves since the time the company was originally formed. I think that with the limitations which have been laid down by the Committee, and which will now have the sanction of a Committee of both Houses, the matter may be safely left in the way they have suggested. I, therefore, move that your Lordships do agree with the Report.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: I should like to say one or two words on this subject, as the action which I took with regard to the Belgrano Gas Company Bill (which is again down for Second Reading to-night) led to the appointment of this Committee. When that Bill first came before your Lordships' House I felt, as my noble Friend has stated, that there were no precedents which would allow me to pass that Bill without the knowledge of Parliament, and, therefore, I was extremely glad, after the Second Reading of the Bill had been suspended, that a Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject generally, and to lay down rules for the guidance of Committees of this and of the other House of Parliament in cases where companies desired to alter their Memorandum of Association. I had the honour of serving on that Joint Committee, and I entirely endorse what fell from my noble and learned Friend Lord Herschell. I think that under the conditions laid down in that Report the House may safely allow these alterations in the Memorandum of Association of companies under special circumstances as described in those conditions. But, my Lords, I venture to express the hope that the general legislation which is suggested in that Report will not be delayed longer than is necessary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: This is a very wide subject, and I am very doubtful whether in the present condition of affairs it would be altogether right to assume that these recommendations of the Committee are in accord with the general opinion of Members of your Lordships' House. It must be remembered that the subject with which one is dealing is one very important, indeed, to almost every Member of the State. People embark in a particular company, and they have their views for so doing, and they very often take shares as an investment, and they are responsible for any calls that are made. Of course, I am referring, when I talk of companies, to what is now almost universal, the turning of various businesses into limited liability companies. People might or might not have adopted the sort of view that they could at all events, without risk to themselves and their future fortunes, invest in a particular speculation. It is now suggested that under certain conditions (what they are I do not at this moment know) the objects with which the company was started may be changed. I do not know whether the Committee recommend that the shareholders should be consulted. In the particular case which has given rise to this Committee it was a very strong case. Practically, every shareholder had given his assent to the change. There was also the question of rival companies, and the rival companies that might have been supposed to be interested in this matter had also not only given their consent, but I think urged that the alteration of the Memorandum of Association should be permitted. Therefore, I am not speaking at all in reference to the Motion which the Chairman of Committees is about to make for the Second Reading of the Belgrano Gas Bill; but I wish to guard myself against being supposed to adopt the general view put forward by both the noble Lords who have addressed your Lordships. I think it may well be that merely to afford opportunity to some shareholder or creditor or rival company to come forward and oppose, would or might not be sufficient guarantee, because everybody who is connected with companies—at least who has had to deal with them in judicial matters—knows perfectly well that what is everybody's business in such matters is certainly nobody's business, and many persons will allow things to be done because they will not take the trouble to interfere, and they might be grievously wronged by being compelled to enter into business of which they had no notion at the time they became shareholders. I do not, of course, wish at all to speak in an adverse view of this Report, which is entitled to the respect which is due to a Report considered by those noble Lords and hon. Members of the other House who formed this Committee. All I wish to do at present, having had no opportunity of considering this Report, is to guard myself against being supposed to adopt all its recommendations, and reserve to myself the right of discussing the matter in another Session.

Report agreed to.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>."—(The Earl of Morley).

*THE EARL OF CRAWFORD: I do not rise to oppose the Third Reading of this Bill, nor shall I oppose the other Electric Lighting Provisional Orders Bills which are on the Paper; but I wish to say that, although very great care has been exercised in the drawing up of these Bills, still I have no doubt whatsoever that in a certain time we shall have to come to you again for amendments in certain portions of the Bills. The parts that I refer to are those dealing with the meter clauses and the testing clauses which, in my opinion and that of those who have had anything to do with electric lighting, are absolutely unworkable. The whole of them were drawn up in the year 1883, within a year of the commencement of legislation on this subject. They have been copied verbatim almost into the present Orders. We—I speak now for those who are undertakers under the Bill—have at no time attempted to modify them in any way, simply because no person knows how to modify them. They are quite unworkable, and although great care has been disposed upon them, I think it right at this stage to say that they must not be regarded as final.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK: I presume my noble Friend will not expect me to make any remarks on what he has said. He will remember that these were opposed Bills; that they were considered in the Private Bill Committee of your Lordships' House, of which I had the honour to be Chairman. I believe I may say that this question of meter was not raised before the Committee, and I think, as my noble Friend says, it is a question for the future.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order) and passed and sent to the Commons.

POOR LAW BILL (No. 195)

Amendments reported (according to order); further Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> to-morrow.

PALATINE COURT OF DURHAM BILL
(No. 71.)

Commons Amendments considered (according to order), and agreed to, with Amendments; and Bill returned to the Commons.

OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL (No. 112.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order); Bill reported without further Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> to-morrow.

PAYMASTER GENERAL BILL (No. 203.)

Amendment reported (according to order); and Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> to-morrow.

REVENUE BILL (No. 209.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and passed.

OFFICE OF THE CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS AND OFFICE OF THE GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD.

Second Report from the Select Committee considered (according to order).

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: I think it right that I should make a few remarks upon the Report of the Committee on the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, because it contains matter that is of rather more importance than these Reports usually contain. The House will probably remember that early last Session a Sub-Committee of the Black Rod Committee was appointed with a view to inquire into the emoluments and salaries of the officers of the House. That Committee did not report last year, but the Sub-Committee's Report is embodied in the Report which now lays on your Lordships' Table. I do not think it will be necessary for me to go through the Report in detail. It has been in your Lordships' hands for some days, and perhaps it will be sufficient for me if I mention what are the leading changes recommended. To sum the matter up, the changes will probably in time effect an economy of nearly £7,000 a year in the establishments of the House, but I should say that these changes are not intended to affect, and will not affect, any present occupier of any post. It is only intended that they should come into effect as vacancies occur in those posts, the object being to reduce the salaries of certain officers. The economies chiefly effected, I should say, are in the Department of the Usher of the Black Rod, and to some extent in the Department of the Clerk of the Parliaments. The whole of these economies will be seen briefly in the Table appended to the Report. I think that what I have said is sufficient to show your Lordships that the Report has been prepared with considerable care, as the Committee has sat many times; and I trust that it may satisfy critics in another place, who have of late years criticised the Estimates for the House of Lords Offices. If there are any questions which any noble Lord wishes to put to me, I will be happy, to the best of my ability, to answer them; but I think I have explained the object of this Report sufficiently, and I now beg to move that it be agreed to.

*LORD DENMAN: It is a great satisfaction to me to see that existing holders are not to be disturbed in the positions which they hold; and I hope that a future Parliament may not be so illiberally disposed as this Report shows the present to be. My respected predecessor relinquished £4,000 a year of his salary and patronage. The Earl of Ellenborough used to say that his father received £14,000 a year, and that he gloried in doing nothing. I can only tell you that for six years my father granted me a large income—more than the fees amounted to—and he was obliged to maintain me in "that comely Portland Place," as Lord Beaconsfield calls it in his last novel, for six years, and if ever there was an ill-used man on the face of the earth, that man was the Lord Chief Justice. It was said to me by one of the ushers of the Court (who went Circuit with the Lord Chief Justice), "The respect shown to Lord Campbell in comparison with your father is as the 'antipodes' of light to darkness." I believe it was the truth that never a more independent Judge sat upon the Bench; and his salary was taken away from him within seven years after it was declared by Parliament; so that he and his family were actually robbed. In this case there is notice given, but it must be extremely unpleasant to the holders of the present places to see that what they have is grudged them by anticipated reforms on the part of those persons who, if they came into this House, might accept the title of Lord Clotures.

Report considered (according to Order), and agreed to.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FITZGERALD, in rising to ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government will take into consideration during the coming Parliamentary Recess the question of constituting an effective Court of Appeal in criminal cases tried in the Superior Courts of criminal jurisdiction or at Quarter Sessions; and, if deemed expedient, present a measure to Parliament during the next Session to effect that object, said: I have to apologise for bringing this matter before your Lordships in relation to the constitution of a Court of Appeal in criminal cases—I mean a Court of Appeal upon the merits, but if your Lordships will refer to the Notice which I have put down you will perceive that it is not calculated nor intended to provoke unnecessary discussion upon the subject, and I do not at all intend to revert to the very prominent case which recently occurred in Liverpool, and which has forced upon the public mind the necessity of considering this question of a Court of Criminal Appeal. Your Lordships may have seen a letter of very considerable ability in the Times of Monday last. It is from Mr. Fletcher Moulton, an eminent Queen's Counsel, and he shows in it a great deal of scientific knowledge, and argues his case most logically. He says:—

“So long as the constitution of our Courts prevents all appeal in criminal cases, even of the gravest kind, it seems both just and natural that the results of such a trial as that of Mrs. Maybrick for the murder of her husband should be made the subject of close public criticism.”

I do not intend now to criticise or observe on that case at all, save to deprecate the renewal or continuation of what I may call tumultuous discussion and proceedings out of Court, calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt, to withdraw from it the veneration and affectionate respect with which it has been ever regarded in England, and I will add also, if it will have any effect whatever upon the case of the unfortunate woman now in gaol, it may be an effect to her prejudice, and can do her no good. My Lords, the broad proposition cannot be controverted that there is no appeal whatsoever provided by the English law in criminal cases upon the merits. I use the expression “upon the merits,” for I mean the merits both of law and fact; but perhaps it would be better to say that there is no appeal whatever upon questions of fact. The Judge at the trial may have gone wrong; he may have misconstrued the evidence; he may have misdirected the Jury; the Jury themselves may have taken the most unsound view of the facts of the case, and that unsound view may have led them to a conviction; but for all that there is no appeal; you can have no new trial; there is no mode of bringing the misdirection under control, or under appeal, and in fact (and it is a fact beyond doubt or controversy) with reference to criminal cases we have allowed life and liberty to depend entirely and unprotected upon the decision of the primary Court. I may remind your Lordships that though there is no appeal whatever on questions of fact, there is an appeal on questions of law; a twofold appeal, although in each instance of a very unsatisfactory character; but if that were the only subject of complaint, it would not justify me in coming forward on the present occasion, because, although the appeal in law is defective, yet the appeals on questions of law are very few, and are disposed of in the course of a year by two sittings, I think, for two days only, of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. They are defective in this respect, that when the appeal is not by Writ of Error, it rests entirely in the discretion of the Judge whether he will reserve any question of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. However, confining my present observations to the absence of an appeal on the merits, I have heard it said that, notwithstanding that singular defect in our criminal jurisprudence, the whole thing has worked satisfactorily, and there is no necessity for the constitution of such a Court. If we look to the cases that have taken place, I think it will be found that that observation is not well founded, and that the contrary is really the fact. I may refer to one or two cases to show your Lordships the proceedings that take place, and how unconstitutional they are. In the case of Lord Dundonald, in 1814, he was convicted of a conspiracy to commit fraud with three or four others, and he was sentenced to fine, imprisonment, and the pillory. I always thought that case a disgrace to criminal jurisprudence in England. In his autobiography he says—

“This vindictive sentence of the pillory the Government did not dare to carry out. My high-minded colleague, Sir Francis Burdett, told the Government that if the sentence was carried into effect, he would stand beside me on the pillory, and they must look to the consequences.”

The result of that intimation was that the Government, though anxious to carry out the sentence to the fullest extent, abandoned the pillory, and after a not very long interval, Lord Dundonald's innocence was fully established, not by the Home Secretary, but by independent inquiry. He was restored to all the honours of which he had been deprived, and I myself have often had the pleasure and the honour of seeing him in attendance upon the Queen as one of the officers of the Court. Another remarkable case was that of Mr. Barber, a solicitor, who was convicted of forging a will, or being a party to the forging of a will, and was sentenced to transportation. Four years afterwards he was permitted to return to England with a full acknowledgment of his innocence. In 1850 the House of Commons voted him, by way of compensation, the sum of £5,000. Now all that injury, and all that expense, would have been avoided if there had been a competent Court of Appeal upon the facts of the case. A case always referred to in reference to this desirability of a Court of Criminal Appeal is the case of Dr. Smethurst, who was convicted of the murder of Isabella, his bigamous wife. A Petition was presented to the Home Secretary of the time, and he instituted an inquiry; I believe he even took the step of an independent examination into the case by experts; but the result was to show that the whole proceeding against Dr. Smethurst had been a mistake; that his bigamous wife was not poisoned by arsenic as represented, but that she died of natural causes. His innocence was completely established to the satisfaction of Sir Cornwall Lewis, the then Home Secretary. I think the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was one of the counsel in the case, and he will remember that one of the ludicrous mistakes made by the Judge at the trial was to point out, as the motive in reference to which Dr. Smethurst was attacked, that he succeeded to all the property of the lady who was said to be poisoned. She did make a will in his favour, but it was after the illness had commenced which was supposed to be the result of poisoning; so that the view of the Judge that this was a very important feature in the case was that he first poisoned the woman, and then afterwards got her to make a will in his favour. All that would have been avoided had there been a proper Court to enter into and determine the case. Then, again, I may remind the noble Lord opposite of a case that occurred when he was Home Secretary, and which was known as the Penge murder. Five persons were convicted of murder, and left for execution. As to one of them, there was not a particle of evidence beyond that she had led an immoral life. There was nothing else in the case. Upon my noble Friend's examination she was at once—not reprieved, but absolutely discharged; and upon consideration of the remainder of the cases the four persons who were left by the learned Judge for execution, and without any hope whatever, had their sentences commuted, and they were sent to penal servitude.

*Viscount CROSS: My noble Friend, I think, has not quite correctly stated the facts with regard to the last case that he mentioned. The woman who was reprieved was allowed to go on this ground. The question was whether it was murder or manslaughter—it was a case of killing by neglect, and I thought that it was a case of manslaughter. This woman was charged as an accessory before the fact, and she could hardly be guilty of being an accessory before the fact of manslaughter. It was on that ground that she was acquitted.

Lord Fitzgerald

LORD FITZGERALD: However, I am quite right in stating that the sentences on the other persons were commuted, on the ground that it was manslaughter if anything, and not murder. But Alice Rhodes had no connection with the bad treatment which the woman received: she had no duty to perform towards her: she happened to be the paramour of one of the parties, and her previous life was the only circumstance upon which she was convicted as in conspiracy with the other parties. Possibly I may have fallen into error, and I am glad to have been corrected by the noble Lord, for I am only speaking from recollection as to what took place on the occasion. These, my Lords, are but three out of a hundred cases that I could have cited for your Lordships' information. It cannot be said that a system which allows of such cases is at all satisfactory; in fact, it has been for years condemned, and condemned by successive Governments. A Commission sat in 1878, composed of very able men. Lord Blackburn, I think, presided over that Commission; Mr. Justice Montagu Smith was another of its members; the present Mr. Justice Stephen was one also, and Lord Justice Barry, of the Court of Appeal in Ireland, represented Ireland upon the occasion. Their conclusion was unanimous, that this blot upon the criminal jurisdiction in England, which did not exist in any other civilised country, ought to be removed; and they actually went so far as to state in detail in the Report which was presented to Parliament the measure that ought to be taken for the purpose of remedying this crying evil. In addition, Sir John Holker, the then Attorney General, and Mr. Justice Stephen, between them prepared a Bill, which was presented to Parliament in 1878; and I believe again, in 1880, the Government of which Lord Herschell was Solicitor General took up the subject, but the Bill was not carried through. Recent circumstances have forced this question upon our attention, and it is in remarkable contrast that whilst life and property are thus left disregarded, and entirely at the mercy of the primary tribunal, we cautiously protect and regard the civil rights of property. I may instance to your Lordships that within the last year a case came before this House in which the whole sum in controversy between the parties was £11. No doubt it involved consequences beyond that, but not beyond that to the parties who litigated it. It commenced in the County Court; the County Court Judge gave the plaintiff a decree; the defendant appealed to the Divisional Court, and the County Court Judge was reversed. The plaintiff then appealed to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal decided in his favour. Again it was brought before this House; it was argued here for three days, and finally the noble Lords who had charge of the case were upon one point divided in opinion, but upon the merits they disposed of the case affirming the Judgment of the Court of Appeal. Again I may refer your Lordships to Indian cases. One of Her Majesty's subjects in India commences a suit in which the sum in controversy is 500 rupees; he is entitled to carry it through all the various Courts of Appeal that exist there, and finally to come to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and sometimes he succeeds in reversing all that has gone before, and turning various defeats into victory. My Lords, the subject—I do not conceal from myself—is one of very great difficulty; but the difficulties are not insuperable; and all I am seeking now to get from the noble Lord opposite is an assurance that Her Majesty's Government will consider this question during the Recess, and, if they consider it practicable and advisable, that they will be prepared in the next Session to introduce a measure upon the subject. Let me for a moment consider what takes place under the present system when there is an appeal to Her Majesty from any criminal conviction. In some cases it is not an appeal for mercy, because an appeal for mercy, for leniency, for the reduction of a sentence, is one based on the supposition that the conviction is right; and there you go to the Queen in the exercise of her prerogative of mercy, advised by the Home Secretary, to either reduce the sentence or in some way to reduce the punishment, which you consider excessive, within more lenient limits. But there are other cases like the case of Dr. Smethurst and the case of Lord Cochrane, where the appeal was not for mercy, but was for the re-consideration of the whole case in as good as have Assistant Inspectors, and, therefore, there is no promotion. Not only that, but I find that 180 of the teachers in Scotland have salaries above £100, which is the maximum salary of the Sub-inspectors. My objection is that Assistant Inspectors are under-paid and over-worked, and that in point of fact it is a mere subterfuge to pretend that teachers ought to be Inspectors, while you practically deny them the valuable appointments which are given to those who have not their qualifications. I should say that no man ought to be appointed an Inspector or a Sub-inspector who has not been seven years a teacher in an elementary school. From that class, and that class alone, ought Inspectors to be taken; and, moreover, there ought only to be two grades. I think the work is the same in all cases, and the pay ought to be the same.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): In Scotland I find they have some £25,000 as pay for 40 or 50 Inspectors, while in Ireland we have 83 Inspectors receiving only £30,000. I sympathise with the Motion of the hon. Gentleman and with his object to make the appointments of Inspectors from the class of persons who have had practical training in teaching.

DR. CLARK: The Assistant Inspectors who do the work of examining schools begin at £150 a year, and the consequence is that you get young and inexperienced men to review and examine the work of teachers who are receiving double their pay, and who have had 20 years' experience. It is a matter worthy the consideration of the Treasury whether the salaries of these Assistant Inspectors should not be commenced at £200 a year in order that a better and more experienced class of men may be obtained. Their Reports would not display such ignorance as they do at present, and would have more effect on elementary teachers than they now have.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 103; Noes 135.—(Div. List, No. 306.)

Original Question again proposed.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Edmund Robertson,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO AND PROTECTION OF CHILDREN BILL (No. 372).

Consideration of the Lords' Amendment.

Question proposed, "That the House do proceed with the consideration of the Lords' Amendments."

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope the House will allow me to state the course which, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield, I propose to take with reference to these Amendments. The Amendments are bulky, apparently, in size, but they are easily divisible into three classes—verbal Amendments, Amendments of procedure, and Amendments in substance. So far as the verbal Amendments and Amendments in procedure are concerned, they have been inserted in the Bill mainly at the instance and under the supervision of Lord Herschell and with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, and I think the House may be content to accept these improvements of verbal phraseology and procedure without discussion. There might, of course, be some criticism possible on the procedure Amendments; but I would exceedingly deprecate any friend of the Bill raising a question of that kind. That brings me to the three Amendments in substance which the House of Lords have made in this Bill. The first is in reference to the hours in which children are to be allowed to sell newspapers and other articles in the streets. As the Bill left this House, the hours after which children were not to be employed in the streets were fixed at 10 o'clock at night in summer and 8 o'clock in winter. The House of Lords has thought fit to fix 10 o'clock as the hour all the year round. Some objection might, no doubt, be made to this alteration; but it must be borne in mind that power is reserved to the Local Authority to further extend or restrict the hours, and those of us who are anxious that this clause should work with as little friction as possible will be satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Local Authority. The next Amendment of substance is with regard to the position of a wife in regard to giving evidence against her husband. As the Bill left this House it provided that the wife should be a competent and compellable witness. The House of Lords has seen fit to alter that; and as the amended clause was drawn by Lord Herschell, I think the words are entitled to great weight. What is now proposed is that the wife shall be required to attend the Court and be competent as a witness; but, upon her refusal to give evidence, shall not be compellable. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, and I should be sorry to express any dogmatic opinion. When men of the eminence of Lord Herschell and the Lord Chancellor think this the most desirable manner of dealing with this point, I do not think it would be well to ask the House of Commons to disagree with the Amendment. That brings me to the third, and really the only, substantial alteration that has been made in this Bill, and that is with reference to the licensing of children under 10 years of age for theatrical performances. The House will recollect that we carried by large majorities, both in Committee and on the Report, a provision that no child under 10 should, under any circumstances, be allowed to sing or play for profit, either in a theatre or in a circus. We applied the Factory Act to theatrical performances. I am not going to justify what the House did on that occasion; but the alteration which the House of Lords has made is this—although it leaves the clause precisely as it was with reference to children under seven years of age, as to children between 7 and 10, power is given to a Petty Sessional Court to grant licenses for such employment. No Magistrate would be able to grant a license at his residence; it must be done in a public Petty Sessional Court, and the license will be subject to such conditions and restrictions as the Court may think fit to impose. Now, I regret that Amendment; but we have to deal with this matter as practical men. I would not only ask the House to attach some weight to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield, but I would also urge them to accept that of a gentleman who is largely responsible for the outside opinion which has produced this Bill—I mean the Rev. Mr. Waugh. I think, too, I have some claim to be heard on this question; for when it was originally proposed to exempt theatrical performances from the operation of the Bill, I led the revolt. Of course, my sympathy goes in the direction of extending this clause as far as possible; but, looking to the state of public business and the fact that this Amendment had the support of Her Majesty's Government in the other House and that they are not likely to assent to its abandonment, I would urge that these Amendments be assented to. I do not wish to reflect in any way on the action of the Government. I think, as a matter of common justice, that if this passes into law, all of us who are deeply interested in it will be very much indebted not only to the First Lord of the Treasury, but also to the Attorney General, without whose assistance the Bill could not have been passed this Session. Therefore I am not reflecting on the action of the Government when I say I am persuaded that the majority of this House would decline to upset this compromise. If this Amendment is not agreed to by the House of Commons, the result will be a wrangle between the two Houses and the inevitable loss of the measure. Under these circumstances, having regard to the fact that this is a vexed question upon which many people just as philanthropic as ourselves take different views, and that a fair compromise has been obtained, I hope that the House will, as a matter of wise and judicious policy, agree with the Amendment, and thus permit the Bill, which will be a great boon to the children of this country, to become law without any further delay.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords' Amendments, considered.

On Amendment with regard to the employment of children in theatres,

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I ask the indulgence of mind. But, at the same time, one must remember that in this country it too often happens that it is impossible to obtain attention to the necessity of any particular reform except when the public mind is excited on the subject and by reason of that excitement. If there is no such excitement, a reform of this character, which is not one likely to arouse any great popular feeling, is only too likely to be allowed to sleep, even if it be a desirable one. It seems to me that there are reasons other than those given by my noble and learned Friend—namely, the time of the year and the state of the House—which render it impossible to discuss the question exhaustively at the present moment. I would, however, like to say that it seems to me that this question of the expediency of establishing a Court of Criminal Appeal is one which might well be considered independently of and without reference to the case now occupying public attention, and for this reason, that those who differ diametrically in their views of this particular case may yet be agreed that it would be better if some tribunal existed which would render possible a review of criminal cases. Such a tribunal might go far to arrest, or at any rate diminish, those manifestations of opinion to which the noble and learned Lord has alluded. I do not mean to say that it would be likely to get rid of such manifestations altogether, because there are many persons who would be quite as ready to criticise the decision of a Court of Appeal, however ably constituted, as they now appear to be to criticise, often with very little knowledge or consideration, the decision of a Judge and jury. I certainly entertain the view most strongly that any decision of a Court of Justice, whether it be the decision of a Judge and jury, or of any other tribunal, may be rightly made the subject of public criticism. It is the right of the public to criticise. But those who undertake the task of criticism have a serious duty incumbent on them to be very careful to inform themselves as to all the facts, and exhibit that modesty and self-control which every one should exhibit who differs from those who have seriously considered and solemnly decided any question. While I admit this right of public criticism, I must say that a good deal of language has been recently used which I must unite with my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack in deprecating. There appears to have been in the minds of some persons a difficulty in distinguishing between criticism and abuse. These persons, possibly more wisely, possibly more foolishly, have arrived at a different conclusion to that arrived at by those who decided this case, and they have on that account indulged in condemnation, execration, and abuse of them, thus exhibiting a state of mind very far removed from that which can produce any wholesome, and useful, and sound criticism. I do not propose to say more than a word or two on the subject that has been brought forward. I have long thought that some change in the direction suggested was necessary and desirable. I admit the difficulties of the question; but it has always appeared to me to be indefensible that while in civil cases, however small, there should be a right of appeal, in criminal cases there should be none. I do not, however, share the view apparently entertained by my noble and learned Friend that the existence of such a Court would prevent the occurrence of erroneous convictions. There are cases in which wrong convictions are obtained, but I believe that this occurs but seldom. I have had a good deal of experience in Criminal Courts, and have watched the administration of justice there with some care, and I believe that it is but seldom though I do not of Criminal set right many before the Affirmation Appeal and it that at least of just together that as secure person where believe of a cases t ferred I am by no means certain that, if the conviction had been reviewed at the time, the conviction would have been altered. I do not think that it would be right to expect as much from the creation of a Court of Appeal as appears to be expected by my noble Friend. At the same time, for the reasons I have given, I hope that the matter will be seriously considered by the Government during the Recess, because undoubtedly there is a widespread feeling that it is not just that in the administration of our Criminal Law alone should be the one decision which is incapable of review, and I believe that any solution of this case with due and satisfactory safeguards would give a general feeling of satisfaction and security to the community.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, during the time that I had the honour of holding the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department my attention was naturally enough called very much to this question, and I shall be prepared to state my views to your Lordships when the matter comes up for discussion; but I agree with my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack that this is not the best opportunity that might have been chosen. I merely rise for the purpose of making two observations. I quite agree with the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down that whatever Court of Appeal may be established you must not expect too much from it. I am not at all certain whether prisoners do not get better treated in the way of getting their sentences remitted or reduced under the present system at the hands of the Home Secretary than they would receive from any Court of Appeal. The Secretary of State is always guided by the view that considerations of mercy, so far as they can be resorted to consistently with justice, should not be lost sight of, and prisoners get the advantage of this view, which they would not get from a strictly legal Court of Appeal. The only other observation I wish to make is this—that whether a Court of Appeal is established or not, it will be absolutely necessary that the prerogative of mercy in the Crown should still be maintained, and not simply as to the diminution of punishment as suggested by the noble and learned Lord who brought forward this discussion, but also as to the question of innocence or guilt; because there is no doubt that it does sometimes happen that, perhaps years after the supposed offence has been committed and the man has been convicted, something is brought to light which shows that that conviction is an error which no Court of Appeal could by any possibility have taken consideration of, and for which there is no remedy except in the prerogative of mercy which must rest in the Crown administered on the advice of the responsible Minister at the Home Office. I know that there is a feeling that that administration of justice by a single Minister is not satisfactory, but in the nature of things it must remain, and the principal reason of my rising to address your Lordships was that I might correct a feeling which is wide-spread upon that point. I think it ought to be clearly understood that, Court of Appeal or no, the exercise of the prerogative of mercy by the Crown must be maintained for the benefit of the liberty of the subject.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, the misfortune of the present day is, that the evidence for the prosecutor is published; and perhaps for two or three days the whole public are judging the case beforehand, which is certainly prejudicial to the prisoner. My brother has always sat later than almost any other Judge in order, as far as possible, to avoid this. Speaking to me about a Court of Criminal Appeal he said that the noble Viscount who has just sat down was the best Home Secretary that he had ever had to deal with. I have witnessed the struggles of the present Home Secretary in the case of an unfortunate Jew, who afterwards confessed that he was guilty. The pressure that was put upon the Home Secretary was something extraordinary; and I am quite certain that until we can see clearly a much better system than the present, we had much better not cast a slur upon the existing authority. I am quite sure that if the present Home Secretary will consult with the noble Lord and with Lord Cranbrook, who formerly held the same office, you would have a better Court of Criminal Appeal than any formal Cour de Cassation could possibly be.

LORD FITZGERALD: I know I am not in order in again speaking, but I am sure your Lordships will give me indulgence to say a word or two in what

I may call self-defence. I commence by saying that I agree with every word that has been spoken by Viscount Cross. Now, my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has thought it necessary to read me rather a severe lecture for the indiscretion I have shown upon this particular occasion. He seems to have forgotten that I commenced by deprecating any discussion of, and that I told the House that I should not make a single observation or comment upon, the case that now occupies public attention save to deprecate the tumultuous proceedings which have taken place, which were injurious to the very unfortunate person whom they were intended to serve. And all through the course of the few observations that I made your Lordships will recollect that I adhered to what I said at the commencement, and not a word dropped from me in reference to the case now pending. My noble Friend has said that discussion of any kind upon the present occasion is indiscreet. Now, my notice was put upon the Paper on Monday last; and the noble and learned Lord knows me well enough to know that if he had conveyed to me the slightest hint that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, or in his individual opinion, the discussion was injudicious, I should have been the last one to press it forward. I should have left everything that I have said unsaid, and withdrawn the notice I had given. But I received no such intimation. I cannot conceive, notwithstanding all that I have heard from my noble and learned Friend upon the Woolsack, that I have been guilty of any indiscretion. My question points, not to the present but to the future—to something that is to be done by the Government during the Recess in order to remedy what is a grave and patent error. I wish only to add that the answer of my noble and learned Friend upon the Woolsack on the part of the Government has been so highly unsatisfactory—holding out no hope even of consideration—that, driven into a corner, if it become necessary, and should I be (to use an Irish expression) “to the fore here,” I will even undertake the introduction of a Bill myself on the subject, though possibly I will receive little support from Her Majesty's Government.

ELECTRICAL LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (METROPOLIS) INQUIRY.

*THE EARL OF CRAWFORD, in rising to move—

“That the Minutes of Evidence and Proceedings in the local inquiry on the Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (Metropolis), held by Major Marinden, R.E., by direction of the Board of Trade, be laid before the House,” said: I gave notice of this Motion two or three days ago for this reason—that upon this evidence has practically been based the action of the Board of Trade in bringing forward and promoting the Electric Lighting Bills which your Lordships have read this evening a third time. There has naturally been a very great desire by all those interested in this new branch of industry to obtain the facilities of seeing the evidence and of knowing thoroughly what went on during the 18 days that Major Marinden sat hearing the evidence. I am sorry to say that I have received a courteous letter from the Board of Trade saying that although they have no objection from a Departmental point of view, nevertheless the evidence, such as it is, is very voluminous; and therefore they think it desirable that it should not be printed on the score of expense. They also say that that evidence and the appendices were printed from day to day, and that any persons might have had a copy upon payment. It is perfectly true that any person might have had the evidence if he had chosen to pay for it; but he would have had from the commencement, to enter into an undertaking to take the whole of the evidence from beginning to end, and each copy of that book cost the unfortunate holder of it £37 16s. Very few copies, as your Lordships may imagine, were printed; I think not more than about 45, of which my business absorbed 10. The consequence is that there is a very large demand for this evidence which it is impossible to supply, and my impression was that it would have been an economy of the Board of Trade to allow this evidence to be printed, because I feel pretty confident myself that the possession of the evidence would save the Department very largely in the future by giving absolute guidance to those who will promote Provisional Orders in the future. However, as the Department do not feel disposed to grant my request, I will not press the Motion.

*THE EARL OF LIMERICK: My noble Friend has stated the reason of the Department for deprecating this Motion. There is no Departmental objection to it: the objection is solely on the ground of expense. The evidence lasted 18 days, and there were 1,300 pages of printed matter, and it was considered that unless a very strong case was made out of this large mass of matter being printed and circulated to your Lordships it would be incurring a very heavy expense indeed without sufficient cause.

Motion (by leave of House) withdrawn.

POST OFFICE SITES BILL.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th August, 1899.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

STANDING ORDERS.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I have to move a series of alterations in the Standing Orders which relate to private Bills. They have been rendered necessary by the disappearance of turnpike roads, the substitution of the London County Council for the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the interposition of tramroads as an intermediary between railways and tramways.

Standing Order 1 was read, and amended:—In line 19, by leaving out after the words "Letters Patent," the words "confirming, prolonging, or transferring;" in line 51, by inserting after the word "port," the words "public carriage road;" in line 71, by leaving out after the word "tunnel," the words "turnpike or other public carriage road."

Standing Order 8 was read, and amended, in line 1, by leaving out the words "for confirming or prolonging or otherwise."

New Standing Order to follow Standing Order 8.

Ordered—

"That in addition to the ordinary notices, notice of the intention to apply to Parliament for a Bill relating to letters patent shall be published twice in the Official Journal of the Patent Office, before the introduction of the Bill in this House; and the total amount of fees, including the prescribed fee for enlargement, under 17 of 'The Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883,' due and to become due on the patent shall be deposited with the Comptroller before the meeting of the Committee on the Bill, and such deposit proved before the Committee."

Ordered, That the said Order be a Standing Order of this House.

Standing Order 9 was read, and amended, in line 3, by leaving out the word "and," and inserting the word "or;" in line 34, by leaving out after the word "days," all the words to the word "and," inclusive, in line 36.

Amendment moved, in Standing Order 22, line 10, after "1870," to insert—

"Except that in the case of tramways situate within the area of the county of London, the London County Council shall be substituted for the Metropolitan Board of Works."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I quite understand the meaning of this alteration of the Standing Order, but I should like to have an explanation from the Chairman of Ways and Means. As I understand Standing Order 22, it provides that the Local Authorities, under the Tramway Act of 1870, should give their assent to the promotion of any Bill for the laying down of a tramway before such Bill can be introduced into Parliament. In that Act the authority for London is described as the Metropolitan Board of Works. I understand that in London the practice has been to require not only the assent of the Metropolitan Board of Works, for whom the London County Council is now substituted, but also the assent of the Local Authorities, such as the Vestries and Local Boards. What I wish to know is whether this dual assent will still be required in the Metropolis. It does not appear to be a requirement in reference to any other part of the kingdom, and I wish to know if the new Standing Order will make any alteration in the old practice.

MR. COURTNEY: The first part of the Standing Order will remain unaltered, and it requires the assent of the Road Authority, where in any district there is a Road Authority, distinct from the Local Authority.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Standing Order 28 was read, and repealed.

New Standing Order to follow Standing Order 27 :—

Ordered—

"That where the work or any part thereof will be situate within the Administrative County of London, or where powers are sought to take any lands within the said County, a copy of so much of the plans, sections, and book of reference as relates to lands within the said County shall, on or before the 30th day of November, be deposited at the Office of the London County Council."

Ordered, That the said Order be a Standing Order of this House.

Standing Order 34 was read and amended :—

In line 3, by leaving out the words "Metropolis, as defined by 'The Metropolitan Management Act, 1855,'" and inserting the words "Administrative County of London."

In line 4, by leaving the words "Metropolitan Board of Works," and inserting the words "London County Council."

Standing Order 35A was read, and amended, in line 7, by inserting after the words "in all cases," the words "other than those of Companies registered under 'The Companies Act, 1862.'"

Amendment moved, in Standing Order 37, line 2, after "Tramway," insert "Tramroad."

Question proposed, "That Tramroad be there inserted."

MR. MURPHY: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain the necessity for this alteration. The word "tramway" is a well understood definition, and in some recent decisions it has received a distinct interpretation. Why should "tramroad" be substituted?

Mr. Murphy

MR. COURTNEY: It is not proposed to substitute "tramroad" for "tramway," but simply to add "tramroad." There is a distinction between the two; the "tramway" runs along an existing road, whereas the "tramroad" may make a way for itself.

Question put, and agreed to.

Standing Order 43 was read, and amended, in line 1 by leaving out the words "turnpike roads."

Amendment moved, in Standing Order 45 :—Line 38, after "plans," add the following new paragraph :—"The preceding paragraph should apply, in the case of a Tramroad, wherever it is carried along a street or road."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. MURPHY: The words which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes to add to this Standing Order do not square with the definition he gave a moment ago. He said that the distinction between a tramway and a tramroad was that one runs along an existing road, whereas the other makes a road for itself. I am afraid that the introduction of a new word which actually means the same thing will only lead to confusion.

MR. COURTNEY: I fear that I did not make myself properly understood. I did not say that a tramroad for the whole of its way is made independently of a public highway. Part of it may be on its own road, and part of it upon a highway, and the object of this alteration of the Standing Order is to provide that if it runs along a portion of a street or a highway it shall come within the Standing Order.

Question put, and agreed to.

Standing Order 47 was read, and amended, in line 9, by leaving out the words "turnpike or other," and inserting the word "public."

Standing Order 51 was read, and amended :—In line 1, by leaving out the words "turnpike road;" in line 2, by leaving out the words "turnpike road."

Standing Order 52 was read, and amended :—In line 2, by leaving out the words "turnpike road;" in line 12, by leaving out the words "turnpike road or."

Standing Order 62 was read, and amended, by adding, at the end, the words—

"So far as any such Bill relates to a separate undertaking in any Company as distinct from the general undertaking, separate meetings shall be held of the proprietors of the Company, and of the separate undertaking, and the provisions of this Order applicable to meetings of proprietors of the Company shall mutatis mutandis apply to meetings of proprietors of the separate undertaking."

Standing Order 75 was read, and amended, in line 2, by inserting after the word "Company," the word "society."

Standing Order 133 was read, and amended, in line 2, by inserting after the word "Company," the word "society."

Standing Order 145 was read, and amended, in line 2, by leaving out the word "turnpike," and inserting the words "public carriage."

Standing Order 155 was read, and amended:—In line 3, by leaving out the words "turnpike road," and inserting the word "Tramroad"; in line 4, by leaving out the word "other"; in line 4, by leaving out the words "carriage way," and inserting the words "carriage road"; in line 6, by inserting after the word "Report," the words "and hearing the officer, if the Committee think fit."

Standing Order 157 was read, and amended:—In line 9, by leaving out the words "turnpike road"; in line 9, by inserting after the word "Railway," the words "Tramway, Tramroad."

Standing Order 158 was read, and amended:—In (b) line 26, by inserting after the word "passengers," the words "and to such Clause the Committee may, if they think fit, add a proviso to the following effect;" in (d) line 7, by inserting after the word "years," the words "of a new Tramroad three years"; in (d) line 10, by inserting after the word "years," the words "of a Tramroad two years."

New Standing Order, to follow Standing Order 166 :—

Ordered—

"That every Bill by which a Railway, Canal, or Tramroad Company is incorporated shall contain a Clause to the following effect:—

"Section 24 of 'The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888,' and any enactment which may be passed in the present or any future Session of Parliament extending or modifying that enactment shall, with any necessary modifications, apply to the Company in all respects as if it were one of the Companies to which the provisions of the said enactment in terms applied. Provided that the time within which the revised schedule of maximum rates and charges prescribed by the said section shall be submitted to the Board of Trade shall be three years from the date of the passing of this Act, or such further time as the Board of Trade may permit."

Ordered, That the said Order be a Standing Order of this House.

Standing Order 167 was read, and amended :—

In line 37, by inserting after the word "otherwise" the words—

"And the Committee on the Bill shall report to the House whether or not they have allowed such interest."

By leaving out lines 47 to 52.

Standing Order 168B was read, and amended, by leaving out, in line 4, the words "Regulation of Railways Acts, 1873 and 1874," and inserting the words "Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1873 and 1888."

New Standing Order to follow Standing Order 168B :—

168C. Ordered—

"That in every Tramroad Bill the length of so much of any Tramroad as is to be constructed along any street or road, or upon any street or road, or upon any waste or open ground by the side of any street or road, shall be set forth in miles, furlongs, chains, and links or yards, or decimals of a chain, in the clause describing the works."

Ordered, "That the said Order be a Standing Order of this House."

Standing Order 175 was read, and amended, in line 1, by leaving out the words "confirming of," and inserting the words "restoring any."

Standing Order 194 was read, and amended, in line 1, by leaving out the words "Metropolitan Board of Works," and inserting the words "London County Council."

Standing Order 202 was read, and amended, by leaving out from the beginning of the Order to the word "and," inclusive, in line 6.

Standing Order 207 was read, and amended, in line 3, by inserting after the word "amendment," the words "or any Motion relating to a Private Bill."

ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS.

SIR J. CORRY (Armagh, Mid), moved for a Return—

"Giving the number of Arrests for Drunkenness within the Metropolitan Police District of Dublin, the cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, and the town of Belfast, on Sundays, between the 1st day of May 1888 and the 30th day of April 1889, both days inclusive, the Arrests to be given from 8 a.m. on Sundays until 8 a.m. on Mondays; and similar Returns for the rest of Ireland from the 30th day of April 1887 to the 30th day of April 1888 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 381, of Session 1888.);"

*MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In connection with this subject, I think it would be convenient if the right hon. Gentleman the-First Lord of the Treasury would state, in view of the fact that the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill is included in the schedule of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, what are the intentions of the Government in regard to the former Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government sincerely hope they may be able to pass the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill this Session. But they have provided against the contingency by inserting it in the schedule of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. In case, therefore, the Sunday Closing Bill is not passed it will be thus continued for another year.

Return ordered.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 339.)

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

MAGISTRACY (IRELAND).

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) moved for a Return showing precedents for appointing public officers to the Commission of the Peace for purposes connected with the discharge of their public duties.

MR. SEXTON: This is a Return which has been put down by the Chief Secretary in accordance with a demand made some time ago for information in regard to the extraordinary course which has been pursued in regard to the appointment of certain public officers to the Commission of the Peace. The House is aware that some time ago the Lord Lieutenant discharged certain gentlemen from the position of Resident Magistrates and that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland thereupon appointed them upon the Commission of the Peace so that by a side wind they continue to receive their salaries without being subjected to the constitutional review of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: If there is any opposition to this Return it must stand over.

MR. SEXTON: Then I oppose it.
Motion postponed.

QUESTIONS.

FACTORY INSPECTORSHIPS—MR. GEO BATEMAN.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincoln, Spalding): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether Mr. George Bateman has made an application for an inspectorship of factories; and, whether there is any prospect of his obtaining such an appointment?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative, but at the present time there is no vacancy on the staff of the Inspectors of Factories.

THE 4TH HUSSARS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 4th Hussars are about to be quartered in Royal Barracks, Dublin; and, whether the sanitary condition of the barrack is now considered satisfactory?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): There has been no question recently as to the healthiness of the cavalry barrack in the Royal Barracks. The other portions, Royal and Palatine Square, have been temporarily evacuated. The depot of the 4th Hussars will be quartered in the cavalry barrack; and probably the regiment itself will be moved in at the close of the drill season, about the end of September.

IRELAND—FAIR RENTS.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, although the necessary notices to have a fair rent fixed have been served by certain tenant farmers in Dromin Division, Ardee Union, County Louth, so far back as October, 1887, the cases remain unheard, while cases connected with other divisions of the same union in which originating notices are of more recent date have been already decided; whether there is any special reason for the distinction thus made; and, whether any arrangement can be made by which the cases from Dromin can be heard at the approaching Land Court Session in Drogheda?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the list of cases from the union of Ardee, which was issued about two months ago, contained all the cases in which applications had been received from that union up to and including October 31, 1887. The cases on the list were grouped according to the electoral divisions in which they were situate for convenience of inspection; but otherwise no special distinction was made either in the selection of cases or in arranging the order in which the electoral divisions were placed. The Sub-Commission sat on July 31 and took up the hearing of some of the cases in the order in which they appeared on the list; but time did not permit of all the cases listed being heard at the sitting referred to. The chairman then proposed to fix another sitting during the month; but the solicitors engaged almost unanimously objected to have a further sitting before the vacation, and at their request the remaining cases on the list were postponed until after the vacation.

COUNCIL OF THE INDIAN EMPIRE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, when the Queen was proclaimed Empress of India at the Delhi Assembly held on 1st January 1877, it was stated by Lord Lytton, then Viceroy of India, that Her Majesty—

as one mark of the notable occasion, on which the Princes and Chiefs of India were assembled together, constituted a Council of the Empire to which, among others, 20 feudatory Princes were nominated; whether the Council has ever met for the transaction of business; and, if so, whether he lay upon the Table of the House a record of its proceedings; if not, whether the Secretary of State will explain why a solemn promise of the Queen Empress has been wholly ignored, and a reform which promised to be of the greatest possible benefit in securing the stability of British rule in India has not been carried out; and whether, in view of the loyal and patriotic spirit displayed by the Princes in making provision for the defence of the North-Western Frontier of India, the Secretary of State will take immediate steps to give effect to Her Majesty's gracious desire to associate the Princes and Chiefs of India—

“With the paramount Power, in a manner honourable to themselves and advantageous to the general interests of the Empire?”

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): At the Delhi Assembly on the 1st January, 1877, the Viceroy appointed 20 Counsellors of the Empress. Of these eight only were natives, 12 being Europeans. The title of Counsellor of the Empress was honorary. The holders were not to form part of any organised body, and were not to be summoned for collective deliberation, though on occasions of emergency consultations between the Viceroy and one or more of the Counsellors might strengthen the hands of the Executive Government. The Council have, according to the original design, never met for the transaction of business; but the Secretary of State has no reason to suppose that successive Viceroys have failed to avail themselves of the advantage of consultation with the individual Counsellors when occasion has arisen for their advice. It is the settled policy of the Government of India to associate the Princes and Chiefs of India with the Government of Her Majesty, and no more conspicuous instance of the success of this policy can be cited than the recent arrangements respecting the Native Armies and the defence of the North-West Frontier.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Do I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that there are now any native Princes and Chiefs who are Councillors?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; I did not say so. I said there were eight appointed in 1877.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Are those eight alive now or not?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Gentleman wants information upon that subject, perhaps he will give notice and put another question.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to say that, in reference to the answer of the hon. Gentleman to my question, I will renew the subject on the Indian Budget.

THE CHANDALIN MAHARANI OF REWA.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that the Chandalin Maharani of Rewa presented in June last a Memorial to the Viceroy of India, setting forth her personal sufferings and the serious grievances endured by her since the death of her late husband, particularly in regard to the control and society of her son the minor Maharaja, and also setting out in detail alleged excessive increase of cost in the management of the affairs of the State without corresponding benefit accruing; and, whether he can inform the House whether any, or what, answer has been made by the Viceroy to such Memorial?

SIR J. GORST: A Memorial of the Viceroy would be, in regular course, dealt with in India, and not forwarded to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has, therefore, no official information on the subject. The Maharani of Rewa could appeal to the Secretary of State if dissatisfied with any order passed by the Viceroy on her memorial; but no such appeal has been received.

MR. BRADLAUGH: The hon. Gentleman says that the Secretary of State has no information. Surely the Secretary of State knows officially, or otherwise, that such a Memorial was presented to the Viceroy of India, and if so, is that consistent with the answer given to me the other day in regard to the position of the Maharani of Rewa?

SIR J. GORST: It is quite consistent.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the hon. Gentleman cause inquiries to be made as to this particular Memorial, because I shall deem it my duty to raise the question again?

SIR J. GORST: The attention of the Government of India will be directed to the matter by the hon. Member's question.

DECORATING HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if it is true that some Naval Officers are in the habit of painting and decorating the outside of Her Majesty's ships at their own private expense; and, if so, will he prohibit a practice which may constitute a heavy tax on the poorer Officers.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The establishment of paint material allowed to Her Majesty's ships is sufficient to paint the whole of the outside surfaces three times a year; and, in addition to this, the Commanders-in-Chief are authorised to allow an extra supply when they have satisfied themselves of the necessity for it. I am not prepared to interfere with the discretion of zealous officers in their wish to supplement the allowance at their own expense.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will the noble Lord give a direct answer to the question? He has given a very nice answer, but it has no bearing upon the question. Will the noble Lord kindly answer specifically whether officers do paint?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I thought I had answered the question of the hon. Gentleman, and had supplemented it with further information. I believe that certain naval officers are in the habit of supplementing the public funds allowed to them for the purpose of decorating their ships, and those most prone to the practice are unmarried men.

IRELAND—THE DUBLIN UNIONS AND THE CATTLE DISEASE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether would be possible to throw the £8,000 demanded by the Privy Council from the Dublin Unions on the General Cattle Diseases Fund, considering that it was in the interests of the entire country that the Dublin cattle were slaughtered by order of the Privy Council?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Even if the course suggested by the hon. and learned Member were deemed advisable, in regard to which I cannot now express any opinion, it could only be carried out by further legislation. But, as stated by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury, in reply to a question put to him on July 15, the general subject will be considered by the Government during the recess.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I do not think we can treat this question entirely apart from the general question of how far the Unions are to be made responsible when pleuro-pneumonia is existing in the district.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject on the Estimates.

SEIZURE OF FISHING NETS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the seizure of five fishing nets belonging to Martin Kennedy and Lachlan Curry, fishermen, in Loch-in-daal, on the night July 23rd-24th, by Major Wise, a lessee of certain fishings in Islay; whether it is true, as stated, that the seizure of nets referred to took place half a mile beyond the protected line, and was consequently illegal; whether it is true that, a fortnight after the seizure of the nets Major Wise had not lodged any complaint with the criminal authorities, but retained the nets, and refused to deliver them to their owners; and if, on inquiry, it appears that the appropriation and retention of the nets was illegal, in view of the frequency of similar treatment of fishermen by fishing tenants in the Highlands, he will instruct the Procurator Fiscal to institute proceedings in this case?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. ROBERTSON, Bute): Inquiries are being made into the circumstances of this seizure of nets, but I am not yet in a position to answer the question. I would therefore ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat the question next week.

UNITED STATES CONSULAR CHARGES.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been directed to the leading article in the New York Evening Post, of 18th July, on the subject of United States consular charges on shipments from this country to the United States of America, in which it is stated:—

"No Consular officer makes any mention of the charge of 2s. 6d. for declaration fee in the reports of fees received. . . . It is the gossip that the British notary, as a condition of his selection to be the notary at the American Consulate, divides these large aggregate fees with the Consul, and they go to swell the great perquisites of that officer, of which so much has been heard of late;"

whether he is aware that on shipments from Germany to the United States no declaration fee is charged; whether he is aware that the total amount levied on shipments from this country exceeds £2,500 a year; whether it is a fact that last year the American Consuls ceased charging the fee of 2s. 6d., but that shortly after the appointment of fresh Consuls a few months back the charge was re imposed; and what steps he proposes to take to relieve British shippers of these unfair charges?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am indebted to the hon. Member for sending me the article referred to. According to the information in our possession and the statements of the American Government, no declaration fee is charged in Germany when it is practically impossible to procure the attendance of a functionary qualified to administer oaths. We do not know the total amount levied on shipments in this country; nor are we aware that last year the American Consuls ceased to charge the fee; this, according to what I have before stated, would mean that they had ceased to insist upon the sworn declaration. It does not appear that any change in the existing state of things can be effected without a modification of American Law.

IRELAND—LAW AND POLICE—CASE OF JOHN KINSELLA.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will make inquiry into the case of a prisoner named John Kinsella, of Mourne Abbey, near Mallow, who was sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude in August 1882, for a violent assault on John Sullivan, of Kilavullen, during a drunken brawl, and who is now confined in Downpatrick Convict Prison; if he is aware that John Sullivan has been in good health ever since; and, in view of this fact (if true), and that the said John Sullivan signed a memorial in 1882 to the then Lord Lieutenant, Earl Spencer, praying for the prisoner's release, and that Kinsella's aged father, of whom he was the sole support, is now in Mallow Union Workhouse, and, further, that he has already spent seven years in penal servitude, will he bring the case under the notice of His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to the prisoner's release?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: The convict John Kinsella was sentenced with three others for the attempted murder of John Sullivan. They beat him on the head with iron bars and sticks, and left him as dead. I am not aware of Sullivan's present condition of health. No memorial on behalf of this convict was under the consideration of Lord Spencer. Memorials on his behalf, however, were considered by Lord Carnarvon and Lord Londonderry, the decision in each case being that the law should take its course. I cannot undertake to act as suggested with a view to his release.

POLICE PROTECTION—CASE OF
JOHN GALWEY.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen the reports in the Cork papers of the 9th instant of a summons for trespass brought by Mr. John Galwey against Mr. John Devane Charleville, County Cork, from which it appears that the summons was dismissed by the Magistrates; is he aware that on the day following the trial, John Galwey went to the field (which was the subject of the summons) accompanied by two police constables armed with revolvers, and assaulted a mason engaged in putting up a gate; and, is he aware that the said John Galwey goes about accompanied by two armed policemen; and, if so, what is the reason alleged for this protection?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the newspaper report referred to is not accurate, but merely a very imperfect summary of the proceedings. Mr. Galwey summoned Mr. Devane for trespass on a field which he claims as his property, but his right to which is disputed on behalf of the townspeople of Charleville. A bona fide question of title having arisen, the Magistrates marked the case "no jurisdiction." They did not dismiss it in the sense suggested in the question. The police report that it is not a fact that on the next day Galwey assaulted a mason who was engaged in putting up a gate, but that he put his hand on the gate post and threatened to pull it down. He was accompanied by two policemen, one of whom had a revolver. Mr. Galwey is thus protected when he goes to this field—but not on other occasions.

Mr. FLYNN: Is this man Galwey entitled to police protection, and to be escorted by armed policemen, when engaged on the assertion of a private claim?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot lay down a general proposition of that character, but it is part of the duty of the police to see that the peace is preserved if they are of opinion that a breach of it is threatened.

In reply to a further question by Mr. FLYNN,

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said: I am pro-

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The secretaries of the Royal University Report that there is no general all-round standard—the marking varying according to the general character and difficulty of the subject. Neither honour nor pass degrees are awarded on all-round percentages. The secretaries cannot take it upon themselves to say whether the questions set at the various degree examinations this year were more or less difficult than those set last year, but they are of opinion that degrees were not granted on a lower standard this year. The Senate has not on any occasion found it necessary to direct a re-perusal of the answer of any candidate.

REFUSAL TO HOLD AN INQUEST.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that Dr. M'Grath, coroner for County Tyrone, refused to hold an inquest on the body of a woman named Murphy, who died suddenly at Caledon on 12th July last, and under what circumstances the refusal was made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the coroner expressed himself as satisfied that the death was due to natural causes and that no inquest was necessary. As I understand, the police did not consider that there was the slightest suspicion of foul play, although under the circumstances of the death they were anxious that an inquest should be held.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S. E. Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, on 18th July, the honourable Member for the Devizes Division (Mr. Long), as Secretary to the Local Government Board, wrote to the Banbury Board of Guardians, acting as the Rural Sanitary Authority, calling their attention to the unsatisfied demand for allotments at Hook Norton, and to the fact that, under "The Allotments Act, 1887," it is the duty of the Sanitary Authority to provide a sufficient number of allotments by purchase or hire, and, if they cannot be obtained by agreement, to purchase land compulsorily; whether he is aware that it appears from the report in the Banbury Guardian of 8th August, that, upon such letter being read, the Chairman of the Board of Guardians said—

"I would send the Board's compliments to the Local Government Board, and say we are perfectly aware of everything in that letter. It's a most ridiculous letter . . . We are perfectly aware about the Act. We have read it till we are sick of it;"

whether he is aware that not only at Hook Norton, but at Farnborough, Mollington, Horley, and other villages in the Banbury Union, there still exist admitted demands for allotments, which have repeatedly been urged upon the Sanitary Authority, but which now remain unsatisfied in consequence of the majority of the Authority having refused to put the powers of the Act into force; and whether he will take any steps to induce the Chairman of the Banbury Board of Guardians to treat communications from the Local Government Board in a more respectful manner, and to compel the Guardians to carry out the provisions of the Act, and to provide allotments at Hook Norton, Farnborough, Mollington, and Horley, and in every parish in the Banbury Union in which there now exists an unsatisfied demand for allotments?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is the case that a letter was written to the Banbury Rural Sanitary Authority in reply to their statement that there was a desire for allotments by the labouring population of Hook Norton, but that there were considerable difficulties in obtaining suitable land in a convenient position. In that letter it was pointed out that if there was a demand for allotments, and such allotments could not be obtained at a reasonable rent, and on reasonable conditions by voluntary arrangements, it became the duty of the Sanitary Authority under and subject to the provisions of the Allotments Act, 1887, to purchase or hire suitable land which might be available, whether within or without their district, adequate to provide a sufficient number of allotments; and further, that if the Authority could not procure land by agreement for the purpose, they might under Section 3 of the Act apply for power to put in force the compulsory clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts in order to obtain such land. I have no information as to the observations said to have been made by the Chairman of the Sanitary Authority when the letter of the Board was read. The reply which the Board received was to the effect that the Sanitary Authority had endeavoured to obtain suitable land for allotments at Hook Norton, and that they would continue to do so. I am informed that the Chairman has been indefatigable in his endeavours to procure land for allotments, and that at Hornton, with a view to prevent difficulty, he took land himself and let it out in allotments, and further that when some land was offered for sale at Claydon he would have purchased it with the same view had the price been, in his opinion, reasonable. Applications for allotments have been made by persons living at Hook Norton, Farnborough, Mollington, Horley, and other villages in the Union, and I am informed that the Sanitary Authority have made great efforts to procure land for this purpose, but without success. It is stated that, no doubt, allotments would be accepted in the villages if they could be taken in close proximity to the dwellings of the applicants, and at very moderate rents. It is satisfactory to be able to add that, as I am informed, the Act has been the means of calling the attention of landed proprietors to the desire for allotments, and that in several parishes in the Union land has been let to applicants in allotments.

Mr. COBB: Do the Inspectors who go down to make inquiries in these cases see any people who are dissatisfied in the matter, or only the authorities?

*Mr. RITCHIE: They see all people who, in their opinion, can throw any light on the subject.

Mr. COBB: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow the Inspector who goes down to make inquiries to see me before he goes there?

*Mr. RITCHIE: No, Sir; that would be quite unusual.

In reply to a further question by Mr. Cobb,

*Mr. RITCHIE said: On the whole, I believe that the Sanitary Authority endeavoured to do its duty.

Mr. Ritchie

LINE OF BATTLE SHIPS.

Sir JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the average total complement, officers and men, of line of battle ships in 1858-9; what was the average total amount of annual pay and allowances of the officers and men of the accountant branch borne in those ships in 1858-9; what is now the average total complement, officers and men, of battle ships; and, what is the average total amount of annual pay and allowances of the officers and men of the accountant branch now borne in those ships?

Lord G. HAMILTON: In order to give the comparison between the pay and allowances of the accountant branch in 1858-9 and the present time I have selected the Northampton and Trafalgar as representative ships of the two periods. The complement of the Northampton was 1,100 officers and men, and that of the Trafalgar is 536. In the former ship the number of officers and men in the accountant branch was 9, at an annual cost of £1,199; in the latter ship the number is 7, at an annual cost of £1,202.

Sir J. COLOMB: Have not the expenses been doubled?

Lord G. HAMILTON: The expenses are about double per man.

THE SCOTCH FISHERY BOARD.

IRELAND—THE LIMAVADY SAVINGS BANK.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry City): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has heard any complaints as to the management of the Limavady Savings Bank, to the effect that moneys are paid out sometimes without authority from those whose names are registered as the depositors, and that moneys are lodged in the names of persons without their knowledge, with the object of enabling individuals to have large sums of money in the Bank and at their disposal under various names; and, whether he will order some inquiry to be made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have heard no such complaints as those to which the hon. Member refers. If he has any information on the subject and will communicate either with me or with the National Debt Commissioners inquiries shall be made.

MR. HORACE TOWNSEND.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state in what capacity Mr. Horace Townsend acted when he wrote the letter regarding the Ponsonby estate to the secretary of the Land Corporation, Ireland, which contained statements as to the excess of the rents above the value of the land?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information on the subject.

GREEN STREET COURTHOUSE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the observations of the Hon. Mr. Justice Harrison as to the state of Green Street Courthouse, and to the fact that the learned Judge suffered from blood poisoning after a prolonged Assize there; is it the case that for years complaints have been constant as to the unsuitable and unsanitary condition of this Court; that the strongest feeling prevails as to its inconvenient situation; and, will the Government obtain an estimate of the cost of providing for the erection of a suitable Court near or in the Four Courts?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Madden, University of Dublin): The facts are correctly stated in the question. I find that the course suggested in the concluding paragraph of the question was taken in 1883 by the Government of the day. The Board of Works estimated the costs of the building, including the purchase of the site, at £40,000. Of this sum the Government agreed to pay £13,500, or a little over one-third. Having obtained Returns of the number of cases entered at Green Street from the city and county respectively, the Government proposed that the remainder of the costs should be borne in the proportion of one-third by the county and two-thirds by the city, and agreed that two-thirds of the amount so contributed should be advanced by the Board of Works by way of loan. The Grand Jury of the county accepted the proposals of the Government, which were also in the first instance acceded to by the Corporation of the city. Subsequently differences arose, into which I cannot enter in detail, the result of which was the proposals were ultimately rejected by the Corporation. A Memorial on the subject has been recently addressed to the Lord Lieutenant by the Incorporated Law Society, and I venture to express a hope that some arrangement may be come to with the Corporation which would enable the Government to carry into effect some such proposal as that which was made in 1883.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the Corporation of Dublin have to pay the Recorder and other officers who are required to sit in the Court, is not the hon. and learned Gentleman of opinion that they should have some voice in the matter?

MR. MADDEN: That portion of the expenditure which is not borne by the Treasury, is allocated between the city and the county, and it is based on the amount of business contributed by each respectively. I venture to hope that some arrangement may be possible.

LAND COMMISSION—CASES AT ATHY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that on 13th August the two lay Sub-Commissioners sat for land cases at Athy without the legal Commissioner, who was absent through illness in his family, and that the professional gentlemen engaged in the cases protested against the arrangement; can he explain why the Chief Commissioner did not send a substitute for the legal Commissioner; is there any precedent for the two lay members of a Sub-Commission deciding legal questions by themselves; and, will steps be taken to prevent a recurrence of this practice when fatality prevents the legal Sub-Commissioner acting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that in the unavoidable absence of the legal Sub-Commissioner, Mr. Kane, two lay Sub-Commissioners attached to his Commission sat to hear cases under a special delegation at Athy on the 13th inst. The Chief Commissioners did not send a substitute for Mr. Kane, as no other legal Sub-Commissioner was available at the time. The two lay members were not authorised to hear cases involving legal questions, which they were directed to postpone until they were joined by a legal Sub-Commissioner. This course has been frequently adopted under similar circumstances. There is nothing either in the Act or the rules to render necessary the presence of the legal member of the Sub-Commission.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that great dissatisfaction has been created among practitioners in consequence of the appointment of two lay Commissioners only?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That could not be so in a case where the arrangement was entirely by the consent of the parties concerned.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the day school for 400 girls, provided by Sections 64 and 65 of the Christ's Hospital Scheme, approved by the Committee of Council on Education more than a year ago, is likely to be proceeded with; and whether, seeing that middle class schools for girls have lately been approved, one for 250 at Stamford Hill (actually commenced), and another by Scheme 660, for 400 at or near Bishopsgate Without, it is still intended that the said

Mr. T. M. Healy

"Girls' day school shall be maintained in the County of Middlesex at a distance of not more than three miles, measured in a straight line, from the Royal Exchange;"

notwithstanding the great needs of the Metropolis south of the Thames, as set forth in the Memorial presented to him by the 24 Members of Parliament for South London, and which up to the present has been ignored?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Memorial to which the hon. Member refers did not reach me until the scheme had been sanctioned by the Department. The further progress of the scheme is now beyond the control of the Committee of Council, and must await the decision of the Judicial Committee in respect of those points which were the subjects of the recent appeal.

THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on the 9th instant, four members of the Salvation Army, who had been convicted of causing an obstruction by preaching in the square at Whitechurch, were handcuffed, and were in that condition conveyed from Overton to Winchester Prison, notwithstanding the protest of the defendants' solicitor to Mr. Joseph Waters, the Superintendent of Police at Kingsclere, who was present; and whether he will take effectual steps to secure obedience to his own declaration that, unless the police had reasonable grounds for fearing the Salvationists would run away, handcuffs should not be used?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. I am informed by the Chief Constable that the fact is as stated, and that the Superintendent, in the exercise of his discretion, handcuffed the prisoners, because it came to his knowledge that the friends of the prisoners had telegraphed to Winchester that they were coming, and he feared a repetition of what had taken place on the 16th of July, on which occasion an escort of police conveying two Salvationists from Whitechurch to Winchester had great difficulty in preventing a rescue of the prisoners by a large crowd of sympathisers. On that occasion a complaint was made to me as to the use of handcuffs, and I called the attention of the Chief Constable to the declaration quoted, so that he is in possession of my views. I can only lay down general principles for the guidance of the police, who must act according to the circumstances of each case.

CONSERVATIVE REGISTRATION AGENTS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that Mr. Charles Panton, an official in the Probate Court at Lincoln, and in receipt of a salary from Somerset House, is the secretary of the Conservative Association of that town, and that he has been in the habit of attending the Revising Barrister's Court at Lincoln as the registration agent of the Tory Party; and whether Mr. Panton is justified, as a Civil servant, in acting as the secretary and as the registration agent of the Tory Party?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware what post Mr. Charles Panton holds in the Probate Court at Lincoln, or whether he is or is not a Civil servant; but I have no hesitation in saying that no permanent member of the Civil Service, who is required to give his whole time to the country, should act as secretary or registration agent to any political Party.

TYPHOID IN INDIA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India; (1) whether the Government of India have discovered anything throwing light on the causes of the great spread in Indian European cantonments in recent years of a disease formerly unknown in India—namely, typhoid, and its prevalence last cold season in the camps of exercise at places hitherto deemed the most healthy; (2) whether the disease has at all extended to the Native Army and Native population; and (3) whether anything is being done to combat it, and guard against its recurrence next season?

SIR J. GORST: (1) No, but the latest returns show that the disease received a check. (2) The Native Troops are particularly exempt from the disease. (3) In consequence of the recent epidemic of typhoid fever at certain stations, the Government of India, in March last, appointed a Medical Committee to inquire on the spot into the cause of the disease.

CANADIAN PACIFIC ROUTE TO HONG KONG.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury by what calculation it is stated in the Treasury Minute of 18th July that the new Canadian-Pacific route to Hong Kong saves several days, as compared with the Suez route, for postal purposes; what is the present contract time for letters from London to Hong Kong via Suez, and what will be the time by the new route, the Atlantic voyage and stoppages included; who are the parties who have continually pressed on the Treasury the importance of the new route for military and naval purposes; and whether the Secretary of State for War and Board of Admiralty have done so; if so, for what particular purposes; what the cost of each soldier or sailor sent by the new route is calculated to be, in addition to the subsidy; and, whether to India the alternative route by the Cape of Good Hope is quicker, much easier, and infinitely cheaper than the Canadian?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Jackson, Leeds, N.): I am afraid that in the desire to be concise the Treasury Minute is not quite so clear as it might be; the saving of time referred to is really on certain sections of the line—namely, between London and Shanghai, and London and Yokohama. The times are: Shanghai—eastern route, shortest 37½ days; longest, 42½; western route, shortest, 30½; longest, 32½; the saving being seven and ten days respectively. Hong Kong—eastern route, shortest, 32½ days; longest, 37½; western route, shortest, 34; longest, 36. To Yokohama—the eastern route is 15 to 18 days longer than the western route; but the P. and O. service is not a contract service to Yokohama. The importance of the Canadian Pacific route for military and naval purposes was urged upon the Government by Members of Parliament, public bodies, and members of both professions, and was one of the factors that led Her Majesty's Government, including the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, to agree to the grant of a subsidy. I am afraid that I should be travelling outside the limits

ARRESTS FOR DRUNKENNESS.

SIR J. CORRY (Armagh, Mid.) moved for a Return—

"Giving the number of Arrests for Drunkenness within the Metropolitan Police District of Dublin, the cities of Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, and the town of Belfast, on Sundays, between the 1st day of May 1888 and the 30th day of April 1889, both days inclusive, the Arrests to be given from 8 a.m. on Sundays until 8 a.m. on Mondays; and similar Returns for the rest of Ireland from the 30th day of April 1887 to the 30th day of April 1888 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 381, of Session 1888.);"

*MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): In connection with this subject, I think it would be convenient if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would state, in view of the fact that the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill is included in the schedule of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, what are the intentions of the Government in regard to the former Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Her Majesty's Government sincerely hope they may be able to pass the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill this Session. But they have provided against the contingency by inserting it in the schedule of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. In case, therefore, the Sunday Closing Bill is not passed it will be thus continued for another year.

Return ordered.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 339.)

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

MAGISTRACY (IRELAND).

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) moved for a Return showing precedents for appointing public officers to the Commission of the Peace for purposes connected with the discharge of their public duties.

MR. SEXTON: This is a Return which has been put down by the Chief Secretary in accordance with a demand made some time ago for information in regard to the extraordinary course which has been pursued in regard to the appointment of certain public officers to the Commission of the Peace. The House is aware that some time ago the Lord Lieutenant discharged certain gentlemen from the position of Resident Magistrates and that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland thereupon appointed them upon the Commission of the Peace so that by a side wind they continue to receive their salaries without being subjected to the constitutional review of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: If there is any opposition to this Return it must stand over.

MR. SEXTON: Then I oppose it.
Motion postponed.

QUESTIONS.

FACTORY INSPECTORSHIPS—MR. GEO. BATEMAN.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincoln, Spalding): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether Mr. George Bateman has made an application for an inspectorship of factories; and, whether there is any prospect of his obtaining such an appointment?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative, but at the present time there is no vacancy on the staff of the Inspectors of Factories.

THE 4TH HUSSARS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the 4th Hussars are about to be quartered in Royal Barracks, Dublin; and, whether the sanitary condition of the barrack is now considered satisfactory?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR

regiment itself will be moved in at the close of the drill season, about the end of September.

IRELAND—FAIR RENTS.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, although the necessary notices to have a fair rent fixed have been served by certain tenant farmers in Dromin Division, Ardee Union, County Louth, so far back as October, 1887, the cases remain unheard, while cases connected with other divisions of the same union in which originating notices are of more recent date have been already decided; whether there is any special reason for the distinction thus made; and, whether any arrangement can be made by which the cases from Dromin can be heard at the approaching Land Court Session in Drogheda?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that the list of cases from the union of Ardee, which was issued about two months ago, contained all the cases in which applications had been received from that union up to and including October 31, 1887. The cases on the list were grouped according to the electoral divisions in which they were situate for convenience of inspection; but otherwise no special distinction was made either in the selection of cases or in arranging the order in which the electoral divisions were placed. The Sub-Commission sat on July 31 and took up the hearing of some of the cases in the order in which they appeared on the list; but time did not permit of all the cases listed being heard at the sitting referred to. The chairman then proposed to fix another sitting during the month; but the solicitors engaged almost unanimously objected to have a farther sitting before the vacation, and at their request the remaining cases on the list were postponed until after the vacation.

COUNCIL OF THE INDIAN EMPIRE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, when the Queen was proclaimed Empress of India at the Delhi Assembly held on 1st January 1877, it was stated by Lord Lytton, then Viceroy of India, that Her Majesty—

as one mark of the notable occasion, on which the Princes and Chiefs of India were assembled together, constituted a Council of the Empire to which, among others, 20 feudatory Princes were nominated; whether the Council has ever met for the transaction of business; and, if so, whether he lay upon the Table of the House a record of its proceedings; if not, whether the Secretary of State will explain why a solemn promise of the Queen Empress has been wholly ignored, and a reform which promised to be of the greatest possible benefit in securing the stability of British rule in India has not been carried out; and whether, in view of the loyal and patriotic spirit displayed by the Princes in making provision for the defence of the North-Western Frontier of India, the Secretary of State will take immediate steps to give effect to Her Majesty's gracious desire to associate the Princes and Chiefs of India—

“With the paramount Power, in a manner honourable to themselves and advantageous to the general interests of the Empire?”

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): At the Delhi Assembly on the 1st January, 1877, the Viceroy appointed 20 Counsellors of the Empress. Of these eight only were natives, 12 being Europeans. The title of Counsellor of the Empress was honorary. The holders were not to form part of any organised body, and were not to be summoned for collective deliberation, though on occasions of emergency consultations between the Viceroy and one or more of the Counsellors might strengthen the hands of the Executive Government. The Council have, according to the original design, never met for the transaction of business; but the Secretary of State has no reason to suppose that successive Viceroys have failed to avail themselves of the advantage of consultation with the individual Counsellors when occasion has arisen for their advice. It is the settled policy of the Government of India to associate the Princes and Chiefs of India with the Government of Her Majesty, and no either to the Lord Lieutenant or to himself, as Chief Secretary, on certain official irregularities of Mr. R. G. Pilkington, Inspector, in the Collector General's Office, of vacant and otherwise unrateable premises, the irregularities consisting of his giving his official certificate that the rates on certain premises were irrecoverable, when, as a matter of fact, the said rates had been twice paid, once by landlord of premises and once by tenant of same, to a collector of rates, who fraudulently retained them; whether, if no such Report has been made either to the Lord Lieutenant or himself, he will call upon the Collector General of Rates to report on such grave official irregularities as above indicated, and direct a general inquiry into the matter; and, whether the defaulting collector above alluded to was ever prosecuted, or his sureties proceeded against.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Neither the Collector General nor the Auditor has made a Report to the Government of the irregularities on the part of Mr. Pilkington other than the Report received from the former in reply to the hon. Member's question a few days ago when it appeared that in the opinion of his Department there was nothing in Mr. Pilkington's official conduct calling for censure. The Acting Collector General reports that a warrant was obtained for the arrest of the defaulting collector, who, however, managed to leave the country before his arrest could be effected. His surety was proceeded against, and has paid the amount of the defalcations in full, together with the costs.

DR. KENNY: Is it the fact that the rates were twice paid on these premises?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that something of the kind did occur, but an error of this kind is sometimes inevitable.

DR. KENNY: Was a Report made to the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no cognisance of the fact.

NAVAL RESERVE DRILL BATTERY AT BELFAST.

SIR JAMES CORRY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether money has been voted for the Naval Reserve Drill Battery at Belfast; whether the lease of a site has been arranged with Belfast Harbour Commissioners; and when the work will be commenced?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Money has been voted in the Civil Service Estimates for this year for the erection of a Naval Reserve Drill Battery at Belfast, but the lease of the site has not yet been finally arranged. On the strong representations of the Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves the commencement of the work has been suspended for a time, as questions have arisen which might, in the future, render the site a less desirable one for the battery than was at first supposed. Under these circumstances, the Admiralty are of opinion that it would be more prudent to make further inquiries before actually commencing the work.

THE HIGHLAND MAILS.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherlandshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the amount of the annual subsidy paid to the Highland Railway Company for carrying Her Majesty's mails; whether there has been a recent increase of that subsidy, and, if so, what is its date and amount; whether the Highland Railway Company has given an adequate, or any, increased postal facilities in consequence of such increase of subsidy; whether postal facilities on that part of the Highland Railway system to the north of Tain are not less now than they were six years ago through the withdrawal of the sorting van; and whether he will use his influence to get back for the public of the district referred to the postal facilities which they enjoyed before the increase of the said subsidy?

facilities of places north of that town are now somewhat less than they previously were. The outlay already incurred in conveying the mails to the North of Scotland is so large that I regret that I am not prepared to incur further expense in providing facilities which the amount of correspondence to be benefited would not warrant in view of the enormous sums now paid to the Highland Railway Company.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND: I will call attention to this matter on the Post Office Estimates.

THE HOLYWOOD FORESHORE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has observed that the deposit of seaweed infiltrated by sewage on the Holywood foreshore was described by a medical man, in evidence given before the Holywood Petty Sessions on the 22nd ultimo, as most offensive, sickening, and dangerous, and that the Magistrates dismissed the summons brought by the Belfast Board of Guardians against the landlord, and intimated that they considered it the duty of the Board of Guardians to remove the nuisance; and, whether the Irish Local Government Board may now be expected to take any effective steps in the case for the protection of the public?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph of the question. The Guardians appear to have referred the matter to their solicitor on the 13th instant, to advise as to their liability and power to abate the nuisance complained of.

In reply to a further question by Mr. SEXTON,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I do not know that the Local Government Board have any power to interfere.

EVICTIONS ON THE CLONGOREY ESTATE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that the Relieving Officer for the Clongorey District was on 6th August served with notices that five families on the Clongorey Estate, against whom decrees for possession of their holdings were obtained at the Summer Assizes, are to be evicted; whether the evictions about to be enforced owe their origin to the non-payment of arrears of rent which accrued due before the fixing of judicial rents; whether Mr. Barrington, the valuer appointed by Judge Darling, the County Court Judge of County Kildare, reported recently that, in his opinion, the rents on this estate should be reduced by 29½ per cent; whether the original demand of the tenants was 30 per cent abatement, and the abatement offered by the landlord 10 per cent; whether Judge Darling, acting on this Report of his Court Valuer, asked the agent in open Court at the last Quarter Sessions at Naas to consent to grant the reductions recommended, and, on his refusing to do so, whether the Judge stayed the execution of the decrees until October, 1891; and whether, having regard to these facts, he will permit the forces of the Crown to be employed in carrying out these evictions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question for a few days.

MOUSSA BEY.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement that a Petition was presented to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople by a deputation of Armenians on behalf of 500 Natives of Moush, temporarily residing in Constantinople, praying for the punishment of Moussa Bey, and that six Armenian members of this deputation have been arrested and thrown into prison; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have inquired into the matter, and received confirmation of all or any of the particulars of this statement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Inquiry has been made, and the report, according to information from trustworthy sources, is without foundation.

ARMENIA.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and, if so, what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to obtain the release, or, failing that, a fair and open trial of the Armenians, several of them teachers of schools, who were exiled, without trial, to Tripoli so long ago as 14th March, 1888?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is somewhat difficult to identify the particular case to which the hon. Member refers; but he probably alludes to a case mentioned at page 85 of Turkey, No. 1 (1889), where Her Majesty's Consul at Van reports that the Vali was said to be about to request that certain exiles should be allowed to return home, and three of these exiles are stated to be at Tripoli. As regards the intervention of Her Majesty's Government, Her Majesty's Ambassador is authorised to make representations to the Porte whenever, in his judgment, he can do so with advantage to those concerned; but Her Majesty's Government have no control over the action of the Turkish Government in reference to the administration of the law regarding Turkish subjects.

THE INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the absence of the so often promised Treasury Minute, he will explain why, after the Ridley Commission had made their Second Report, and before any action had been taken thereon, the Treasury sanctioned a scheme of classification for a subordinate Department of the Inland Revenue—namely, the "Stamps and Stores Department," last November, with salaries largely in excess of those of their colleagues of equal length of service in more important branches; and, if so, whether he is prepared to say that any scheme for the amelioration of the position of the clerks in the more important branches of the Service will date from the same period as that adopted in the Stamps and Stores Department.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have never maintained that no reform in any Department, however urgent, ought to be carried out, until the Government had taken a general decision upon this very valuable Report. The re-organization of the Stamps and Stores Department was rendered necessary by legislation which threw increased work upon that Department, and it seemed better to meet the exigencies of the case by re-arrangement than by simply adding new clerks, and thereby increasing the number of pension-earning Civil servants. The scheme sanctioned by the Treasury was an economical one. It not only provided for the additional work, but effected a reduction of £1,400 a year on the maximum cost of the establishment. With regard to other (I demur to the expression "more important") branches, I am not prepared to give the pledge which the hon. Member asks for. The question of re-organising each separate Department must be dealt with on its own merits as the necessity arises.

DR. RICHARD NICHOLLS.

*DR. KENNY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Dr. Richard Nicholls, of Navan, who was for over 17 years Civil Medical Officer to the regular troops stationed in that town, and also for some years Medical Officer to the Meath Militia, has recently, under some new regulation, been deprived of these appointments without compensation; and, whether, considering the length of Dr. Nicholls' service, he will recommend his case to the Treasury for compensation?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Dr. Nicholls held no appointment. He was employed, as medical men are all over the kingdom, to attend at contract rates detachments of troops when no Military Medical Officer should be present. A Military Medical Officer having been stationed at Navan, the necessity for Dr. Nicholls's service ceased. It has always been a condition of the employment of a civilian medical practitioner that his employment might cease at any time without notice and without the creation of any claim to compensation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there are at present 56 applications in leasehold cases to fix judicial rents outstanding in that part of the Union of Waterford in the County of Kilkenny. Of these, 45 were received before and 11 since the 29th of September, 1887. No leasehold cases for the district referred to have yet been heard, as it was necessary to hear a large number of applications in respect of yearly tenancies which had been earlier received. A Sub-Commission is at present sitting in the County Kilkenny, and will, it is proposed, continue its sittings there after the vacation, taking the Waterford Union in its turn. The Commissioners are unaware whether the landlords in the cases referred to have, since the date of the tenants' applications to have judicial rents fixed, exacted the former rents from which relief was sought; but if so, and if these rents are reduced when the judicial rents are fixed, the landlords will have, pursuant to the 5th section of the Land Law Act, 1887, to allow to their tenants the difference between the amount received and the judicial rent for the period which has elapsed since the date of the tenant's application. It has been decided by the Queen's Bench Division that in the case where a tenant's holding or holdings is or are valued at more than £50 a year, the Court has not jurisdiction under the 20th section of the Act of 1887 to stay execution of writs of fieri facias.

ELEMENTARY TEACHERS.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in view of his expressed intention to press upon the attention of the Government a Superannuation Scheme for the benefit of Public Elementary Teachers, he has any objection to give the Return of which notice has been given for to-day?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I regret to say that it would be altogether out of the power of the Department to furnish the Return asked for. All the information of value which the Department have on the subject is included in the General Report annually submitted to Parliament, and will be found this year on pages 20-22 of that Report.

THE SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

MR. CONWAY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Science and Art Department has fully considered the effect that portion of Regulation 12, printed in italics, page 56, of the Science and Art Directory for 1889-90 is likely to have in Ireland, where so few boys can remain at the National Schools until they have passed the second stage of the sixth class; whether the rule up to the present has been for pupils to have passed the second stage of the fifth class before presentation for examination in the principles of agriculture; and, whether the Science and Art Department will re-consider the part of Rule 12, which is specified in the first paragraph, and let the House know the result of such consideration before the Science and Art Vote comes on for discussion?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The rule was modified in the form suggested by the National Board of Education in Ireland in order to meet the objection made by the Comptroller and Auditor General to the duplication of payments in respect of certain children examined in agriculture. I do not think the change will have any ill effect, as the National Board have stated their opinion that the course of instruction in agriculture prescribed in their programme is suitable and sufficient for the pupils of national schools, and the alteration will only affect these pupils.

IRELAND—DUBLIN POST OFFICE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is by his authority that letters addressed to the hon. Member for Cork City, including letters addressed to him by his mother, Mrs. Parnell, from America, are opened in the post office; and, if so, whether this is done by a general warrant, or by a particular order for each letter opened; whether it was by his authority that a letter addressed to the Lord Mayor of Dublin by the President of the United States was recently opened in the post office; and, whether this system of opening letters is to be further continued; and, if so, whether he will enable persons whose letters are opened in the post office to protect themselves by being present, either in person or by deputy, at the opening in the post office of letters addressed to or by them?

MR. MATTHEWS: I beg leave to state, in reply to the right hon. Member, that I have no reason to suppose that any letters addressed to the hon. Member for Cork have been opened in the post office, and I have given no authority for such letters to be opened. The same answer applies to the alleged opening of a letter addressed to the Lord Mayor of Dublin by the President of the United States; but I have consulted the Postmaster General, who informs me that in this case he is making inquiry. There is no system of opening the letters as suggested in the question.

MR. SEXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman has ceased to exercise his functions are we to understand that if letters have been opened it was without official authority?

MR. MATTHEWS: If opened they have been opened without any authority from the Home Office, or, as far as I am aware, from any other Government Department in this country.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any authority to direct the opening of letters but the Home Secretary?

MR. MATTHEWS: In this country only the Secretary of State.

MR. SEXTON: But in Ireland?

No answer.

THE LOWER PROVINCES OF BENGAL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, in regard to the statement of the Secretary of State, in his Letter, No. 25th May 1889, to the Government of India, that he had received petitions, letters, &c., from associable meetings, and the like, in the Provinces of Bengal, praying alterations in the Constitution, and expressing the opinion that "the memorialists demanded that their representations receive the careful attention of the Secretary of State," whether he is now in a position to state his decisions on the memorialists?

MR. GORST: I am not able to give a statement. The Constitution is still under consideration.

See 1351

MR. BRADLAUGH: But it has been under consideration since the early part of 1887.

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the Constitution of India can only be altered by Act of Parliament; and when there is a prospect of passing it through Parliament the Secretary of State will embody his views in a Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to convey by that answer, that the Secretary of State has some legislation in contemplation?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; the Secretary of State has no legislation in contemplation. In the present state of public business it would be hopeless to expect to pass a measure through Parliament.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Has that been the state of affairs since 1887?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir.

POSTAGE UPON ORDERS FOR GOODS.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether orders for goods from Co-operative Stores in London are treated as circulars, and pass at halfpenny rate, subject to the right expressly reserved of keeping them back if there is a pressure of business; whether such orders in any way differ from Railway advices of goods and notices of default by loan fund banks in Ireland, which are held to be letters; and, whether he can see his way to treat both classes alike?

*MR. RAIKES: Orders for goods have no privilege as circular letters, but no-

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

SIR JOHN COLOMB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the publication of information by certain Press correspondents with the Fleet of information as to the results of trial speeds of ships and disguises to be adopted by certain vessels; and, whether he proposes to take any steps to stop the circulation of information calculated to defeat some of the objects of the Manœuvres?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have read the statements referred to by my hon. Friend, and I think that they would convey to the Admiral commanding the opposing Fleet information which would be useful to him. I have no doubt that such was not the object of those who wrote the letters referred to, and that their attention having been directed by the question of my hon. Friend to the probable consequences of their indiscretion they will be more careful in the future.

SCHOOLS IN CAITHNESS AND SUNDERLAND.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what has been the result of the reference to the Law Officers in regard to payments under Section 32 (a) to schools in Caithness and Sutherland.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Law Officers are of opinion that the general terms of the Statute cannot safely be held to authorise the inclusion of other counties than those named in the 67th section of the Act of 1872. The Government are willing to introduce a very short Bill to settle the matter in favour of Caithness and Sutherland; but this can only be done provided there is no opposition, and if we have the help of hon. Gentlemen opposite in enabling us to do it in the short time available.

CROWN RIGHTS TO SCOTCH SALMON FISHINGS.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is proposed to appoint the Royal Commission promised by the Government to inquire into Crown rights to salmon fishings in Scotland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): A Commission will be appointed at once to inquire into the present exercise of Crown rights of salmon fishing in Scotland, and on the coast and in the sea adjacent thereto, and their effect on the preservation and supply of fish, and to report the evidence.

CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is now in a position to state definitely when the Treasury Minute respecting Civil Establishments, which was promised 'on the 26th ultimo to be in the hands of Members in a few days, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will lay the Minute on the Table this evening. When the House is in possession of the Minute, and sees the numerous and complicated questions with which it has been necessary to deal, there will, I think, be no surprise at the delay in its production.

COMPENSATION FOR CATTLE COMPULSORILY SLAUGHTERED.

MR. H. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, if the Government has come to any decision as to from what source compensation is to be paid in the future for cattle slaughtered owing to pleuropneumonia.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on the 15th ult. in reply to the hon. Members for South-East Essex and Saffron Walden, which was to the effect that the question would be considered during the recess.

THE COMMISSION ON ROYALTY RENTS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the Royal Commission on Royalty Rents has been finally constituted; and, whether he can state when it is likely to enter upon the discharge of its duties?

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): May I also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has received any representations from colliery owners and workmen in the Midland districts complaining of the non-representation of their interests on the Commission?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Commission has been constituted, and includes some representatives of the Midland districts, which it was suggested were not sufficiently represented. The Commission will be gazetted in the course of a day or two.

THE CRINAN CANAL.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the dues of transit of the Crinan Canal are nearly as heavy as the dues of transit of the much greater length of the Caledonian Canal; whether he will consider whether the dues on the Crinan Canal can be reduced; whether he is aware that the lock gates of the Crinan Canal are not opened to passing vessels by the employés of the canal, as is the case on the Caledonian Canal, and that it is the practice of the authorities of the Crinan Canal to insist upon each vessel taking an extra hand on board to open the lock gates, to whom the owner of the vessel is obliged to pay a fee of 10s.; whether this practice is legal; and, whether the authorities of the canal are bound, on payment of the transit dues by a passing vessel, to provide without further charge for the opening of the lock gates?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The dues on the Crinan Canal are regulated by bye-laws approved by the Commissioners, and are according to Statute. The dues are proportionately higher than those on the Caledonian Canal, owing to the fact that the Crinan Canal passes through no natural lakes, and so requires an artificial water supply. No general reduction of dues can be given; but from time to time reductions are made when it is clearly proved to encourage traffic and to be of advantage to the Revenue. The lock gates are opened by the employés, and it is not the practice of the authorities to insist on extra hands being employed, as they are bound to provide for the opening of lock gates without further charge than the payment of dues.

THE TITHES RENT-CHARGE BILL.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I wish to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House with reference to the business of to-morrow. He was kind enough to consent to a motion yesterday to report progress, in order that we might see the Amendments of the Government to the Tithe Bill. I have had an opportunity of briefly looking at these Amendments, and I find that the effect of them is that of the old Bill two lines remain. But that is not all. In the form in which the Paper stands at present, we have not only the Government Amendments on the new Bill, but also on the old Bill, which still remain, and I have got the two put together as they now stand on the Paper, and they constitute some yards—that is to say, the Amendments of the Home Secretary to the old Bill and the Amendments of the Attorney General to the new Bill. Now, that is not the most convenient form in which we can deal with them, and in the ordinary course it would be the custom of the House that the Government, making material alterations in a Bill, should move formally that the Bill be recommitted, in order to insert the Amendments they desire to insert and to exclude those parts they do not desire to retain. Unfortunately there is an obstacle in the way of that—namely, that all the Amendments upon the Paper are excluded by the ruling of the Chair upon the instructions rejected by the Government. The Chairman of Committees laid it down that nothing could be admitted which sought to lay the burden on the owner only. Now, these Amendments do that. Therefore the whole of the Amendments proposed by the Government are Amendments that cannot be put. In these circumstances I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury at all events not to attempt to go on with the Bill to-morrow. It is quite impossible in a Bill of this magnitude, affecting a great interest and many millions of what has been called, and I think properly, national property, and containing the Bill may not be met to-morrow with a Motion that the Bill shall not be proceeded with. It would be much better if the right hon. Gentleman would arrange to set down other business which at this period of the Session it is necessary to go on with. If the House will indulge me, I will not go into any argumentative matter except to point out that this Bill includes extremely important matter which we should be allowed to consider fully, so that, if necessary, we might be able to put down Amendments. We ought not to be called upon at 24 hours' notice to take this Bill into consideration. It is one of our rules of legislation that we do not deal with property of any kind without giving the owner notice. With reference to this new Bill, I do not speak adversely to its principle. I should be very glad to see that principle carried out; but it is absolutely necessary that the House should be placed at least in as good a position as it would be in after a Second Reading. If I were adverse to the Bill I should certainly demand that we should have a Second Reading discussion, but all I now say is this, that the House must be placed in as good a position as it would be in after the Second Reading of a new Bill—that hon. Members should be able to move such instructions as are necessary for dealing fully with the Bill in Committee. Generally speaking, it seems to me perfectly clear that we cannot go on with this Bill to-morrow. We have no time to put down Amendments which are necessary for dealing with it and, on the whole, these are matters as to which gentlemen ought not only to know what they think themselves, but also, I venture to say, what their constituents think of the provisions of a Bill so utterly novel as this. Therefore I venture to submit to the right hon. Gentleman that it is quite idle to endeavour to go on with Committee on this Bill to-morrow, and I would suggest that he should postpone it, at all events until next week. I would also submit that instead of endeavouring to cobble up a Bill by striking out all except two lines and putting in Amendments, it would be far better to withdraw this Bill and introduce to-morrow a new Bill, and then to proceed to the consideration of that new Bill in the proper manner. That would be by far the most convenient course, because practically we shall have to deal with the Bill in that manner, however the question is put before us.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is highly satisfactory to hear that the right hon. Gentleman is entirely in favour of the principle of the Amendments the Government have put on the paper in reference to this Bill. He must, therefore, be most desirous that the Bill should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. I gladly recognise the extremely kind consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. He has objected that the Government are proposing a new Bill. What the Government are doing is simply this. They are inserting and giving effect to an instruction—a Debate, which was supported by the right hon. Gentleman himself and by almost every Member on that side of the House—an Instruction that the Bill should place the liability on the owner. The right hon. Gentleman in supporting the proposal, obviously saw his way to giving practical effect to it in the Bill, or he would not have supported it. Now, following up that desire he says that it is absolutely necessary to have more than 48 hours to consider a proposal which all who desire that the Bill should be effectual think should be at once ratified by the House of Commons.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has not quite understood me. What I said was that you must revoke the decision of the House rejecting the Instruction.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman is, I think, incorrect in his views. I think he will find it is possible for the Committee to entertain the Amendments put on the paper by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. At all events it does not rest with him or me to determine whether that is so or not. It was understood that the Amendment which stood on the paper in the name of the hon. Member for Essex, and several other Amendments which put the liability on the owner, would have been accepted.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Chairman of Committees laid emphasis on the point that no Amendment which sought to put the liability on the owner would be admissible.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We shall see when the time comes what the Chairman of Committees thinks. I am sure the House will think I should not be justified in responding to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman. We wish to prosecute this Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite have had 48 hours for the consideration of the Amendments of my hon. and learned Friend, because they were indicated as clearly as they could possibly be by my hon. and learned Friend yesterday. They are admitted by the right hon. Gentleman himself to be valuable, useful Amendments, involving all the principles required for the settlement of this question, and we shall ask the House to deal with the question, and to deal with it without any loss of time.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I rise to a point of order, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman has just stated to the House that the Amendments now placed on the Paper are Amendments to carry out an Instruction which was defeated by a majority of four. That being so, I ask you whether the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Malden having been negatived on Monday night, it is competent for the Government to place on the Paper Amendments practically in the spirit of that Instruction?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is hardly a question that ought to be addressed to me, but I do not think the Committee would go back on the Instruction.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Will it be possible to issue a Memorandum showing the Amendments, and giving a clear idea of the alterations intended to be made in the Bill?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): For the convenience of Members I have directed that a number of copies of the Bill showing my Amendments shall be deposited at the Vote Office by 5 o'clock.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): On a point of order, Sir, I would put a question to you in reference to a decision of Mr. Speaker Brand in 1880. When Mr. Forster introduced a clause into the Irish Relief Bill as a new means of dealing with relief—namely, that the tenant should be compensated for certain cases of disturbance—the Speaker ruled that a new Bill was required, and a new Bill had to be introduced. Now the House has decided to reject the Instruction carrying out the principle which the Government are embodying in their Amendments. In these circumstances, I ask whether it is not necessary that an entirely new Bill should be brought in which the House may have the opportunity of passing under the ruling of the Chair? And if the Amendments of the Government are proposed, will not the House be deprived of the rulings of the Speaker and—I am not making any complaint—left entirely to the rulings of the Chairman of Committees?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: On the point of order, Sir, I desire to call your attention to the fact that yesterday there stood on the Paper a series of Amendments proposing to change the word "occupier" into "owner," and as far as I could I ascertained these Amendments would not be ruled out of order. The statement I made yesterday was that I should be prepared to accept those Amendments. My present Amendments are to the same effect.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I also rise to the point of order. The Attorney General has missed the point. It was indeed ruled that the word "owner" might be substituted for "occupier," if it was not a matter of being the owner only, instead of the occupier, as an alternative. In the same way the ruling was in respect of distress—that distress could not be struck out of the Bill; it must remain in the Bill as an alternative. But the Government Amendment propose to strike out distress without alternative, and to leave the responsibility on the owner only. But as the right hon. Gentleman insists, I now beg to give notice—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! We must decide upon the point of order first. The hon. and learned Gentleman asks me a question whether an Instruction having been refused by the House, the Amendment might not contravene that Instruction. It will be for the Chairman of Committees to decide when the House is in Committee, whether the Amendments on the Paper are such as can be moved, notwithstanding the refusal of the House to grant the Instruction at an earlier stage. I do not anticipate any discrepancy between the ruling of the Chairman and my own. The Chairman in Committee is within his jurisdiction and considers what is proper and right, and I have every confidence that he will give a right and fair decision.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Perhaps, Sir, I have not made myself clear. What I wish to point out is that on the occasion of the ruling to which I have referred the House was in Committee, and Mr. Speaker Brand decided that the particular Amendment was outside the scope of the Bill. The corresponding question is—the House having refused a particular Instruction, and the Government having put down an Amendment within the scope of that Instruction—is it in order to submit to the Speaker whether the proposed action in Committee can, as a matter of order, be taken, in view of the fact that the particular Amendment in Committee on the Irish Bill was submitted to Mr. Speaker Brand.

*MR. SPEAKER: This matter is, if I may respectfully say so, rather improperly brought before me. It is difficult to say whether the ruling of my predecessors affords an exact parallel to this case. But, as I have said, I am quite content to leave the matter in the hands of the Chairman of Committees, who will deal with the question when it arises. I do not think that any case has been made out for reference to me as Speaker.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg leave to give notice that I shall oppose proceeding with the Tithe Rent Charge Bill to-morrow.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it would not be more decorous, not to say more decent, as the Bill affects the whole agricultural interests, to wait until the new Minister of Agriculture is present to give us his views of the matter.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): There are one or two points I desire to touch upon before we come to a decision. I observe from the Report of the Department that the Technical Education Act of 1887 has, after its two years' test, proved an absolutely dead letter. I predicted, as the Bill was passing through the House, that it would prove a useless measure. The hon. Member for St. Killox is, I think, right in criticising the statistics of the Department, in making the comparison with the state of things in 1872. The figures are undoubtedly misleading, and it is worth the consideration of the Department whether they should not in future give the information the hon. Member suggested. There is one other point to which I wish to refer. The Department is very anxious to encourage the attendance of children in schools. The children in Scotland do not go to school at quite so early an age as the children in England. But I find in this Report two statements which in reality neutralise each other.

The figures are undoubtedly misleading, and it is worth the consideration of the Department whether they should not in future give the information the hon. Member suggested. There is one other point to which I wish to refer. The Department is very anxious to encourage the attendance of children in schools. The children in Scotland do not go to school at quite so early an age as the children in England. But I find in this Report two statements which in reality neutralise each other.

The first is that the children are too long in going to school, and the second is that they leave school too soon. It is, however, admitted that the children in Scotland acquire all the elements of education, and it is admitted that they learn more in less time than the English children—principally, no doubt, in consequence of the superiority of the Scotch schoolmasters. I regret that children leave school at so early an age in Scotland, but I do not lament the absence of very young children from school. In Germany the age at which children go to school is rather higher than it is in Scotland, and I think that what the children lose in education between the ages of four and seven, they more than gain physically, and they lay the foundation of a healthy education afterwards.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I understand that it will be for the convenience of this House if I say now the few words that are necessary in reply to the general observations that have just been made. The hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) has referred to the enormous field of controversy which was traversed by the hon. Member for the St. Rollox Division (Mr. Caldwell) yesterday. The question raised by the hon. Member for St. Rollox is, after all, only indirectly connected with the present Vote, and arises out of a reference made in the Report to the state of matters in 1872. I can most honestly say that the Report states the facts quite fairly. I do not intend to enter into the matter, because it has been discussed at the instance of the hon. Member for St. Rollox every year since this Parliament met. The very same battles have been fought, the very same accusations made, and the very same answers given every year as would be fought, made, and given now if I entered into the question; and accordingly I must reserve the time at my disposal for answering Members who have spoken at less length than the hon. Member for St. Rollox. The hon. Member for Sutherlandshire (Mr. A. Sutherland) has raised a very important question with reference to directing more attention to class instruction and less to individual instruction than has been hitherto the case. That is not a subject which has escaped the attention of the Department in recent years. A great impulse has been given to class instruction, and class subjects are now receiving a greater amount of encouragement than heretofore. I should say further that all the children in the lower standards are now examined in classes, and not individually.

*MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): How high does that go?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: In the three first standards there are only class examinations. The Department has the subject fully in view, and will watch for opportunities of further extending the system. An hon. Member spoke on the subject of drawing, and many representations have been made to the Department on the subject, but I must remind the Committee that it is not a question with which the Education Department is chargeable or which arises upon this Vote. It was practically by the choice of those who are locally in charge of education in Scotland that the present system was adopted. I must refer gentlemen interested in the subject to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Education Department, because he has charge of it and it does not fall within the present Vote. I am not aware that there is any other separate point which was taken except the one raised by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen. He thinks that the figures with regard to technical instruction are not as hopeful as they ought to be. Let us be just. Five School Boards have in operation the necessary procedure for taking advantage of the Act, and it is necessarily a subject in regard to which we cannot expect a very large number of School Boards to take action.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I rise to move the Motion of which I have given notice, the rejection of the amount set down in this Vote for training colleges. I have already had an opportunity of stating my opinions on this subject, and therefore will content myself with the briefest possible statement. My objections to the present system may in the main be said to be two. In the first place all the training colleges are denominational institutions, though the public school Scotland is becoming less and less denominational. In the second place which they profess to do would be better performed by a non-denominational Universities. The Committee is aware that all the training colleges are denominational, and that the public school system of Scotland has year by year become less denominational. The increase in the number of public schools and the decrease in that of the denominational schools observed in previous years has been continued during the past year. Therefore to maintain denominational training colleges is really to act in a spirit out of harmony with that existing in the schools. The Universities are perfectly willing to frame schemes for conducting the work of the training colleges. Of course it is a matter of opinion whether it is possible for them to do the work or not, and what additional facilities they may require to carry it on properly. I want to call attention to what is said in the Report of the Committee of Council on Education upon training colleges, and I venture to submit that the rather guarded references in that Report almost justify me in inferring that my views are really shared by the Scotch Education Department. There is a certain amount of faint praise of the institutions, no doubt, but on the main points on which I have laid stress, I maintain that the spirit of the Report is really in harmony with what I say. Everything they say about the denominational character of the colleges is of an apologetic character, and they state that they are denominational only in name and not so in character and effect. I want to know why they should be denominational in name even, seeing that it is an excellent thing in the eyes of the Education Department that they should not be denominational in character. It appears that these denominational institutions, whatever virtues they may possess in the eyes of the Church, make no successful appeal to the pockets of the churches. As to the question whether the Universities could be usefully employed in connection with this work, I venture to submit that the Report of the Committee of Council is very much in my favour. It lays stress on the encouragement given to the University education of teachers, and indicates clearly that that encouragement will be continued. It also refers to statistics as showing that "not a few of the future Scotch teachers are acquiring some higher culture" in a sphere larger than that of any institution devoted to training alone. Having admitted the desirableness and the necessity of this higher culture in the case of a limited number of students, the Department ought, instead of limiting opportunities in this way, to throw the benefit open to all the students. The Universities have no doubt as to their competency to undertake the work, and, as I have already stated, some of them have prepared schemes which, as far as I have examined them, seem to be perfectly fair. I regret that the date at which we are discussing this matter is so late that there is very little hope of obtaining the opinion of the Scotch Members as a whole. In some other Session, however, I hope we shall be able to raise the question in a more effective fashion.

Motion made, and Question proposed

"That Item H, £28,706, for Annual Grants to Training Colleges, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

*MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I concur with my hon. Friend in regretting that so small a number of Members should be present for the discussion of this interesting question, and especially that there is so small a number from Scotland. The chief difficulty I find in replying to my hon. Friend's attack is that he has referred us to arguments which he has used in former years, but has, with great consideration for the time of the Committee, been exceedingly brief in stating those arguments. The first of them was that the Training Colleges are denominational, whilst the system of education in Scotland is almost entirely undenominational. I admit the force of that argument, but I think it is overstated. I think those who closely examine the system of education in Scotland can hardly deny that there is still a very large denominational element. There is the teaching of religion, and although each School Board in Scotland can do as it pleases in this matter, there is almost invariably a working majority in favour, not only of teaching religion, but also of teaching the old Westminster Catechism. It can hardly be denied that in this respect the schools favour one denomination. I may mention an illustration as having come under the notice of the Committee upon which I had the honour to serve. We had a complaint brought before us from the Episcopalian Training College, that when they had trained their teachers they could not, as a general rule get one of them accepted in Scotland. The Episcopalian schools are usually too poor to employ trained teachers and the Board Schools will not employ Episcopalians, so they have to go to England. So far, therefore, the Scotch Estimates are bearing the cost of training teachers for England. Presbyterian denominationalism is so strong that no Episcopalian would be allowed to teach a Scottish Board School. The other side of the question is that the Training Colleges are much less denominational than is generally supposed. The Committee took evidence from teachers, Inspectors, Training College Authorities, University professors, and others interested in the subject, and they all of them seem to agree in saying that there is next to no denominationalism. The management, no doubt, is entrusted to a particular Church. But members of all Churches attend the Training College, and even serve upon its staff. In fact, it appears that in choosing, say, an Established Church College in preference to a college of some other religious body, the students are influenced by companionship, and considerations of that kind, rather than by regard for denomination. The difficulty I find in attaching much weight to my hon. Friend's authority is, that he has not supplied the want which we find to exist of an alternative system for giving teachers adequate professional training. I do not remember that either on this or on any former occasion he has developed his views—at any rate, so far as he has done so, they are views which nearly all Educational Authorities in Scotland hold to be impracticable. The hon. Member seemed to draw a distinction between the tone of the Report of the Committee of Council this year, and the tone of the Report of the Departmental Committee. I do not know whether he thinks that the two are at variance; but if hon. Members care to consult the Report of the Departmental Committee on Training Colleges they will see that, on the contrary, it laid the foundation for the action taken by the Education Department this year. The first recommendation,

no doubt, is that professional training should be conducted in establishments set apart for that purpose; but it is added that, in order to avoid professional narrowness, it is desirable to combine that training, as far as possible, with a liberal University education. That was the desire of the Committee; that was their recommendation; and the Department states that, in consequence of that recommendation, they are giving further opportunities in the Training Colleges to all who are qualified to profit by University training. But the hon. Member is not content with this. He says that the whole of the teachers should attend the Universities. Let me remind the House how the matter stands in foreign countries. We think a great deal of the German and Swiss systems, but I am not aware that in any country the training of teachers in the Universities is carried anything like so far as it is in Scotland. My hon. Friend spoke as if Scotland were behindhand in this respect, but, on the contrary, I say that Scotland is the one country in Europe which possesses teachers who combine—many of them—University degrees, and more of them some University teaching, with their professional training in the Training Colleges. Now, let me look at the feasibility of the system recommended by my hon. Friend as a whole. We have female teachers, as well as male teachers, who have been pupil teachers in the ordinary schools of Scotland. Can it be contended that the Universities are at present equipped with the requisite machinery for teaching to young girls of that age and class geography, arithmetic, English grammar, singing and sewing? I should be happy to see these girls attending University classes, but many of them are so far from that that it is not there, as many in the can standard arithmetic and the require even if instructi practical the Train man has to undertake this work. But the Departmental Committee conferred with all the Scotch Universities. Those of Edinburgh and Glasgow were not willing. There was no such proposal from those Universities, although there were proposals that the students in training should be set more free to attend University lectures. There had been a proposal that the University of Aberdeen should itself train teachers. We went into the matter with the professors, but, on the whole, the conclusion arrived at was that the University did not see its way to undertake the training unless more favourable financial considerations were allowed than the Government were likely to entertain. St. Andrew's is the one University which is prepared to train teachers, male and female, for the ordinary schools, and, for my part, I should be glad to see the work entrusted to this University. I have pointed out to the Principal of St. Andrew's and to those interested there that there is a recommendation of the Committee on which they may found a claim. It is true that in the body of the Report the Committee did not see their way to recommend direct grants to one of the Universities as a Training College, but the principle was laid down that if any other body should come forward and make themselves responsible in the way that the Training College Authorities do—especially if they assumed financial responsibility—it should have a share in the training of the teachers of Scotland. I should be delighted to see St. Andrew's, in connection it might be with Dundee, organise a Committee and frame a scheme by way of experiment, and if it succeeded, it might then be extended. But it seems idle to propose at present that all teachers should be University men. The country will not go to that expense. I believe that in Scotland we have already more training of elementary teachers at the Universities than is to be found in any other country in Europe, and I do not believe the Universities are willing to undertake more; while if we were to press more upon them I am afraid it would be found that the Universities would become less efficient for the higher purposes which they now subserve. All countries that stand high in regard to education find that an important part of their system is in the creation of teachers; but you cannot create teachers without a special training. It is generally admitted that a young man from a University, whatever honours he may have obtained, when made a School Inspector is not always found thoroughly to understand his work, and the same is true of teachers trained in Universities only. I trust the Department will maintain, but also improve and liberalise the present system of professional training for teachers, combining it as far as may be practicable with attendance in University classes.

*DR. McDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): We have heard a good deal about the teaching of religion in the Scotch Colleges, but the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken knows as well as I do that we have three religious denominations in Scotland—namely, the Free Church, the Established Church and the United Presbyterian Church, and if any one can say that the definite limits of either of these three religious bodies are being taught in any of the schools in Scotland I reply that he is mistaken, and that that is not the case at all. An inspection of our public schools will show that there is really no difference in regard to religious teaching as between Free Church and Established Church. It is to be said that the schools are denominational, because the catechism is taught in them, inasmuch as the catechism is purely Protestant; and applies equally to all three denominations.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: I did not for a moment intend to convey that there was denominationalism as between the Free and Established and the United Presbyterian Churches; but there is as against Catholics and Episcopalians.

*DR. McDONALD: Certainly, they are denominationalist as against Catholics and Episcopalians; but we have hardly any Catholics or Episcopalians in Scotland. Well, the hon. Gentleman talks about denominationalism in the School Boards, and the same answer applies there—namely, that there is really no difference between the Free, Established, and United Presbyterian Churches. There can be no doubt on this point. A great deal has been made of the professional training which is given in these Training Colleges or normal schools, as we call them in Scotland. I myself have been there, I am sorry to say it is now more than 20 years ago, and I know that at that time they did their work admirably. All the time we devoted to professional training was about two or three hours a week; the rest of the time was devoted to the ordinary education given in the secondary schools. But now these schools are to be met with all over Scotland, and especially in the large towns; hence the non-necessity for the higher education which is given in these colleges, the reason for supporting them being as great again then as it is now. Again, we have been told about the bursaries being lost, if given to students in the Universities or in Secondary Schools. The fact is, that they have got into the same position as that in which we find the students in the Training Colleges. We cannot compel these to become teachers. They leave the Training Colleges (though I believe they are now compelled to give two years' teaching) and then they may go away just as those who leave the Universities and in the same way be lost as teachers of education. With regard to the female students, there certainly is a difficulty in their case, and I think it would be found better to keep up one or two Training Colleges for females alone. I have before spoken about the denominational schools, called Free Church Colleges and Established Church Colleges, in Glasgow and Edinburgh. What do we find? Why there are two of these colleges within 200 yards of each other, each maintaining a large staff, so that a double amount of money is expended. Does anyone imagine that the tenets of either the Free or the Established Church are taught within the walls of these Training Colleges? If not, why do we waste money in the keeping up of two large schools which differ in name and in nothing else, when both might be put into one building and served by one staff? I would suggest that this would be a good way of reducing the expenditure on these denominational colleges, in which, at the present time, there is a great waste of power and a large waste of money. This, I think, would be a good and proper beginning.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I understood the hon. Gentleman the Member for Perth (Mr. Parker) to apologise for these denominational schools, but I think the result of his statement goes far to confirm the view which many of us here entertain. He tells us that the pupils from the Episcopalian Training Colleges do not teach in Scotland, but go away to England, because there is no demand for them in Scotland. With regard to what has been said about the other colleges, I have more faith in my countrymen than to believe they are as bigoted as the hon. Gentleman supposes them to be. I cannot believe that our School Boards are so bigoted that a teacher who does not profess the form of religion they affect is not likely to be employed by them. I refuse to believe this. I may say with regard to candidates for Parliament, as to whom my experience has a wider range, the constituencies do not show themselves particularly ready to refuse a man because he is an Episcopalian. I know a great many Episcopalian who represent Scotch constituencies. It is my belief that if ever there was religious bigotry in Scotland it is softening down and gradually disappearing, and in point of fact it can hardly be said to exist at the present time. It may be that the catechism to which allusion has been made is still nominally taught in the colleges; but it is not likely to subsist very long. Public opinion in Scotland with pull all this down. On general grounds I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross-shire, who has pointed out the waste of power, and the unjustifiable expenditure of money for denominational colleges, that are placed side by side in Edinburgh and Glasgow. I do not want to abolish these denominational colleges; but I wish to see a system of education in Scotland which shall be national, and also Training Colleges which shall be under the control of the Government. I am not so clear as to the argument of the hon. Member useful arts in which our schools are to some extent deficient because of the deficiency of the schoolmasters. I admit that something must be done to improve the Universities of Scotland, though I sympathise with what was said by the hon. Member for Perth. The University of St. Andrew's has several very excellent professors, but somehow or other they have never succeeded in the training of schoolmasters. The Duke of Argyll and others tried to popularise the University of St. Andrew's, but they were not able to do so; still I think it might be so modernised as to make a charming University where could be combined the training of young women with the training of young men to fit them as teachers in the highest standards. I do hope the Government will tell us that they intend to get rid of this, to a certain extent, obnoxious denominational system of Training Colleges, and that they will substitute for it a system which is more rational.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The action of the Government towards these Institutions has rested upon most intelligible grounds. Nobody suggests that a priori, or as a matter of theory, there is any necessary connection between the denominationalism of the country and the Training Colleges. We must take things as we find them. We find that there are Training Colleges which are doing their work to the satisfaction of the School Boards. And I emphasise that by saying that it is never to be forgotten that School Boards in many parts of the country almost invariably choose the students of those Training Colleges as teachers. It is suggested that the Universities should take up this business of the training of teachers. As a matter of fact they do not do so, and we have to look to the Training Colleges which are actually existing and which do this work. As to the denominational character of the teaching, the report of the Department is absolutely accurate. There is no shadow or trace of denominational bias in the training of our teachers. I understand that the action of the School Board is very impartial, and they take either the students of the Free Church or the Established Church. There is no overlapping of the work between these different Institutions, and the supply of teachers they send out is not in excess of the requirements of the country. I do not see that any good would be done by throwing the two Colleges into one in Edinburgh and Glasgow. As to the Universities, if you ask them to undertake the training of teachers, the fact of whether they may or may not be adapted to the work is a matter to be watched for the future. Be it observed that the Department have of late years given great and increasing encouragement to the students to attend a University by giving the Colleges allowances to send them there in the third year. Although, therefore, the system of these Training Colleges in the abstract is not perfect in theory, good results come from it, and the money paid by the State is well spent.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Mr. Courtney, we have had so far to apologise for this present system of denominational training. It is very easy to understand the ground on which the right hon. Gentleman defends these institutions. He falls back on the position that "we must take things as we find them." These Colleges are denominational at the present moment; therefore we must not do anything to reform them. If he held out any hope that denominationalism would be got rid of, my view might be changed; but he is prepared so long as he is in authority to maintain denominationalism in the Training Colleges. I do not understand the attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth. Are we to understand that he favours denominationalism? Does he defend these Colleges because there is so much denominationalism in the system of education in Scotland? At any rate, he might have gone this small step with us and protested against this system of denominationalism being kept up. It is perfectly true that these Colleges are kept up at a very considerable and unnecessary expenditure to the taxpayer, because you have in one place two or three different training colleges maintained where one would suffice. The fact that there is no shade of difference, practically speaking, between the principal Churches of Scotland is an additional reason why the Government should not encourage denominationalism by sanctioning the maintenance of denominational Training Colleges in different centres.

pentant mood, and are willing and anxious to discharge what is their true function. I hope that the University Commission will be prepared to recommend to Parliament that some portion of the money now given to these Training Colleges should be given to the Universities, which would do the work much more cheaply, and give the teachers a much higher status and better training than they get at present. The hon. Member for Perth imagines that ladies could not possibly enter the Universities. That is really an antiquated notion. The attendance of ladies at college is so familiar that I should have thought the hon. Member would not have been startled by the suggestion. Certainly the attendance of ladies at colleges has an effect both beneficial to themselves and to the young men who attend. My hon. Friends the Members for Perth and Inverness were the only two Scotch Members of the Committee, and, on reading their Report, what convinced me there was something weak in the position of the Training Colleges was their statement that in the Universities it was impossible to give close attention to the moral and religious training of the teachers. Now, if they could have put forward any tangible result of this training in the colleges, certainly they would have done so; but they have not, and have fallen back upon language vague and obscure. Another objection is that the students are not qualified to attend the University classes. That would be so, if they were asked to attend the whole of the curriculum. But what we suggest is that a special faculty, or course, shall be prepared, alongside medicine, law and divinity, called the faculty of education. That, I think, is the true course which reform should take in Scotland. I can only say with regard to the remarks of the Lord Advocate that I think they show he is open to receive impressions, and to consider the whole state of the case, and I hope we shall find him joining in efforts to enable the Universities to train teachers.

*Mr. S. SMITH (Flintshire): Mr. Courtney, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. I think on this side of the House more stress than is warranted has been laid by some hon. Members there is little or no difference of religious principle between various denominations. We should bear in mind that it is always desirable that those who are to train the young should themselves be brought up carefully and religiously. There is one other observation I would like to make. It has been said that the Universities are capable of giving all the education that those who intend to be teachers required. I am very strongly of opinion that it is not so. The great difficulty is to know how to impart knowledge to others, and I believe that those who intend to take up teaching require special training. Again, I am bound to say that the supervision exercised by the University Authorities is not sufficient. In my time, as long as a young man attended his lectures they did not care what became of him. The consequence was that many of the men who were at the University with me made sad failures in life. I consider it very important that young men and young girls at the impressionable ages of 15 to 18 should be under some sort of supervision, and that supervision will be best obtained at the hands of religious bodies.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford): I must apologise to Scotch Members for interfering in the Debate at this stage, but as my hon. Friend has broken the ice I will follow him. In the first place, I may be allowed to say that I do not think my hon. Friend is a bad specimen of the training of the Scotch University. In the great Universities of this country, when they were par excellence religious Institutions, there was as large a percentage of failures as ever came out of the Scotch Universities, where no regard is supposed to have been paid to the religious welfare of the students. The English people are conscious that upon educational, as well as upon other matters, Scotland always leads the way for Great Britain, and when the subject now under discussion is definitely settled it will be easier for England to follow in the wake of Scotland. These separate Training Colleges are kept up on the one side for the purpose of getting quit of the Establishment, and on the other for the purpose of maintaining it. Why cannot the Presbyterians of Scotland combine, no difference in

The case for the Training Colleges in Scotland is weaker than it is in England, where it is considered of the first importance that doctrinal differences should be recognised and emphasised. In Scotland no effort of the kind is necessary, because they are all of one opinion. For my own part I think the Universities would be eminently qualified to do the work which is now being done by the Training Colleges. I believe much harm is done in this country to young people by compelling them to recognise denominational differences. I think Scotland is quite right in demanding this change, and it cannot be long before it is conceded.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I have to thank, on behalf of Scotch Liberals, the hon. Member for Bradford, for having, by taking part in this Debate, added another to the many debts we owe him for his fearless, long continued and consistent advocacy of Liberal principles. Sir, this Debate has sounded the death knell of denominationalism in Scotland, particularly after what has fallen from the Lord Advocate. He said that we were not dealing with these Institutions de novo, which is an abandonment of the entire principle on which they are founded. He went on to say that these Colleges are kept up by denominational Institutions. But what I want to point out is this, that they are kept up, not by the denominations, but by the public money. The right hon. Gentleman said the Universities are not ready to train teachers. Of course they are not. He knows that they cannot be expected to be ready so long as the State keeps these Training Colleges at its own expense. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) has quoted the Member for Perth in support of the denominational character of these Institutions, and I can only hope he will not think me rude when I say that I am glad he is not a Scotchman. The hon. Member for Perth made one significant remark. He said:—

That observation expresses what used to be the spirit of the Privy Council's system; but I feel pretty sure that the Scotch Educational Department are too liberal to be prompted by such a spirit, which would mean that you would deliberately mutilate the training of young men in order that they should not be fitted to enter any other profession than that of teaching. There is most force in the objection of my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Sutherland), that the Universities cannot do this work. But I do not propose that they should undertake the work without special provision being made for them. I do not see why the business of the Training Colleges should not be brought within the University system, just as is the professional training of lawyers, ministers, and doctors. Now, my hon. Friend expressed some little doubt about the value of University training. I am deeply impressed with the high value of University training, and I believe that the Universities, both in England and Scotland, afford by far the finest and best intellectual training that anyone could have. What I object to is this—that you should divorce those who are to teach the children of the country from this higher intellectual culture. It is not the mere Degree which gives this University training a high value. It is rather what I may call the moral education and intellectual culture obtained, not so much in reading for the Degree and in listening to the lectures, as in the common membership of the University system. It is not what the professors teach the students that is valuable in University life, but it is what the students teach each other. If you insist upon excluding schoolmasters to whom the destinies of the children of the future are to be entrusted, I think you will be inflicting a grievous harm upon that body. I believe that the people of Scotland at large are entirely in sympathy with the stand which is now being made for the freeing of the Training Colleges from all connection with

Aberdeen and University College, Dundee, are desirous to undertake it, and I believe that, under proper management, these three Institutions could easily take over the 860 normal scholars and perform the work of training them quite as well as it is being conducted under the sectarian system.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I want to clear up one point. I understand that the sum to be devoted to the Training Colleges is considerably in excess of that voted last year, and I am told that if we did not take advantage of these Institutions we should have to pay a great deal more. The hon. Member for Dundee asserts, however, that the denominations contribute nothing towards the expense of these schools, but that on the contrary they make a profit out of them. I should like to know if it is so, and if the schools are maintained solely and exclusively at the expense of the taxpayer. Again, I find that every pupil trained in these schools costs £35 per year. That seems to me to be an enormous expenditure, and if that is to be the result of a system of maintaining two or three denominational colleges, all I can say is that it is an abominable abuse, even from a financial point of view. I again ask, do these denominational bodies contribute towards the expenses of the colleges.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: The hon. Member for Dundee seems to think that I, in my observations, depreciated the value of University training. Now, if my remarks seemed to do that I wish at once to say that it was not my desire to convey that impression. I should like to point out to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, when he refers to the cost of the pupils in these Training Colleges, that the sum of £35 represents much more than the mere cost of education, and that the cost of living is included.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy may be stated very briefly. It is that the amount of the grant is 75 per cent of the approved expenditure.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I am going to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, because I hold that the course now taken by the Education Department in certain matters ~~is~~ it desirable that the present system should be altogether abolished. At the present time a teacher who is certified by these Training Colleges only earns a Government grant of 4s. per head for all pupils he passes in scientific subjects; whereas if the teacher is a University graduate the Government grant in such cases is 10s. per head, although the pupils pass exactly the same examination. It is hard that teachers who get practically the same qualification should thus be handicapped in the matter of Government grant for scientific subjects, and I think the difference ought to be done away with. My hon. Friend seems to think that the students in Training Colleges are boarded and lodged there. As a matter of fact, the student is treated in exactly the same way as a University student. He lives in lodgings. He goes to his class and back again, and nobody takes any more notice of him.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 146.—(Div. List, No. 307.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. HUNTER: I move to reduce this Vote by a sum of £1,316, the amount proposed to be paid to Professors of Theological Chairs in the Universities of Scotland during the current year. I wish to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary expense connected with the education of divinity students. The sum at the disposal of the University of Aberdeen for divinity students is £1,921 a year. Taking an average of three years, this amount has been spent in the education of about 30 students, so that each student costs no less than £62 a year. The medical endowments are smaller than those for divinity; but the number of students in medicine is more than 10 times the number of divinity students, while the cost is only £4 16s. per student. In St. Andrew's University the endowments for divinity amount to £1,800 a year, the number of students, taking an average of three years, being 33, so that the cost is £56 5s. per head.

This seems to be very exorbitant, but the difference is still more striking in the case of Edinburgh University. The University of Edinburgh has an income of £1,944 for divinity and the number of students was 107; while the endowments for medicine amounted to £1,766, the number of medical students being 1,879. So that the cost per medical student is 19s., and for each divinity student £18 3s. Taking the whole of Scotland, the endowments for medicine amount to £5,800, and there are 3,000 students, the cost being less than £1 per head. The endowments for divinity amounted to £7,664, and the students numbered 278 only. Therefore, on grounds of financial economy alone, we ought to stop the grants for these Theological Chairs. But when we add the fact that the students who are taught in these Universities are only the theological students belonging to the Established Church, we find that more than one-third of the total endowment of the Universities of Scotland—over £7,000 a year—is devoted to the education of divinity students belonging to one only of the numerous denominations to be found in Scotland. This is a scandalous evil, and I have thought it desirable that the Committee should know the facts I have stated. I hold that it is entirely contrary to sound policy and to justice that taxes which are collected from all religious denominations should be applied for the purpose of educating only those who are connected with the Established Church.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £11,588, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Hunter.)

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): The hon. Member has based his Motion on a number of calculations which he has made, and which for the moment I am not in a position to controvert, but if they are all of the same inaccurate character as the figures relating to St. Andrew's University I cannot receive them with absolute faith. The number of divinity students given for St. Andrew's for instance, falls very far short of the actual number in attendance.

MR. HUNTER: I gave the average for three years.

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: The hon. Member may be right in his average, but what I say is that the actual number in attendance last session was 48. The hon. Member also referred to the point raised during the discussion on the Universities Bill by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy—namely, that many men who do not intend to follow the theological profession enter the theological classes. I have made inquiries on the point, and I am informed that that is an entire mistake: that there may be isolated cases of the kind, but that they form so small a proportion of the whole as not to be worth taking into account at all. Inasmuch as the general question raised by the hon. Gentleman has been so recently discussed, I think I shall best consult the convenience of the Committee if I refer the hon. Gentleman to the arguments which were used in the Debates upon the Universities Bill, and do not pursue the subject further on the present occasion.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am not willing to accept a general statement in contradiction of the general statement I made. If the Solicitor General has statistics I shall be very happy to stand corrected; unless he has, I do not think the question is fully set at rest. One word with regard to the present number of students in St. Andrew's being 48. I do not know how that has been brought about, but I know that a very few years ago there were only 18 students. I regret that my hon. Friend proposes to refuse the whole of the Vote for Theological Chairs in Scotland. I am not anxious to raise the question, because I think it will come up along with the question of the Disestablishment of the Church. I these students at St. Andrew's. Let me read out the figures for the last 10 years. In 1878-79 there were 22, the next year 20, the next year 20, the next year 24, the next year 22, the next year 24, the next year 28, the next year 34, the next year 38, and last year 42. The Solicitor General makes the number last year 48, but the difference is not significant; it would only reduce the cost from £54 or £56 to £40. I contend that £10 would be an extravagant sum considering the resources of the Scotch Universities, but when you add the fact that these are denominational Colleges the argument becomes stronger. I beg leave to dispute the doctrine that this is part of the question of disestablishment. A Disestablishment Bill would have nothing whatever to do with the Universities.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 123.—(Div. List, No. 308.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £1,900, National Gallery, &c., Scotland.

DR. CLARK: At this late period of the Session I do not intend to oppose this Vote; but I beg to give notice that next year I shall move to reduce the Vote, in order to raise the question of the advisability of transferring the control of the National Gallery from the Board of Trustees of Manufactures to the Secretary for Scotland.

Vote agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I am glad to find a restoration of the "grant in aid of examples to local museums." The withdrawal of that grant has been very disadvantageous, and I personally would have liked to see the item standing at the figure it did formerly. I also regret the decrease in the item for the reproduction of works of art. Although I have no doubt the Vice President of the Council will be able to offer to the Committee a satisfactory explanation of the demands of the country in this respect, or a diminution in the capacity of the Science and Art Department to satisfy those requirements. I am sure the Committee will feel these are amongst the most satisfactory forms of expenditure we can have. Notwithstanding that, from time to time, trenchant criticism is indulged in, there is in the country—especially in the industrial, manufacturing, and commercial districts—a strong feeling that very valuable service is rendered by the Science and Art Department. With regard to the items which show a diminution, it is very possible the right hon. Gentleman may allude to the scarcity of the space at the disposal of the authorities at South Kensington, which necessarily cripples their power with regard particularly to the reproduction of works of art. Anyone who has been to South Kensington recently and seen the conditions under which much of the work has to be carried on must feel there is great need for further enlargement. The cramped condition under which the revision of the work sent up for competition is to be carried on is really little short of a scandal. I have no hesitation in pressing this particular point, because I know how zealous the right hon. Gentleman is for the efficiency of his own Department. I only hope the First Lord of the Treasury or some other authority will be equally sympathetic when the facts are pressed upon their attention by the Department, and cause the deficiencies to be made good.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am glad my hon. Friend commends the step we are taking in respect to the two very important matters connected with the working of the Science and Art Department he has referred to. I entirely agree with the hon. Member as to the necessity for increasing the space at South Kensington allotted for the reproduction of works of art. The state of things in connection with reproduction of objects of art is eminently unsatisfactory, and I shall not relax my efforts until they have been improved. With regard to the reductions of the amount of grants of which the hon. Gentleman has complained, I shall keep a careful watch over the matter, and if I find that the efficiency is being lost in consequence of those reductions, I shall make an appeal to the Treasury on the subject.

DR. CLARK: I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000. We vote for the College of Science in Jermyn Street and its museum, nearly £20,000. The result is, that the Scotchmen who study applied science are very heavily handicapped; while the English students are taught at the expense of the State and are granted bursaries, so that they may be boarded during the time they are studying, the Government have again and again refused to give a single farthing for the teaching of applied science in Scotland. We have the Heriot Watt School near the Edinburgh University, but it is supported entirely by the fees of the students, and by such endowments as can be got. Ireland receives a grant of £7,000 for the Science School. The proper thing to do is to reduce the London School to the level of the Dublin School, and then, perhaps, Scotland can be fairly treated in this matter.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I hope the hon. Gentleman will not move his Amendment at this stage, in order that one or two points connected with examinations can be dealt with.

DR. CLARK: Then I will not move the Amendment now.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President one or two questions in regard to the examinations in Science and Art. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that of late attempts have been made in Wales to extend the teaching of agriculture. From the report of the inspector I find that much progress has been made, and we may anticipate further progress next year. But there is a difficulty owing to the refusal of the South Kensington officials to allow a certain number of the candidates to be examined in Welsh. I am sure that from his knowledge of the condition of education in Wales the right hon. Gentleman knows that here is a real and practical difficulty. Hitherto the system of teaching English has been such that the children in the rural districts on leaving school lose all the knowledge of the English language they may have acquired. This is owing to the unintelligible way in which the Instruction is given, and the right hon. Gentleman has acknowledged this in the Code for the year. Under the old bad and expensive system, with large expenditure, little result has been attained in imparting sufficient knowledge of English to allow of these examinations being passed in English, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to promise that a certain number of the candidates, they will not, I think, be a very large number, shall be allowed the alternative of examination conducted in the Welsh language. I admit that there may be a present difficulty, from the fact that the examiners do not understand Welsh, but really no effort has been made to find anyone who can examine in Welsh or translate Welsh examination papers for the English examiners. When an application in this direction was made from Bangor University, it was met by a naked refusal, no attempt being made to comply with the request, but I now hope that we may have some definite and specific promise that an effort shall be made otherwise. I must formally move the reduction of the Vote by £50.

MR. CONWAY: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that complaints have been made against the system of delivering lectures on the production of lace in Ireland. The visits of the lecturer are too few, and they are delivered at places too distant from each other; for instance, they are delivered in Waterford one day and in Cork the next. I see there is an item in the Vote—£50 for lectures in Ireland, and I presume that is for the expenses of Mr. Alan Cole. I take no exception to this gentleman as a lecturer, and I do not think that £50 is sufficient remuneration for raise has reference to agricultural education in Ireland. By a recent rule of the Education Department the children in the best classes—the second stage of Class 5 and the first stage of Class 6—in Ireland are excluded from examination in agriculture, and accordingly from the South Kensington grant. We know the difficulty in this country of keeping children at school until they are able to reach the sixth standard, and in Ireland where so many demands are made upon our children at certain seasons, the difficulty is greater. This rule will affect the children who have reached the second stage of Class 5, who will be excluded from the Kensington grant, and must be satisfied with the grant from the National Commissioners in Ireland. In Ireland agriculture is a very interesting and popular branch of study. By school farms and school gardens we give practical illustration of the teachings of textbooks, and with the result that of 863 candidates presented for examination, 630 have passed, earning amounts from 10s. to 40s. The grants from South Kensington do not exceed the latter amount, so that it is not so much a monetary consideration but the Kensington certificate that is valued, for it is a severe test of efficiency. But by the new rule the best children are prevented from undergoing these examinations and from participation in the grants. The reason for the Vote is, I believe, the overlapping of the grants from Kensington and from the National Commissioners as set forth in the Appropriation Accounts. But what I would urge on the South Kensington Authorities is this, that they should institute an interchange of lists. Lists might be furnished by the teachers in the respective schools of the pupils presented in the subject of Agriculture, and the Commissioners might determine which boys have passed or not, and these lists might be interchanged with those from South Kensington. It would only mean a little additional clerical work, but this the Department are very averse to. I think by the means I suggest the little friction that has arisen might be overcome. As I have said, the desire for the Kensington examination arises from the fact of the test having more value than that of the National Commissioners; it is not a monetary question. I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman can give me some satisfactory assurances with regard to the two points I have raised.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I do not object to this South Kensington expenditure for science and art teaching, and believe that in the main it is wisely administered, but it strikes me that much of the expenditure is too much concentrated in London, and that it would be much more effective if diffused among various centres throughout the country. This applies to expenditure under many heads, but confining myself to mining especially it strikes me that London is about the worst centre for a Mining School that you can have, for no mining is carried on within a hundred miles of London. Some 30 years ago I had the pleasure of assisting in the establishment of a Mining School in Bristol. Of course it is in a small way as compared with the Metropolitan establishments, but in its way I think it has done more practical good than the more pretentious and more ambitious work carried on in London. If schools of this class were encouraged in the different mining centres much more would be done to encourage the teaching of mining science and much towards the development of our mining resources, upon which the future of the country so much depends. I will not criticise the Estimates in detail, but I would just observe that a good deal too much is expended on salaries.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I know the hon. Member for Merionethshire will not attempt to convict me of any want of sympathy with him on the point he has raised. As the hon. Member knows, I have gone to extreme limits in the new Code, in order to meet the point raised with reference to scholars being examined through the medium of the Welsh language. I only wish the new task he sets me were as easy of accomplishment as that with which I have endeavoured to deal in the new Code. I should like to explain the difficulties of the position if only to show the hon. Member that the matter has been carefully considered. These science examinations take place simultaneously, and are distinct from the examinations in elementary subjects. They take the form of examination papers, and are not conducted by

there, I am sorry to say it is now more than 20 years ago, and I know that at that time they did their work admirably. All the time we devoted to professional training was about two or three hours a week; the rest of the time was devoted to the ordinary education given in the secondary schools. But now these schools are to be met with all over Scotland, and especially in the large towns; hence the non-necessity for the higher education which is given in these colleges, the reason for supporting them being as great again then as it is now. Again, we have been told about the bursaries being lost, if given to students in the Universities or in Secondary Schools. The fact is, that they have got into the same position as that in which we find the students in the Training Colleges. We cannot compel these to become teachers. They leave the Training Colleges (though I believe they are now compelled to give two years' teaching) and then they may go away just as those who leave the Universities and in the same way be lost as teachers of education. With regard to the female students, there certainly is a difficulty in their case, and I think it would be found better to keep up one or two Training Colleges for females alone. I have before spoken about the denominational schools, called Free Church Colleges and Established Church Colleges, in Glasgow and Edinburgh. What do we find? Why there are two of these colleges within 200 yards of each other, each maintaining a large staff, so that a double amount of money is expended. Does anyone imagine that the tenets of either the Free or the Established Church are taught within the walls of these Training Colleges? If not, why do we waste money in the keeping up of two large schools which differ in name and in nothing else, when both might be put into one building and served by one staff? I would suggest that this would be a good way of reducing the expenditure on these denominational colleges, in which, at the present time, there is a great waste of power and a large waste of money. This, I think, would be a good and proper beginning.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I understood the hon. Gentleman the Member for Perth (Mr. Parker) to apologise for these denominational schools, but I think the result of his statement goes far to confirm the view which many of us here entertain. He tells us that the pupils from the Episcopalian Training Colleges do not teach in Scotland, but go away to England, because there is no demand for them in Scotland. With regard to what has been said about the other colleges, I have more faith in my countrymen than to believe they are as bigoted as the hon. Gentleman supposes them to be. I cannot believe that our School Boards are so bigoted that a teacher who does not profess the form of religion they affect is not likely to be employed by them. I refuse to believe this. I may say with regard to candidates for Parliament, as to whom my experience has a wider range, the constituencies do not show themselves particularly ready to refuse a man because he is an Episcopalian. I know a great many Episcopals who represent Scotch constituencies. It is my belief that if ever there was religious bigotry in Scotland it is softening down and gradually disappearing, and in point of fact it can hardly be said to exist at the present time. It may be that the catechism to which allusion has been made is still nominally taught in the colleges; but it is not likely to subsist very long. Public opinion in Scotland with pull all this down. On general grounds I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ross-shire, who has pointed out the waste of power, and the unjustifiable expenditure of money for denominational colleges, that are placed side by side in Edinburgh and Glasgow. I do not want to abolish these denominational colleges; but I wish to see a system of education in Scotland which shall be national, and also Training Colleges which shall be under the control of the Government. I am not so clear as to useful arts in which our schools are to some extent deficient because of the deficiency of the schoolmasters. I admit that something must be done to improve the Universities of Scotland, though I sympathise with what was said by the hon. Member for Perth. The University of St. Andrew's has several very excellent professors, but somehow or other they have never succeeded in the training of schoolmasters. The Duke of Argyll and others tried to popularise the University of St. Andrew's, but they were not able to do so; still I think it might be so modernised as to make a charming University where could be combined the training of young women with the training of young men to fit them as teachers in the highest standards. I do hope the Government will tell us that they intend to get rid of this, to a certain extent, obnoxious denominational system of Training Colleges, and that they will substitute for it a system which is more rational.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The action of the Government towards these Institutions has rested upon most intelligible grounds. Nobody suggests that a priori, or as a matter of theory, there is any necessary connection between the denominationalism of the country and the Training Colleges. We must take things as we find them. We find that there are Training Colleges which are doing their work to the satisfaction of the School Boards. And I emphasise that by saying that it is never to be forgotten that School Boards in many parts of the country almost invariably choose the students of those Training Colleges as teachers. It is suggested that the Universities should take up this business of the training of teachers. As a matter of fact they do not do so, and we have to look to the Training Colleges which are actually existing and which do this work. As to the denominational character of the teaching, the report of the Department is absolutely accurate. There is no shadow or trace of denominational bias in the training of our teachers. I understand that the action of the School Board is very impartial, and they take either the students of the Free Church or the Established Church. There is no overlapping of the work between these different Institutions, and the supply of teachers they send out is not in excess of the requirements of the country. I do not see that any good would be done by throwing the two Colleges into one in Edinburgh and Glasgow. As to the Universities, if you ask them to undertake the training of teachers, the fact of whether they may or may not be adapted to the work is a matter to be watched for the future. Be it observed that the Department have of late years given great and increasing encouragement to the students to attend a University by giving the Colleges allowances to send them there in the third year. Although, therefore, the system of these Training Colleges in the abstract is not perfect in theory, good results come from it, and the money paid by the State is well spent.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): Mr. Courtney, we have had so far to apologise for this present system of denominational training. It is very easy to understand the ground on which the right hon. Gentleman defends these institutions. He falls back on the position that "we must take things as we find them." These Colleges are denominational at the present moment; therefore we must not do anything to reform them. If he held out any hope that denominationalism would be got rid of, my view might be changed; but he is prepared so long as he is in authority to maintain denominationalism in the Training Colleges. I do not understand the attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth. Are we to understand that he favours denominationalism? Does he defend these Colleges because there is so much denominationalism in the system of education in Scotland? At any rate, he might have gone this small step with us and protested against this system of denominationalism being kept up. It is perfectly true that these Colleges are kept up at a very considerable and unnecessary expenditure to the taxpayer, because you have in one place two or three different training colleges maintained where one would suffice. The fact that there is no shade of difference, practically speaking, between the principal Churches of Scotland is an additional reason why the Government should not encourage denominationalism by sanctioning the maintenance of denominational Training Colleges in different centres.

*MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Sir, I was rather astonished to hear the argument used by the Lord Advocate, that, because these Training Colleges exist, therefore we are bound to carry them on. That argument might have been applied in favour of continuing the old parish schools at the time of the Act of 1872. I think the whole argument lies in the waste of money involved in keeping different colleges in close proximity. I have no objection to these Training Colleges, and think they are doing the work imposed upon them. At the same time I do not agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. E. Robertson) that the Universities are qualified to do the work of training teachers. The work of the Training Colleges is well done; but that is no reason why it should continue to be done by the denominations. It is all very well for the Lord Advocate to say that there is no connection between the schools and denominations in the colleges; but my experience has been that teachers from a Training College have got appointments simply because they belonged to a certain Church. I vote for the Amendment as a protest against these institutions being carried on, really, as I understand, at a profit. The whole of this money for the maintenance of these colleges is public money, not supplemented to any extent by money derived from the denominations. I do not say that the money has not been economically spent, or spent in the best way; all I wish to do is to make my protest against the continuance of this system. If I saw any disposition to put an end to it I should be content to give them an opportunity. But no such policy has been manifested by the Scotch Department, and, deprecating the absence of such a policy, I shall support the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

*MR. HUNTER: Sir, there is one point which has not been brought before

The Schoolmasters' of the North of Scotland are excellent, intelligent, and as there are in is their unanimous most desirable to make training schools for; agreed that the Universities at present moment have of Training Colleges;

but it is suggested that it is possible, if they are encouraged, for them to find the means to give effect to the principle laid down in the statement for the University of Edinburgh; that the teaching, like all other of the learned professions, ought to be provided for in the University curriculum. One reason why my hon. Friend has brought forward his Amendment is that we are anxious to impress upon the University Commissioners the propriety of directing their attention to this subject. At present the Education Department spend £30,000 a year on Training Colleges in which there are only 860 students being taught. The number of the students in the Scotch Universities, on the other hand, amounts to over 6,000, yet the cost to the nation is no more than the expenditure on the Training Colleges. The teachers in the North are very anxious that some portion of this money should be given to the Universities under a properly devised scheme. It would be entirely impossible for the Universities to undertake the work with their existing funds. If the change were made, a great saving would be effected to the public exchequer, because, whereas each student at present costs the nation £35, the cost under the Universities would be very much smaller for obtaining an adequate supply of teachers. Another consideration which weighs with the teachers in the North of Scotland is, that the status and pay of teachers would be raised. The State at present tempts a certain number into the teaching profession by giving them a gratuitous education. In that way the salaries of teachers are depressed below a proper level, and the consequence is that School-Boards find that they can get certificated teachers from these Colleges at a rate at which they could not hope to obtain them, had the students to pay for their education as in all other professions. I pentant mood, and are willing and anxious to discharge what is their true function. I hope that the University Commission will be prepared to recommend to Parliament that some portion of the money now given to these Training Colleges should be given to the Universities, which would do the work much more cheaply, and give the teachers a much higher status and better training than they get at present. The hon. Member for Perth imagines that ladies could not possibly enter the Universities. That is really an antiquated notion. The attendance of ladies at college is so familiar that I should have thought the hon. Member would not have been startled by the suggestion. Certainly the attendance of ladies at colleges has an effect both beneficial to themselves and to the young men who attend. My hon. Friends the Members for Perth and Inverness were the only two Scotch Members of the Committee, and, on reading their Report, what convinced me there was something weak in the position of the Training Colleges was their statement that in the Universities it was impossible to give close attention to the moral and religious training of the teachers. Now, if they could have put forward any tangible result of this training in the colleges, certainly they would have done so; but they have not, and have fallen back upon language vague and obscure. Another objection is that the students are not qualified to attend the University classes. That would be so, if they were asked to attend the whole of the curriculum. But what we suggest is that a special faculty, or course, shall be prepared, alongside medicine, law and divinity, called the faculty of education. That, I think, is the true course which reform should take in Scotland. I can only say with regard to the remarks of the Lord Advocate that I think they show he is open to receive impressions, and to consider the whole state of the case, and I hope we shall find him joining in efforts to enable the Universities to train teachers.

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): Mr. Courtney, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. I think on this side of the House more stress than is warranted has been laid by some hon. Members on the description of Training Colleges as "denominational." In Scotland

there is little or no difference of religious principle between various denominations. We should bear in mind that it is always desirable that those who are to train the young should themselves be brought up carefully and religiously. These is one other observation I would like to make. It has been said that the Universities are capable of giving all the education that those who intend to be teachers required. I am very strongly of opinion that it is not so. The great difficulty is to know how to impart knowledge to others, and I believe that those who intend to take up teaching require special training. Again, I am bound to say that the supervision exercised by the University Authorities is not sufficient. In my time, as long as a young man attended his lectures they did not care what became of him. The consequence was that many of the men who were at the University with me made sad failures in life. I consider it very important that young men and young girls at the impressionable ages of 15 to 18 should be under some sort of supervision, and that supervision will be best obtained at the hands of religious bodies.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford): I must apologise to Scotch Members for interfering in the Debate at this stage, but as my hon. Friend has broken the ice I will follow him. In the first place, I may be allowed to say that I do not think my hon. Friend is a bad specimen of the training of the Scotch University. In the great Universities of this country, when they were par excellence religious Institutions, there was as large a percentage of failures as ever came out of the Scotch Universities, where no regard is supposed to have been paid to the religious welfare of the students. The English people are conscious that upon educational, as well as upon other matters, Scotland always leads the way for Great Britain, and when the subject now under discussion is definitely settled it will be easier for England to follow in the wake of Scotland. These separate Training Colleges are kept up on the one side for the purpose of getting quit of the Establishment, and on the other for the purpose of maintaining it. Why cannot the Presbyterians of Scotland combine, seeing there is really no difference in their religious tenets? The case for the Training Colleges in Scotland is weaker than it is in England, where it is considered of the first importance that doctrinal differences should be recognised and emphasised. In Scotland no effort of the kind is necessary, because they are all of one opinion. For my own part I think the Universities would be eminently qualified to do the work which is now being done by the Training Colleges. I believe much harm is done in this country to young people by compelling them to recognise denominational differences. I think Scotland is quite right in demanding this change, and it cannot be long before it is conceded.

Mr. E. ROBERTSON: I have to thank, on behalf of Scotch Liberals, the hon. Member for Bradford, for having, by taking part in this Debate, added another to the many debts we owe him for his fearless, long continued and consistent advocacy of Liberal principles. Sir, this Debate has sounded the death knell of denominationalism in Scotland, particularly after what has fallen from the Lord Advocate. He said that we were not dealing with these Institutions de novo, which is an abandonment of the entire principle on which they are founded. He went on to say that these Colleges are kept up by denominational Institutions. But what I want to point out is this, that they are kept up, not by the denominations, but by the public money. The right hon. Gentleman said the Universities are not ready to train teachers. Of course they are not. He knows that they cannot be expected to be ready so long as the State keeps these Training Colleges at its own expense. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Smith) has quoted the Member for Perth in support of the denominational character of these Institutions, and I can only hope he will not think me rude when I say that I am glad he is not a Scotchman. The hon. Member for Perth made one significant remark. He said:—

That observation expresses what need to be the spirit of the Privy Council's system; but I feel pretty sure that the Scotch Educational Department are too liberal to be prompted by such a spirit, which would mean that you would liberately mutilate the training of young men in order that they should not be fitted to enter any other profession than that of teaching. There is most force in the objection of my hon. Friend (Mr. A. Sutherland), that the Universities cannot do this work. But I do not propose that they should undertake the work without special provision being made for them. I do not see why the business of the Training Colleges should not be brought within the University system, just as is the professional training of lawyers, ministers, and doctors. Now, my hon. Friend expressed some little doubt about the value of University training. I am deeply impressed with the high value of University training, and I believe that the Universities, both in England and Scotland, afford by far the finest and best intellectual training that anyone could have. What I object to is this—that you should divorce those who are to teach the children of the country from this higher intellectual culture. It is not the mere Degree which gives this University training a high value. It is rather what I may call the moral education and intellectual culture obtained, not so much in reading for the Degree and in listening to the lectures, as in the common membership of the University system. It is not what the professors teach the students that is valuable in University life, but it is what the students teach each other. If you insist upon excluding schoolmasters to whom the destinies of the children of the future are to be entrusted, I think you will be inflicting a grievous harm upon that body. I believe that the people of Scotland at large are entirely in sympathy with the stand which is now being made for the freeing of the Training Colleges from all connection with denominational schools, and enabling school higher intelligence to be provided for system. I desire, that Universities should be a of students this work University but I have University Aberdeen, undertake

Mr. Illingworth

Aberdeen and University College, Dundee, are desirous to undertake it, and I believe that, under proper management, these three Institutions could easily take over the 860 normal scholars and perform the work of training them quite as well as it is being conducted under the sectarian system.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I want to clear up one point. I understand that the sum to be devoted to the Training Colleges is considerably in excess of that voted last year, and I am told that if we did not take advantage of these Institutions we should have to pay a great deal more. The hon. Member for Dundee asserts, however, that the denominations contribute nothing towards the expense of these schools, but that on the contrary they make a profit out of them. I should like to know if it is so, and if the schools are maintained solely and exclusively at the expense of the taxpayer. Again, I find that every pupil trained in these schools costs £35 per year. That seems to me to be an enormous expenditure, and if that is to be the result of a system of maintaining two or three denominational colleges, all I can say is that it is an abominable abuse, even from a financial point of view. I again ask, do these denominational bodies contribute towards the expenses of the colleges.

*MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND: The hon. Member for Dundee seems to think that I, in my observations, depreciated the value of University training. Now, if my remarks seemed to do that I wish at once to say that it was not my desire to convey that impression. I should like to point out to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, when he refers to the cost of the pupils in these Training Colleges, that the sum of £35 represents much more than the mere cost of education, and that the cost of living is included.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy may be stated very briefly. It is that the amount of the grant is 75 per cent of the approved expenditure.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I am going to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, because I hold that the course now taken by the Education Department in certain matters makes it desirable that the present system should be altogether abolished. At the present time a teacher who is certified by these Training Colleges only earns a Government grant of 4s. per head for all pupils he passes in scientific subjects; whereas if the teacher is a University graduate the Government grant in such cases is 10s. per head, although the pupils pass exactly the same examination. It is hard that teachers who get practically the same qualification should thus be handicapped in the matter of Government grant for scientific subjects, and I think the difference ought to be done away with. My hon. Friend seems to think that the students in Training Colleges are boarded and lodged there. As a matter of fact, the student is treated in exactly the same way as a University student. He lives in lodgings. He goes to his class and back again, and nobody takes any more notice of him.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 146.—(Div. List, No. 307.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. HUNTER: I move to reduce this Vote by a sum of £1,316, the amount proposed to be paid to Professors of Theological Chairs in the Universities of Scotland during the current year. I wish to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary expense connected with the education of divinity students. The sum at the disposal of the University of Aberdeen for divinity students is £1,921 a year. Taking an average of three years, this amount has been spent in the education of about 30 students, so that each student costs no less than £62 a year. The medical endowments are smaller than those for divinity; but the number of students in medicine is more than 10 times the number of divinity students, while the cost is only £4 16s. per student. In St. Andrew's University the endowments for divinity amount to £1,800 a year, the number of students, taking an average of three years, being 33, so that the cost is £56 5s. per head.

said that the officials of the British Museum, with the dry light of science and impartiality in politics, were on the side of the Times. Now, the only excuse we have offered is that these officials acted after office hours. But does this make men purblind; is it an excuse that they made asses of themselves after office hours? If that is the defence, they are not fit to receive their salaries. If these gentlemen are asses after office hours, surely they will be asses in office hours. But the antecedent question is, what right had these gentlemen to intervene in this business at all? But having intervened and having brought the light of their intellects to bear, what was the result? If these experts could not find out the hand of Richard Pigott, how on earth can they find out the stamp of Julius Cæsar? What are we to think of what are called the resources of civilisation in their hands? The absolute fraud and humbug of these letters might have been demonstrated at the cost of a few shillings and a microscope. Why, by throwing a magnified photographic representation of these forgeries on a screen one could see that they were as full of composition and decomposition as a pond of fetid water is full of animalculæ. One could see the whole plan of the forgery as elaborately traced as M. de Lesseps' plan of the Panama Canal. I attack the action of the officials of the British Museum on the ground of their scientific incompetence as well as on political grounds. But I have a third proposition to make, and it is with reference to the action of these gentlemen in connection with the files of newspapers. The hon. Baronet says that what they did they did under legal conditions. What were the legal conditions? I apprehend it is quite impossible to serve a subpoena on the British Museum. I do not see how you could serve a subpoena on the British Museum to produce the files of newspapers. I will not discuss the legal conditions, but I say that to serve a subpoena duces tecum on the clerk of the British Museum is not sufficient to cause him to produce the file of a newspaper. However, apparently the British Museum, whether they had a subpoena or not, did not require much tuition in the matter. They at once produce their files. Let us suppose that this was a Tichborne trial. Would it be tolerated as between two private parties that all the newspaper files of the country which are collected in the British Museum should be carted away to the Strand and locked up from the general body of the public, who have the first right and claim upon them? If that is the use to which the British Museum is to be put, I say, "Away with the British Museum!" I apprehend the British Museum is for the advantage of the public generally, and not for the advantage of Mr. Soames or any other solicitor. For the last 12 months anybody who went up to the British Museum to consult the files of the Irish newspapers or the English newspapers was told, "Oh, they are down at Mr. Soames' office!" What answer is that to the British taxpayer? I maintain that if only one humble being would be inconvenienced by the removal of these files, they ought not to be removed. It seems to me that if a subpoena is sufficient to break up the collection at the British Museum, there should be salutary legislative authority to prevent it. I suppose that if the subpoena had ordered the authorities to send down the whole library or the skeleton of a megatherium, it would have been obeyed. The Times might have called for every mineral, vegetable, or animal specimen in the building. There is no doubt these gentlemen acted with the greatest imprudence. I do not believe any legal subpoena was served at all; but even if it was possible to subpoena the authorities of the British Museum, I think they might have found a way of excusing themselves from the production of the files if they had cared to do so. I now go to my fourth proposition. I desire that everything done by the British Museum shall be regularly done. I want to know what right the British Museum Authorities had to transfer all these valuable records to the custody of Mr. Soames. I saw from the newspapers that the clerk of the British Museum attended the Commission Court for one or two days, and that then a gentleman called Sir Richard Webster got up and said—

"The British Museum Authorities are attending day after day and bringing down these documents every day, but we desire that they should be left here."

"Oh, certainly," said the President. I

recollect reading that nothing that has once been put into the Museum can be taken out of it again without the sanction of a special Act of Parliament, and that when it was desired on one occasion to remove an old skeleton to make room for a new one the authorities had to put the old skeleton inside the new one so as to avoid the necessity for a special enactment. At any rate, it was no part of the duty of the British Museum to relinquish the custody of these documents. There may be Acts of Parliament to enable the authorities to dispose of their lumber; but it is another thing for the authorities to hand these files over to Mr. Soames. The clerk who produced them should have said, "I am a public official. You require these papers, and I will give them to you to look through; but they must be equally accessible to the litigants on the other side." That was not done; Mr. Soames had them under lock and key, and so far as the general body of litigants were concerned the files were absolutely closed to them. Undoubtedly the Times nobbled the British Museum; and on a later date we shall show that the Times got officials of the Royal Dublin Society, who are paid out of the public money, to look out extracts for them. I think that the Motion which my hon. Friend has made is a reasonable and necessary one. It is very unsatisfactory to the Irish Members to have to bring these matters forward after the thing is over. But that is all we can do in Irish matters. It is no remedy, however. I do not suppose that there will be a Parnell Commission again for another century. The British Constitution has not sufficient resources to produce anything like it again on this side of the 20th century. There is absolutely no defence to be made for the authorities of the British Museum in this matter, and therefore I support the very proper Motion of my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid I am not able to give very much information to hon. Gentlemen opposite; and I regret very much the absence of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) who usually answers for the British Museum. My hon. Friend the Member for the Cambridge University has told the House that two officers of the British Museum were consulted in this case, but that they did not act in the matter within the hours which they are called upon to give to Museum work. I do not suppose that anybody believes that they entered into the examination which they were asked to undertake from any partisan view. The hon. Member for Longford, I am sure, will testify to the facilities afforded to him whenever he has applied to any officer connected with the Museum. I believe it is customary for officers at the British Museum who have special knowledge to be consulted from time to time by those who desire to have their opinion. Whether these officers would have undertaken this duty, had they known the whole circumstances of the case, is extremely doubtful; but I do not think it has been shown that they have in any way taken a Party side. They have examined the documents purely from the point of view of their knowledge and experience of such documents. I believe there is ample power to compel the production of any documents in the Museum; and I do not understand that it is contended by the Lord Mayor of Dublin or by the hon. Member for Longford that there has been any refusal to anybody to see the files of the newspaper in question. These files were sent to the Court; and I take it that they were in the custody of the Court.

MR. SEXTON: If anybody wanted to see the newspapers, he had to ask Mr. Soames.

MR. JACKSON: I do not understand that either of the hon. Gentlemen have gone so far as to say that anybody who has applied to see the files has been refused, but rather that the newspapers were sent to the Court and placed in a particular room which, in their opinion, looks as though they were sent there in the interests of one side or one litigant. I imagine that when the newspapers were brought into Court under an order of Court, they were open to inspection by any party in the case. I am sorry that I am not personally acquainted with all the details of the matter; but if there are any questions of detail upon which answers are desired, distinct inquiries shall be made before the Report stage.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I know something about this matter. I have had a good many actions brought against me, and I remember that in regard to one action—I am not quite certain whether the Solicitor General was for me or against me; he has been both—I wanted to obtain the files of one or two newspapers from the British Museum, and I was able to do so by subpoenaing some official. But the newspapers were not given into my custody. They were brought into Court by an official, who took them away again. What we now complain of is that certain documents were brought from the Museum and handed over to the custody of Mr. Soames.

Mr. JACKSON: Under the protection of the Court.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: The Solicitor General will tell the hon. Gentleman that the Court has no power to allow such documents to be handed over either to a plaintiff or to a defendant. Undoubtedly in this matter there is a certain bias on the part of every official of the Government, which induces them, I do not say to act against the other side, but not to do anything for the other side. The hon. Gentleman who has defended the Museum authorities stated that the two officials devoted their time to this matter out of office hours. But I put it to the First Lord of the Treasury whether public opinion will not be biased by two gentlemen from the British Museum coming forward as expert witnesses for the Times? Unless we get an admission from the Government that a wrong has been done, and a promise that it shall not take place again in any future trial of this sort, I hope that my hon. Friend will go to a Division.

Mr. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Obviously, all documents in the British Museum, within the possession, power, and procurement of the trustees, are entitled to be produced in Court, although they are held under strict regulations by the trustees. The words of the Act of George II. are most specific on the point. All property is by that Act to remain under the control of the trustees for public use to all posterity. But not only so, even if the trustees desire to move part of their collection to another building, they have to come to Parliament for an Act for the purpose. Thus, in 1878, the British Museum Act gave the trustees special power to remove a certain portion of their collection to the buildings at South Kensington. Did they get any special Act for the removal of these documents from the Museum to Mr. Soames's office? These are points which I think the Solicitor General might help us to clear up.

*Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The Secretary to the Treasury has stated that these two gentlemen, had they known the circumstances from the beginning, probably would not have gone into this transaction at all. But surely it was known long before the production of these forged letters in Court that they were not documents that ought to have been used in a criminal charge. Another point has been raised which is a little confused. I suppose there is no doubt about the right of any party in a suit by a subpoena duces tecum to call for the production in Court of any particular documents; but such documents, so produced as these files of papers were, should never leave the custody of the individual producing them. They should be held in his care for reference by either party to the suit, or the solicitors. This practice is inherent to the proceedings. I have seen officials of the British Museum in Court over and over again produce under subpoena files of papers, but I never heard of a case in which such documents were placed in the custody of one party to the suit. If that has been done in this case—I have no knowledge myself about it, but I have heard what has been stated as to these files being in the custody of Mr. Soames—then I say it is should like to know who was the other expert employed. It might be that we may have occasion for his services in a case of our own in the future. Another question of detail, which may be within the hon. Gentleman's cognisance, is—Did the experts day by day have these files of papers in their custody? Also—were they paid by the Times, or who were they paid by? These are questions upon which I hope we may get an answer. Then as to the conspiracy in which these gentlemen seemed to have joined, a grave question arises. I think we must all feel that it is necessary we should be tender about the reputation of our ancestors. Now, suppose one of these gentlemen should have before him a letter, say from the Duchess of Portsmouth or Mistress Eleanor Gwynne, upon the authenticity of which may depend the reputation of an English Monarch. Very grave errors might arise to the Monarch's reputation through the incompetency of these gentlemen, and the same questions might arise in reference to the Monarch of a later era. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cambridge University has told us that the work of these officials in regard to these letters was done after office hours. But does he really mean to say that a series of very elaborate experiments were not conducted at the British Museum, and with the apparatus of that Institution? It does not require less faith than that of St. Thomas, if we hesitate to believe that the Museum was not so used. These are questions upon which I hope some explanation may be forthcoming.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I desire to bear brief testimony to the fact that the papers removed from the British Museum, and which have been understood heretofore to be the property of the nation, and in the custody of the trustees, were brought down from the Museum, I think without formal order of the Court, and certainly were transferred to the custody of Mr. Soames, and access to them was denied absolutely to the other parties in the suit. This is our grievance. I have no complaint myself to make of being personally damaged, for I have small faith in British Institutions, including the British Museum, and so I provided myself with a file of papers from my own office, and therefore was not at that loss which others of my Colleagues suffered through Mr.

Soames being in possession of the Museum files. Day by day I had before me the fact that not only were the Museum files in Mr. Soames's custody, but he had Irish policemen placed at his service to go over the papers for him and make extracts therefrom. This is a fact that cannot be denied. I believe the First Lord of the Treasury must be in a position to have had some knowledge of these proceedings from their inception. [Mr. W. H. SMITH expressed dissent.] We must accept the right hon. Gentleman's disavowal. But the fact remains that we, the weaker party in this contest, had all the odds against us. You used the public money; you used your control of public Institutions; all social advantages were on your side; you used even the money that we are now asked to vote, that you might ply Mr. Soames with every advantage to be used against us. And all this time you denied any access by us to this public property for reference. I think my hon. Friend has made a good point in his reference to a special Act being required to take documents from the British Museum; but I do not rest my argument upon that. What I say is that no one party in litigation should be able to compel the production of such documents in Court, and withhold them from the other party. It was especially hard upon us, who had nothing to rely on but our truth, our pluck, and public virtue. Against us you used all the advantage of wealth and social influence, and you cannot complain if we indulge in the luxury of grumbling and protestation. I am quite certain that what my right hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) says is a fact—that these documents were in the custody of Mr. Soames at the Law Courts; and, further, that he had the assistance in the examination of these documents of the official staff of the Museum and also of the Irish police.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I regret that none of the hon. and learned Gentlemen who were engaged before the Commission are now present, because I feel confident that if either of those who sit on this side in Committee were here this evening he would be able to show to the satisfaction of the Committee that these newspaper files for a considerable period were not, properly speaking, in the custody of an official from the Museum, but solely and exclusively in the custody and occupation of Mr. Soames. In proof of this statement on several occasions last November and December, and while the House was in Session, and Members of this House were lying under these charges, we went to the Court to obtain extracts from Irish newspapers, from certain speeches alleged against us in evidence, and the learned counsel to whom we referred told us we should go to Ireland or send to Ireland for the newspapers. So it is evident he could not procure these extracts in Court. This much will be conceded, that these files if they were in Court should have been as accessible to the one side as the other. They were not in Court, and they were, I allege, absolutely in the custody of Mr. Soames and his coadjutors. I do not think the Committee will be satisfied with the explanation of the hon. Baronet that these British Museum experts did this delicate work after office hours. It is an extraordinary thing that in a great State trial, as a Member of the Government has appropriately termed it—it is positively indecent, I will say, that servants of a public institution, officials of a great national institution like the British Museum paid out of public funds should be employed in a transaction of this kind. Beyond all doubt it raises serious questions as to the competency of these gentlemen to occupy their present position. As an ordinary layman, I should be inclined to call in question the ability of these gentlemen to decipher Egyptian hieroglyphics, if they have failed to see the forgery of these pen scratchings attributed to my hon. Friend the Member for Cork. Any ordinary judge of calligraphy would have discovered the forgery after a few hours' examination. The hon. Baronet says these gentlemen did their work out of office hours; but did they perform their experiments within the walls of the Museum in midnight secrecy, and did they avail themselves of the apparatus and machinery of the Museum? I do not know, but I suppose cameras and photographic appliances are to be found at the Museum. If this was the case, what a lame excuse it is to say the work was done after official hours! But passing from that, why should these gentlemen be required to undertake the work at all? Are there not in London plenty of skilful photographers who would have equally well discharged this comparatively simple work of taking and enlarging photographs? Why were these officials employed at all? I think the time of the Committee is well employed in the endeavour to get at the truth of this business, and I hope some right hon. Gentleman will be able to supplement the little information we have had as to these very suspicious transactions.

**Mr. H. J. WILSON* (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I join in acknowledging the reasonableness and courtesy of the Secretary to the Treasury, and I hope he will make an effort to satisfy us on this subject. He asked us to put questions to him upon detail; but if my hon. Friends will accept a little advice from me, I should recommend them not to ask for any details, but to demand a full and complete statement of all that has taken place. For my own part, I shall decline to intimate any particular point upon which I should like information. What is wanted is a full account of the whole transaction; when it began; where it began; how the work was done; who paid for it; in fact, the whole story in connection with it. The Secretary to the Treasury is generally very clear and straightforward, and I hope he will be so in this case. I do not propose to enter at length into the subject. I will only add that it does seem a little strange that with the knowledge that this discussion was coming on to-night—for it has been a matter of controversy both in the House and in the country for months—it is strange, I say, that we have nobody here to speak with authority for the British Museum. The Solicitor General has sat through this discussion being brought to their knowledge, because no document can be moved without their authority. Perhaps the hon. Baronet (Sir G. Stokes) will let us know what action was taken by the trustees, and if it is within his knowledge that the subpoena was served.

MR. SEXTON: I think the hon. Baronet has given the Committee all the information in his power, but I think that he will agree that the information he has given is not sufficient to satisfy even the most modest curiosity. I admit that the testimony of the hon. Baronet is valuable on many subjects; but in regard to this matter, it is evident that the testimony would be more valuable after inquiry than before, and I hope he will be so good as to make inquiry. His arguments simply amount to this—that what the officials did was after office hours. But that appears to be founded upon speculation in his own mind, for the only reason he could give was that they were not absent during the hours of duty. Now, there is no doubt one of the reasons why the British Museum was selected for these experiments was because of the character of its plant and apparatus and its facilities for the enlargement of photographs. But the hon. Baronet does not appear to have informed himself upon this point, whether the work was done in the Museum at all. The Secretary to the Treasury has made but a lame apology. Of course, he is very effective in apologising for the sins of others, perhaps because he has so few of his own to answer for; but I am quite sure that he will agree that an arrangement should have been made by which the custody of these papers should have been in an officer of the Court or of the Museum, and that they should be open to the inspection of litigants on either side.

MR. JACKSON: I entirely admit that, and I did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that that had not been done. I quite understood that the files were in Mr. Soames' room; but I did not understand there was any difficulty, or any refusal of access to them, to others who were concerned, and I understand, moreover, that they were actually in the custody of the Court for the whole time.

MR. SEXTON: The Commission sat for four days in the week, and during that time they were open to Mr. Soames and not to us. During the other three days we were also debarred from inspection, while Mr. Soames had full control.

MR. JACKSON: I understood that it was under the advice of his own counsel that the hon. Member sent to Ireland for his own copies.

MR. SEXTON: My hon. Friend's counsel would not have advised him to go to Ireland to look through the files when he could get them in London. Mr. Soames's agent had access to the files at any time; but whenever the representatives of the Irish Members desired to look at them, they had to ask the permission of Mr. Soames to state what papers they wanted and to examine them under the supervision of Mr. Soames's clerks, so that Mr. Soames knew exactly what evidence it was intended to give and was able to prepare his cross-examination. The whole thing was a conspiracy engineered by Mr. Soames. I am surprised that a man of legal eminence, such as the Solicitor General, should sit through the whole discussion and not take any part in it except by gesture. No doubt it is a discreet silence, and the matter is more the Attorney General's business than the Solicitor General's. The Attorney General received a splendid fee in the case, and the Solicitor General did not. I admit that there is a strong contrast to be drawn between the conduct of the two hon. and learned Gentlemen—the Solicitor General, though he received no fee, being in his place, and the Attorney General, who had so large a pecuniary interest in the Times' case, being absent. Without going any further into that matter, I desire to point out that we have not had a reply to several questions we have addressed to the Government. The Committee wish to know who the officials were; whether they were served with subpoena duces tecum, and, if so, when; how long they continued in the service of the Times; what operations they performed; what remuneration they received from the Times; and what documents were specified in the subpoenas? Lastly, are these the officials upon whom the country depends for deciding the validity of valuable documents. I shall ask the Committee to divide on this Vote to-night. I intend to raise these questions again on the Report stage, and I trust that then a reply will be forthcoming either from the Attorney General or the Trustees of the British Museum.

MR. CHANNING: (Northampton, E.): I do not think this Debate should be allowed to close without the law being laid down by the Law Officers of the Crown as to the custody of the documents in the British Museum. I think, seeing that the Solicitor General is present, we should have his opinion of the law upon a question of such importance as this.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): If the Committee desires to hear my opinion I have no objection to give it. Two questions have been raised in the course of the discussion; one is strictly relevant to the Motion before the Committee for the reduction of the Vote, and that is the question of the conduct of the two gentlemen who seem to have been consulted with regard to these documents. The other is the question of what was done with regard to the production of printed matter from the British Museum in the course of the case, and of its being left in the custody of Mr. Soames. With regard to the authority for having printed matter from the British Museum produced in Court, the legal knowledge and experience of the two Members for Northampton has already shown that it is within the competence of a Court to cause printed matter to be brought from the British Museum when dealing with any sort of case, public or private. One of the public purposes of a complete collection of literary work in the British Museum is that the Courts of Justice may be able to refer to it. Both the hon. Members for Northampton in their diverse experience in courts of law, have had to do with the production of printed matter. It is said that in this case printed matter was brought to the Court by an official of the British Museum in the morning and taken back in the evening. [Cries of "No, no."] I beg pardon; I know this from one of the hon. Gentlemen who have already spoken in this Debate. It was taken back each night until on the second or third day the Attorney General suggested that this moving to and fro was extremely inconvenient and unnecessary, and I understand from the statements made in this Debate that it was ordered that the files should remain in the custody of Mr. Soames.

Mr. Sexton

MR. SEXTON: Ordered by whom?

*SIR E. CLARKE: By the Court. No such proceeding could have taken place except under the order of the Court; and if objection had been made by either of the litigants against the application that the documents should be left with Mr. Soames, no doubt the order would have been refused. It is stated that there was great difficulty in obtaining access to the documents. I have no knowledge of that, but it has not been stated that any application for such access was made to the Court. If representations had been made about the inconvenience of the documents lying in Mr. Soames's office, no doubt that inconvenience would have been removed. As to the question of consulting officials on the question of handwriting, two gentlemen of the British Museum have been referred to. The name of only one of them has been mentioned, and that is Mr. Birch. I do not discuss whether it is right or wrong for the officials of the British Museum to be consulted, but I do know that it is by no means an exceptional thing for Mr. Birch, one of the officials in question, to be consulted on questions of handwriting. In the last case but one in which I appeared—which involved a question of forgery—where the forgery of a will was exposed, Mr. Birch was called upon to give an opinion on handwriting. I succeeded in defeating the will which was then in question, and I knew of Mr. Birch having been employed because I held his report in my hand. I only instance this case to show that it has, undoubtedly, been the practice to consult the officials of the British Museum, and there is not the smallest reason for supposing that their intervention in the particular case under discussion party to go into Mr. Soames's office? I think the proposal to reduce the Vote a very proper one.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I shall, on Report, press for an answer to one or two questions of which no notice has been taken. I desire to know to whom the subpoena was addressed, what it contained; what the officials subpoenaed were asked to produce; what these gentlemen were paid, and whether the payment was brought in ease of the charge on the taxpayers. The answer given by the Solicitor General is no answer at all, and I assert as a matter of law that there is no authority to compel the British Museum or any officer of that Institution to produce anything on subpoena duces tecum. It is a monstrous thing if Soames's office and the British Museum are to be interchangeable terms. The course taken by the British Museum Authorities in this instance has been most regrettable, and no answer of any sort or description has been given to our questions. Supposing Soames had stuck to those documents, or had mutilated them by cutting them into ribands, what answer would be forthcoming to the inquiries of the taxpayers? There would be a suit for damages, of course, by the British Museum against Soames, but what answer would that be to the general public; and this shows the inconvenience of the course which has been followed. Where are those documents now? I submit that they are still in the office of Soames. Are they back again in the British Museum? No one can say; and yet the Vote is brought forward for discussion in this way. As to Messrs. Birch and Inglis, all I will say is that it was on the testimony of experts such as these that the Crossmaglen prisoners were sentenced to penal servitude, and I submit that they should be prevented from giving bogus evidence in fraudulent perjury cases. While they may be competent enough to deal with evidence pertaining to the days of Julius Cæsar, they are not competent to do so in the days of Richard Pigott. Let Mr. Birch remain in the classic shades of the British Museum and draw his salary peaceably. If he is an expert the best place for him to exercise his calling is in the place where he is paid for it by the country. It is a monstrous thing that any of these public servants when they get into official positions should be trotted out as experts. They really know nothing more about these things than anybody else, but they put on great airs, take great oaths, and get great money. This scandal has gone far enough, and I hope that to-morrow we shall have some better answer than that given from the Treasury Bench.

MR. CHANCE: I wish to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will take steps to see that Mr. Birch and other gentlemen are not permitted to go round the country, with all the material in the Museum at their disposal, swearing people into gaol?

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I have always understood that it was one of the duties of the Government to call attention to the extra receipts of these officials. We certainly have a right to know what are the indirect salaries which these gentlemen receive, and to what extent the British Museum grant is supplemented by receipts from private individuals when those receipts are earned in consequence of the official position of those who obtain them. This Debate will be useful if it has no other effect than to direct particular attention to the fact that these men are in receipt of enormous sums for private work done with public instruments, and obtained because they are public servants. It is preposterous to say it is not in the power of the Committee to investigate the matter. I think we ought to be informed not only what remuneration these gentlemen received when attending on their subpoena, but what remuneration they received during the time they were making the investigation, and were not on subpoena. It is also our duty to inquire whether or not they used the instruments of the British Museum or devoted any of their official time to this outside work. I give the hon. Baronet (Sir G. Stokes) perfect credit for believing that they were at their offices during the proper hours, though he did not say they were doing official work all the time. I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will inquire whether any of the work was done during official hours.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): After the very inadequate reply of the Government I beg to move, Mr. Courtney, that you do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(*Mr. D.
 Sullivan.*)

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I see the hon. and learned Attorney General now in his place. He will remember that certain documents were obtained under a subpoena duces tecum from the British Museum. These documents were placed in Mr. Soames's private room at the Law Courts. It has been complained by hon. Members, who may be described as the persons sued in the case, that they had not equal opportunity with Mr. Soames to look into the documents. Our complaint is that documents were taken out of the custody of the British Museum and left in the custody of Mr. Soames. Of course, the Attorney General will see that that was a most improper thing if it was so. The Solicitor General admitted that it was improper, but said he did not know it to be so at the time; and so said the Secretary to the Treasury; at least, he did not attempt to defend it.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I did not say so. What I said was that it was understood that these documents were being carted backwards and forwards at great inconvenience; that the Attorney General said this was a most inconvenient course, and that no objection was taken to the Order of the Court as to their custody at the Law Courts.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not care about the Law Courts. I am a taxpayer, and these things are to a certain extent my property, and I object to my property being left in the hands of Mr. Soames, whether by the permission of the Judges of the land or of the Attorney General. We want to understand whether these documents were left by an official in the hands of Mr. Soames; whether they really were in the hands of Mr. Soames?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am glad to think that my presence here at this stage may be useful in affording hon. Members below the Gangway. on the opposite side answers to the questions that have been put to the Government. The documents were never out of the custody of the proper officer of the British Museum. No access was ever had to them by the advisers of the Times, so far as I know, except under the custody of that officer, and the same access was given to all parties concerned. During the first three or four days the papers, all of which were produced on subpoena, were carted backwards and forwards, to the great inconvenience of everybody. Then the suggestion was made, if my memory serves me right, by Sir Charles Russell, that they should be left in the Law Courts; I will not be quite certain as to this, but the suggestion came, so far as I recollect, from the other side. My recollection is that this was suggested to Sir James Hannen, who was informed that the officials of the British Museum were not entitled to leave the papers anywhere else than in the Museum, unless the Commission made an order to that effect. Whereupon Sir James Hannen said it was a reasonable proposal, and directed that they should be left in a room in the Law Courts. I am able to say from personal knowledge—though, having been counsel for the Times, I am unwilling to obtrude my personal knowledge—that the papers were accessible to any of the parties to the inquiry. So far as I know, the documents were never produced except under the custody of the official of the British Museum. They were never in the custody of the solicitor for the Times, in whom the hon. Member for Northampton expresses such distrust.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork, City): The hon. and learned Gentleman says these papers were never in the custody of Mr. Soames. I may state that, as a party to the suit, I once had occasion to apply for access to the documents, and I had to go to Mr. Soames and get Mr. Soames's permission to see them. I was conducted by Mr. Soames to his room, and I had to inspect the documents in the presence of half-a-dozen of Mr. Soames's clerks.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 133.—(Div. List, No. 310.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.
 Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries and Expenses of the National Gallery."

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have something to say in regard to this Vote, and as time does not now admit of my doing so, I will move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir George Campbell.)

MR. W. McARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid., St. Austell): I understood the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to promise that on Saturday he will only take non-contentious business. I, therefore, assume that on that day he will not take the Diplomatic and Colonial Votes.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid it will be impossible to satisfy both those hon. Members who want to take Votes and those who do not, but I will endeavour to-morrow to state some arrangement with regard to the Saturday Sitting, which, I hope, will be generally satisfactory to the House. If hon. Gentlemen are really desirous of making progress, they will be content to make some sacrifice of their own personal convenience.

MR. W. McARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid., St. Austell): I would point out that the House has now for several months been discussing the affairs of some 37,000,000 of people in these Islands, but there are 270,000,000 more under British rule whose affairs have not yet been touched. All I ask is that we shall not be called on to take the Votes I have named on Saturday.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The Diplomatic Vote is always regarded, not so much as a contentious Vote, but as one that requires to be discussed. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as a matter of fairness not to call upon us to take that Vote on Saturday.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not take the Colonial Votes on Saturday.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to take Supply on Saturday.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Some business must be taken on Saturday, and Gentlemen who complain that Votes are postponed are now asking for their further postponement. I desire the House to take notice of this fact.

MR. CHANNING: I have a notice on Class V. of the Estimates, and I am perfectly willing that it should be taken on Saturday.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolution [9th August] reported.

CLASS III.

"That a sum, not exceeding £84,062, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries, Allowances, and Expenses and Pensions of various County Court Officers, of Divisional Commissioners and Magistrates in Ireland, and the Expenses of Revision."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. SEXTON: The latter half of the Debate on this important Vote was left unanswered by the Government, and there are some questions of importance and of pressing urgency which it is desirable to consider and determine before the Report of the Vote is agreed to by the House. I have first to refer to the case of the Divisional Commissioners. They are not new officials; they are familiar figures under a new name. They have been hitherto paid and employed under the style of Resident Magistrates, and in that capacity have received salaries of £1,000 a year, which is far in excess of the salary legally payable to a Resident Magistrate in Ireland. These payments have been continued for a series of years. The Auditor General has protested, and the Government have endeavoured to get rid of the illegality of the position by including these illegal payments in the Appropriation Bill, and this year they have plunged into a fresh illegality. It is true the Government introduced a

Bill dealing with the matter, thereby admitting the illegality of their course; but they did not press that Bill forward, and made no effort to get it passed. How, then, do they now endeavour to get out of their illegal position? Why, by a manœuvre that is almost unexampled. They have arranged that these officials shall cease to be Resident Magistrates, and shall become Justices of the Peace. The Lord Lieutenant has discharged them, at some date unknown, from their offices as Resident Magistrates, and has admitted them, also at some date unknown, as Justices of the Peace. But the men are the same, the duties are the same, and the salary, which it was illegal to pay to them as Resident Magistrates, is also the same, and is now made legal because of their change of office. We have asked for information concerning this manœuvre: we have asked at what date these men ceased to be Resident Magistrates and became Justices of the Peace; we have asked whether they paid the ordinary fees on being admitted as Justices of the Peace, and we have also asked to what counties they have been nominated; and, although we have put all these questions, to which we are entitled to have replies, the Chief Secretary has this evening attempted to move for a flimsy Return which evades the whole question, which gives us no information, and leaves us in precisely the same position as we were in before. But we shall press for this information, and I trust that, as long as the salaries of these Resident Magistrates are sought to be illegally paid, the Irish Members will resist their payment by every constitutional means, until the position of these functionaries, whatever they may be called, is regularised in due form and course of law. I imagine that the reluctance of the Government to give this information is due to an unwillingness to face a full and fair discussion such as is incidental to the progress of a Bill. What are the functions of these remarkable officials? Why, they are a kind of flexible buffer between the Executive and the public, and their function is to push the policy of violence against the public right to the extreme point, and to minimise the responsibility of the Government. Under this system what is called the responsibility of the Government to this House has gone to the vanishing point, and has practically ceased to exist. Under it there is no security for liberty, justice, or fair play to any political opponent of the Government in Ireland. These Divisional Commissioners get up cases, especially against public men, choose the Magistrates who are to try them and who also act as juries, and then present the evidence to the police whose promotion is in their hands. To put it shortly, these men make the charge, constitute the Judge and jury, produce the evidence, and reward the witnesses. There is nothing to compare with this in any part of Great Britain or of the civilised world; and the chance of justice and fair play on the part of any public man engaged in any political movement in Ireland in opposition to the Government has absolutely disappeared. I will refer to one or two of these functionaries. In the North we have Mr. Cameron. He is the man who broke into the empty homes of evicted tenants, and arrested them for forcible possession, and he is the functionary whose impartiality may be judged by the fact that he it was who gave misleading information to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and led him to publish a false libel on the hon. Member for North Monaghan.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): What I said in Court was that having heard the statement, first of all from Mr. Olphert, I went to the village and consulted with the Divisional Commissioner and another gentleman, and it was because Mr. Cameron and the other gentleman were not able to give me the name, although they had heard of the incident, that I refrained from mentioning the name.

MR. SEXTON.: At any rate, it was after a conversation with this man, that the hon. Gentleman took upon himself to make a statement with regard to the Member for North Monaghan, which he was afterwards obliged to admit on oath to be false. In the West we have Mr. John Byrne, the hero of the Longford evictions; further South we have Captain Slacke, and in the County of Cork there is Captain Plunkett, who sounded the keynote of outrage in his famous telegram, "Do not hesitate to shoot." He and Captain Slacke courage and promote those policemen who distinguish themselves by outrage, and repress and degrade those who are conspicuous for humanity and endeavour to perform their duties in a temperate spirit. During the greater part of the last year Captains Plunkett and Slacke devoted themselves to the service to the Times, and judging by the good account the Chief Secretary gave of the state of Ireland in their absence, I think it would be sound economy to save their salaries by transferring them to the Times altogether. To give the House an idea of the relations of these functionaries and the people, I need only refer to the case of my hon. Friend the Member for West Kerry, who has been described by Colonel Turner as a person who has been a persistent breaker of the law and a scurrilous traducer. If my hon. Friend were again to be tried for what in any other country would be called the ordinary exercise of his duty as a journalist he would be tried before Mr. Cecil Roche, who has said of him that he systematically insults the preservers of law and order, and the man to choose his Judge would be Colonel Turner; the Judge would be Mr. Cecil Roche. I ask the Chief Secretary for an explanation of Colonel Turner's conduct with reference to the Vandeleur Estate. Colonel Turner incited the landlords to promote eviction and to bring tenants from distant parts of Ireland to take the vacant farms in the place of the tenants whose title was ancestral. Colonel Vandeleur, who was a high-minded man, was about to settle a dispute with regard to one of his farms, when Colonel Turner interfered and prevented the settlement being carried out. What explanation can the Chief Secretary give of the letter written by Colonel Turner to another official, "Things will never be right in Clare until old Dynan and his villanous priests are removed"? How did Colonel Turner mean them to be removed? The only meaning which I can attach to the letter is that Colonel Turner desires that the police should know that he will be well pleased if the priests had their skulls cracked by batons, or if some of them can be hit by ricochet bullets, such as have been heard of at Mitchelstown. I challenge Colonel Turner to say that he did not mean his subordinates to understand that he would not be sorry if violence were done to the worthy Vicar General of the Diocese and his priests. I now come to the case of the Resident Magistrates, and first I will deal with that of Captain Segrave. That hero has been too much forgotten. His case acquires particular interest from the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork charged Captain Segrave in this House with having embezzled the funds of his regimental canteen as well as money confided to him by a private soldier to send to his mother. Immediately after that the hon. Member, who was never before interfered with on account of his speeches, was charged in respect of a speech which differed in no way from those of which no notice had been taken, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. I believe, and the Irish people believe, that it was not really for the speech that the hon. Member was prosecuted, but for having exposed the misconduct of an official of the Crown. Captain Segrave has been allowed to resign his appointment, from which he ought to have been dismissed with ignominy. I wish to know what was the date of the resignation, and whether Captain Segrave has been allowed to resign in order to enable him at a future time to re-enter the public service. What amount of salary has he been paid since the date of his exposure in this House? Another Resident Magistrate is a gentleman whose name is constantly appearing on the black list. There is Colonel Caddell, a gentleman of whose legal knowledge nobody is satisfied. Only recently he insulted a young girl who was at the time in the custody of the police. The discrepancy between his sentences is remarkable, emergency men being treated with exceptional leniency. Out of the 75 Resident Magistrates whose names appear upon the Return of last March there are only 33 of whose legal knowledge even the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied, while the legal knowledge of the remaining 42 gives no satisfaction to any one in the world. Twelve Magistrates have been selected by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for their legal capacity. Only three of them are barristers, eight are retired officers and one had no occupation at all previous to being appointed. One of the 12 is Mr. Cecil Roche. It is true that that Gentleman was appointed by Lord Spencer, but when his term of office expired it was not renewed. The career of Mr. Cecil Roche under Lord Spencer was a downward career. Under the right hon. Gentleman it has been an upward career. The case, then, stands thus. Out of 75 Magistrates, there were 21 of whose legal knowledge Lord Spencer was satisfied; 12 of whose legal knowledge the right hon. Gentleman has been satisfied; and 42 without legal knowledge at all. Seven Magistrates have been chosen by the Lord Chancellor to hold private inquiries, five of whom are simply ex-constabulary officers, whose names have been most closely connected with the conspiracy of the Times against the Irish Members. I contend that this selection of the Lord Chancellor is a deliberate misuse of the authority confided in him by the House. If these Magistrates were, as the Chief Secretary contends, judicial officers, and not mere agents of the Executive, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to turn over in his mind a few short and simple questions. Is it not the fact that, after his speech at Manchester in which he complained of the inconvenience of long sentences resulting in appeals, these Magistrates all over Ireland at once and simultaneously adopted a new system? Did they not defeat the constitutional right of appeal by inflicting short sentences? They did that because they took the right hon. Gentleman's speech as a direction, and because they felt their promotion would be imperilled if they did not do so. Then there is another curious fact, that the Resident Magistrates never disagree. They have been sitting in couples for two years or more under the Coercion Act, and they have tried thousands of cases. Why is it that two of these Resident Magistrates have never disagreed? There may have been one occasion on which they disagreed, but that one occasion serves to prove the rule. This agreement can only be explained on the theory that these Resident Magistrates do not pretend to regard themselves as judicial persons, but rather as the instruments and agents of the Government to carry out the policy of the Chief Secretary. They feel no more at liberty to disagree than two policemen on a beat. They agree because they have their orders. They know the case in which it is desired by Dublin Castle that they should convict, and those in which a conviction is not considered essential. If there were no other fact before the House, the fact that these Magistrates always display such remarkable unanimity in agreeing upon convictions is not to be accounted for, except by the knowledge that they are not Judicial persons but are instruments, agents, servants, "Uncommercial Travellers," as perhaps Dickens might have called them, sent by the Executive to various parts of Ireland to carry out a certain line of policy and attack against the national movement. There is one other question I have to ask. Why is it that no Resident Magistrate since the Coercion Act was passed has exercised the legal power of directing that a prisoner should be treated as a first-class misdemeanant? A Crime Act prisoner was so treated in one case by the order of a Magistrate in Dublin. He was a Magistrate who was independent of the Executive, because there was no power to remove him. But he never got another case to try. The reason is obvious. The Government would not commit another trial to the care of a Magistrate who had dared to exercise his legal power in the direction of leniency and moderation. The Resident Magistrates act on the understanding that the policy of the Chief Secretary for Ireland is a policy of cruelty. I must say a few words on the case of Mr. Conybeare. Mr. Conybeare and Mr. Harrison, of Oxford, were tried together on the same charge, and the same evidence was offered against both. Mr. Harrison was not convicted. Everybody is off, would not be convicted because official steps had been taken to that end. Mr. Harrison had influential Tory relatives, and the Resident Magistrates were instructed not to convict. Mr. Harrison was acquitted; Mr. Conybeare, on the same evidence, was convicted. The case was taken into the Court of Exchequer. One member of that Court, the Lord Chief Baron, expressed the opinion that the conviction was bad, while another member of the Court had grave doubts on the point, and Mr. Baron Dowse confessed to being "bewildered." Is a Member of Parliament, under such circumstances, to be kept for the full term of his sentence in a gaol from which three persons have recently come forth to die? When I refer to the policy of cruelty I cannot help saying it is shameful that, although Mr. Conybeare is suffering from injured eyesight and failing health, the Prisons Board will not put up a few planks so that he may have the opportunity of exercise in the open air in wet weather. Now, Sir, I ask whether this sentence is to be carried out to its full extent? I think the country will form the opinion that it is not creditable that a Government, which was able only to obtain a majority of four upon a critical question involving the interests of Mr. Conybeare's constituents amongst others, should keep him confined in prison. I suppose it is useless to address an appeal to the Government at a moment when its majority has fallen so low and when five Members of the Opposition are safely stowed away in Her Majesty's prisons. The last case I have to deal with is that of Dr. Tanner. It is now quite clear, from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the Magistrates had no jurisdiction to try him at all on the occasion in question. It is also clear that the Magistrates exasperated Dr. Tanner by their demeanour, and by ordering his counsel (Mr. T. Healy) out of Court. When my hon. and learned Friend was expelled from Court, two of Dr. Tanner's witnesses, the ex-Mayor of Cork, and Mr. Welsh, the Harbour Commissioner, believing the case to be at an end, also went out of Court. The ex-Mayor of Cork went into the box to give evidence but was turned out of the box. Father Humphreys, a third witness, was present, and ready to swear that Dr. Tanner had not committed the offence with which he was charged. He made the most harmless observation in Court. He was affronted by the Magistrates, and felt there was no course open to him but to leave the Court. Dr. Tanner, I say, was worked up into a state of exasperation, and addressing the Court, which had no jurisdiction, he used language which was disagreeable to it. The Magistrates never cautioned him or named him, but listened to him in silence. Why did they remain silent? Because a trap had been laid and Dr. Tanner was falling into it. They retired from Court and came back in 15 minutes with an elaborate document which the ex-Indian official and ex-artillery officer could not have drawn in 15 months, much less in 15 minutes. I say, Sir, that the whole proceedings of that day offer conclusive evidence of a plot between the Executive and the Magistrates to entrap my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner). I do not think even the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will argue that these obscure persons in Tipperary could have hit on the idea of that warrant, founded on a jurisdiction which had never before been exercised in any solitary case, and could have drawn it up in 15 minutes. The warrant for contempt was drawn up in collusion with the Executive in Dublin Castle, in the expectation that my hon. Friend, being a man of quick temper, and of no considerable restraint of language, would use language which would be considered as constituting a contempt of Court. It was impossible for my hon. Friend to give sureties, because by doing so he would have pronounced judgment on himself. I am, however, saved from arguing that question, because the Lord Chief Baron said from the Bench that nothing would induce him to give security to keep the peace. While the Chief Baron declared that the jurisdiction of the Magistrates technically existed, he expressed his regret that the Court of Exchequer was not entitled to inquire whether there had been contempt at all, or whether, if there had been jurisdiction, it was fairly or properly exercised. He spoke of the jurisdiction in terms of disapproval and disgust. He declared that it was a glaring anomaly, and appealed to the Legislature to remove a most odious and intolerable tyranny. My hon. Friend has been sent to prison as an untried prisoner, and I have a letter from him in which he says that his treatment is worst than the treatment of a first-class misdemeanant. Well, Sir, if these things are to go on, we need not say anything more about the Coercion Act; that is merely a trifle in comparison. I hear this very day of a man, who was guilty of the offence of nodding and winking at a fair where some pigs were being sold, having been sentenced to two terms of three months' imprisonment, and, in addition, to two terms more in default of bail. Under the Coercion Act there must at least be a charge made and some evidence heard; but under this new-found, but very old jurisdiction, any two agents of the right hon. Gentleman, without any charge being made, or without hearing any evidence or any defence, may take up the position that language has been used which is not sufficiently respectful, and call upon a man, perhaps for a fierce word inadvertently spoken, to find bail beyond the value of his whole worldly goods, or to go to prison for the term of his whole natural life. If the lawyers of the Crown in Dublin Castle are to be allowed to dig up these dustheaps of oppression, I do not see why they should not resort to pulling out teeth, or to the maiden's embrace, or to the boot, or the thumbscrew. Nay, I think that those forms of procedure would be more justifiable, because they have at least been exercised and were legal at the time; but in this case, assuming that the jurisdiction does exist, it is one which has never been used before. If the right hon. Gentleman allows the continuance of this new jurisdiction he will drive Ireland into a state of things in which despotism will no longer appear under the form of law. I shall feel it my duty to divide the House upon the Vote.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR): I am one of those who entertain considerable admiration for the oratory of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down; but if the right hon. Gentleman will accept counsel from me it will be not to spoil his great gifts of speech by the exaggeration which so often mars them. I will take three examples of this. In the first place, there was the case of Dr. Tanner. The right hon. Gentleman said that Dr. Tanner was subjected to worse treatment than if he had been imprisoned for contempt. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman has been entirely misinformed. I believe that the kind of imprisonment to which Dr. Tanner is now subjected is precisely that to which he would have been subjected for contempt of Court. Whether that be so or not, I am certain of this—that the treatment which an untried prisoner receives is more favourable than that of a first-class misdemeanant. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that the Government had unearthed a musty statute with which to attack its political opponents. It is true that the statute of Edward III. has never been used with regard to misbehaviour in Court; but it is wholly incorrect to say that the statute has been allowed to grow rusty from disuse. It has constantly been used not only in this country, but in Ireland also.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely missing the point; my point is that it has never been used to send a person to prison for words spoken in Court.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Does the right hon. Gentleman not see that if the statute has been used continuously in this country and in Ireland for dealing with various forms of misbehaviour, it is at all events no extravagant exercise of authority to use it with regard to a particular form of misbehaviour, which certainly cannot be described as otherwise than serious? Then there is another instance of the strange lengths to which the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to go in what he has stated with regard to County Court Judges. We are familiar with attacks on Resident Magistrates in this House on the ground that they are the servants of the Executive, and, therefore, cannot give independent judgments. But when the Government point out that the judgments of the Resident Magistrates are supported and confirmed by the County Court Judges, then calumny spreads, and the attacks formerly made upon the Resident Magistrates are extended so as to include the County Court Judges. It is absurd as well as grossly calumnious to suggest that the Irish County Court Judges are influenced in the decisions they give by some vague hope—in support of which I know of no instances that has occurred—that they might in the remote future be removed by the Executive to some more convenient county or to some more highly paid place. The right hon. Gentleman must see that in making such a suggestion with regard to the administration of justice in Ireland he is overloading his case unnecessarily. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his attack upon the Government by referring to changes in the position of the Divisional Commissioners; but those changes were made on the recommendation of the Auditor General and of the Public Accounts Committee with the object of placing the office of those gentlemen upon a regular footing, instead of the irregular though perfectly legal footing upon which it had previously rested.

*MR. BARRAN (York, W.R., Otley): The Public Accounts Committee have for years denied that these were on a legal footing.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt that may have been the opinion of the Public Accounts Committee, but I prefer to rely on the opinion of the Law Advisers of the Crown. Then the right hon. Gentleman referred to a charge which has been made against Colonel Turner, that he threatened a woman on the Vandeleur estates to prevent her giving up possession of her holding in order that a former tenant might be reinstated. The right hon. Gentleman has evidently been wholly misinformed with regard to the matter, because what Colonel Turner did was to inform the woman that if she did not wish to give up possession of her holding she would be protected in her legal rights—which is a very proper remark for a Magistrate to make. As to the letter attributed to Colonel Turner casting reflections upon the Irish priests, all I can say is that I have no knowledge of that letter, although I know that there are priests in Clare who do little honour to their cloth.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I challenge you to name one. [Cries of "Order!"] Name one, or repeat what you have said outside the House. [Cries of "Order!" "Withdraw!" and other interruptions.]

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge of the particular letter referred to. The right hon. Gentleman went on to discuss the case of Captain Segrave. I did not interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, although he was irregular in discussing that case on the present Vote, because Captain Segrave's salary is not on the Votes of the year. All I can say with regard to that matter is that I should be unworthy of the position which I hold if I had dismissed an official upon telegraphic information received from the Cape.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Forgive me for a moment. There are facts which the public ought to know. Parliament met on February 21, and two days after that date I produced a certified copy of the Cape Mail announcing the dismissal of Captain Segrave from the Cape. I told the Chief Secretary that he would find the facts at the Colonial Office, but it was not until March 21 that any steps were taken, and during the whole interval this cashiered officer was drawing the public funds.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a matter of fact I do not believe that he was drawing the public funds.

MR. MAC NEILL: With all respect he was. I have given special attention to the facts. The subject is as dear to me as the battering ram.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not doubt the motives of the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has grasped the details. I had indeed placed before me the statement of Captain Segrave's dismissal from the Cape, but I could not take any action until I had heard the circumstances under which that dismissal occurred. I did not receive the full details until March 21, and then Captain Segrave was permitted to resign. And while, having reviewed the case with some care, I thought that Lord Aberdeen would never have thought of appointing Captain Segrave had he known all that we now know. I also thought that Captain Segrave had been treated rather harshly by the Cape Government, and very harshly in the House of Commons.

MR. MAC NEILL: He was not appointed by Lord Aberdeen, but by the President of the Board of Trade.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I expressed the opinion that Lord Aberdeen would never have thought of appointing Captain Segrave; and I repeat that that appointment, though carried into effect by the President of the Board of Trade, was practically settled before my right hon. Friend came into office. To pass to the case of Mr. Cecil Roche, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, with a considerable recklessness of statement, gave the House to believe that Mr. Cecil Roche had been dismissed by Lord Spencer from the office of Land Commissioner.

MR. SEXTON: I said no such thing. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the recklessness of statement is entirely on his side. I said that when his term of office had expired he was not re-taken into employment.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As a matter of fact Mr. Roche was re-appointed certainly once if not twice under Lord Spencer, so that the particular inference which the right hon. Gentleman wishes to draw appears to be wholly unfounded. If any one studies Mr. Cecil Roche's magisterial record as indicated by the results of the appeals from his decisions, there will be found no reason to doubt the impartiality of those decisions. According to the Official Return, from October 1, 1888, to July 31, 1889, Mr. Cecil Roche tried 35 persons under the Crimes Act. Of these 26 were convicted, and appeal was taken only in nine cases. None of the nine decisions were reversed; in two cases the sentences were reduced, two cases are still pending, and in five cases the sentences were fully confirmed. That is not a record of which Mr. Cecil Roche or his friends need be ashamed. Then the right hon. Gentleman attacked the appointment made by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland of Magistrates to hold secret inquiries. I assert that the secret inquiries held under the Crimes Act have done more to bring offenders to justice than any action of a similar kind taken in Ireland within historic times. If any hon. Member will look at the Parliamentary Return he will see that crimes of the gravest description, such as murder, firing and wounding, and moonlighting offences, have been detected and the perpetrators brought to justice through the instrumentality of the secret inquiries conducted by these Magistrates, in a manner which could not have been done under any other system. Instead of attacking the Government the right hon. Gentleman should congratulate us on the success of our efforts in punishing some of the most serious forms of crime. Then the right hon. Gentleman dealt with two other cases—those of the hon. Members for Camborne and Mid Cork. With regard to the former case, the right hon. Gentleman made the amazing statement that another gentleman, Mr. Harrison by name, who had been associated with the hon. Member for Camborne in his expedition to Donegal, was not convicted because, forsooth! he had Tory relatives. If the right hon. Gentleman can believe that he can believe anything. The right hon. Gentleman's credulity is limitless, and I must despair of ever converting him to habits of critical inquiry into the facts with which he has to deal. It is perfectly true that some cock-and-bull story was made public with regard to some statement made by an Irish official about the action that was going to be taken by the Resident Magistrates with respect to the trial of the hon. Member for Camborne and Mr. Harrison. But I believe that the hon. Member for Camborne was challenged to name the Irish official referred to, and the hon. Member was not able to do it. The right hon. Gentleman is repeating second-hand the story which the hon. Member for Camborne could not verify first-hand. With regard to the merits of the sentence passed on the hon. Member for Camborne, I would only say that there was an appeal from the sentence of the Resident Magistrate to the County Court Judge on the merits, and the County Court Judge upheld the sentence. There was a further appeal to the High Court on a point of law, and the right hon. Gentleman has read a large number ber of extracts from the judgment of the High Court with regard to the sentence. But the right hon. Gentleman did not state that the whole of the opinions of the High Court on this matter were on a purely technical aspect of the case. On the merits there never was a question, and nothing fell from any Judge of the Superior Court which could call in question the opinion formed by the Judges of the two inferior Courts. As to the case of Dr. Tanner I cannot conceive any person who really has taken the trouble to read the proceedings before the two Resident Magistrates doubting that on the broad and substantial merits of the case the action of the Magistrates was fully justified. I am unable to believe that anyone who surveyed the evidence impartially could come to any other conclusion. I am aware that the Court of Exchequer reversed the sentence; but on what kind of plea? On the merits of the case? No; but upon the most technical of technicalities—on a point which could not influence a rational man for a moment as to whether or not Dr. Tanner was guilty of the offence with which he was charged. We are, therefore, driven back to consider the evidence at the trial, and it is wholly in one direction. Every opportunity was given to the prisoner to produce witnesses. He produced one witness, who did not prove his case, while the witnesses for the Crown proved their case. ["They were all police," and "Order."] This is an illustration of the kind of attacks made on the Resident Magistrates. It is true that in certain other cases the decisions of the Magistrates have been reversed; but can it be maintained by anyone who has surveyed their action in regard to hon. Members of this House that in any one case they have done substantial injustice? Can it be maintained by any hon. Member of this House who has been convicted by a Magistrate that he did not commit the offence for which the Resident Magistrates found him guilty? The speeches of hon. Members are on record in Nationalist journals. I am aware that this is not legal evidence in a Court of Law, but the uncontradicted reports in their own journals are surely evidence on which this House can come to some kind of conclusion, apart from evidence in a Court of Law. Whether hon. Gentlemen are justified in attacking the Crimes Act or not, this broad fact remains, that the alleged offences have been committed; and if hon. Members have broken the law, whether they approve the law or not, they must remember at all events that the law they have broken is the law of the land.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I waited with curiosity and anxiety to hear what the Chief Secretary for Ireland would say on the question in reference to the case of Mr. Conybeare and Dr. Tanner. I believe I can speak of these hon. Members by name while the Chief Secretary keeps them in prison; and I am bound to say the right hon. Gentleman spoke of these cases in the harsh grating provocative tone he always adopts, adding the harshness of his language to the severity of the punishment. He does not deny that the sentences are severe; he does not deny that the judgments of the Magistrates in both cases were unfavourably commented upon by the Superior Courts.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman attributes to me words I did not use. It was not my business to express an opinion whether the sentences were severe or not, but as the right hon. Gentleman challenges my opinion, I have no reason to think they were.

SIR W. HARCOURT: If the sentences were ten times greater, if it were possible to inflict sentences of ten years' penal servitude, the right hon. Gentleman would not think such a sentence too severe or vindictive to be passed upon a Member of Parliament of the Nationalist Party. The right hon. Gentleman will not deny that these sentences have been severely commented upon by the Superior Courts, but he meets these comments by saying, "Oh, these are technicalities." But is not every point of law a technicality? What the Judges commented upon was that the Magistrates did not take an accurate or just view of the law, and I

Bill dealing with the matter, thereby admitting the illegality of their course; but they did not press that Bill forward, and made no effort to get it passed. How, then, do they now endeavour to get out of their illegal position? Why, by a manœuvre that is almost unexampled. They have arranged that these officials shall cease to be Resident Magistrates, and shall become Justices of the Peace. The Lord Lieutenant has discharged them, at some date unknown, from their offices as Resident Magistrates, and has admitted them, also at some date unknown, as Justices of the Peace. But the men are the same, the duties are the same, and the salary, which it was illegal to pay to them as Resident Magistrates, is also the same, and is now made legal because of their change of office. We have asked for information concerning this manœuvre: we have asked at what date these men ceased to be Resident Magistrates and became Justices of the Peace; we have asked whether they paid the ordinary fees on being admitted as Justices of the Peace, and we have also asked to what counties they have been nominated; and, although we have put all these questions, to which we are entitled to have replies, the Chief Secretary has this evening attempted to move for a flimsy Return which evades the whole question, which gives us no information, and leaves us in precisely the same position as we were in before. But we shall press for this information, and I trust that, as long as the salaries of these Resident Magistrates are sought to be illegally paid, the Irish Members will resist their payment by every constitutional means, until the position of these functionaries, whatever they may be called, is regularised in due form and course of law. I imagine that the reluctance of the Government to give this information is due to an unwillingness to face a full and fair discussion such as is incidental to the progress of a Bill. What are the functions of these remarkable officials? Why, they are a kind of flexible buffer between the Executive and the public, and their function is to push the policy of violence against the public right to the extremest point, and to minimise the responsibility of the Government. Under this system what is called the responsibility of the Government to this House has gone to the vanishing point, and has practically ceased to exist. Under it there is no security for liberty, justice, or fair play to any political opponent of the Government in Ireland. These Divisional Commissioners get up cases, especially against public men, choose the Magistrates who are to try them and who also act as juries, and then present the evidence to the police whose promotion is in their hands. To put it shortly, these men make the charge, constitute the Judge and jury, produce the evidence, and reward the witnesses. There is nothing to compare with this in any part of Great Britain or of the civilised world; and the chance of justice and fair play on the part of any public man engaged in any political movement in Ireland in opposition to the Government has absolutely disappeared. I will refer to one or two of these functionaries. In the North we have Mr. Cameron. He is the man who broke into the empty homes of evicted tenants, and arrested them for forcible possession, and he is the functionary whose impartiality may be judged by the fact that he it was who gave misleading information to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and led him to publish a false libel on the hon. Member for North Monaghan.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): What I said in Court was that, having heard the statement, first of all from Mr. Olphert, I went to the village and consulted with the Divisional Commissioner and another gentleman, and it was because Mr. Cameron and the other gentleman were not able to give me the name, although they had heard of the incident, that I refrained from mentioning the name.

MR. SEXTON.: At any rate, it was after a conversation with this man, that the hon. Gentleman took upon himself to make a statement with regard to the Member for North Monaghan, which he was afterwards obliged to admit on oath to be false. In the West we have Mr. John Byrne, the hero of the Loughrea evictions; further South we have Captain Slacke, and in the County of Cork there is Captain Plunkett, who sounded the keynote of outrage in his famous telegram, "Do not hesitate to shoot." He and Captain Slacke courage and promote those policemen who distinguish themselves by outrage, and repress and degrade those who are conspicuous for humanity and endeavour to perform their duties in a temperate spirit. During the greater part of the last year Captains Plunkett and Slacke devoted themselves to the service to the Times, and judging by the good account the Chief Secretary gave of the state of Ireland in their absence, I think it would be sound economy to save their salaries by transferring them to the Times altogether. To give the House an idea of the relations of these functionaries and the people, I need only refer to the case of my hon. Friend the Member for West Kerry, who has been described by Colonel Turner as a person who has been a persistent breaker of the law and a scurrilous traducer. If my hon. Friend were again to be tried for what in any other country would be called the ordinary exercise of his duty as a journalist he would be tried before Mr. Cecil Roche, who has said of him that he systematically insults the preservers of law and order, and the man to choose his Judge would be Colonel Turner; the Judge would be Mr. Cecil Roche. I ask the Chief Secretary for an explanation of Colonel Turner's conduct with reference to the Vandeleur Estate. Colonel Turner incited the landlords to promote eviction and to bring tenants from distant parts of Ireland to take the vacant farms in the place of the tenants whose title was ancestral. Colonel Vandeleur, who was a high-minded man, was about to settle a dispute with regard to one of his farms, when Colonel Turner interfered and prevented the settlement being carried out. What explanation can the Chief Secretary give of the letter written by Colonel Turner to another official, "Things will never be right in Clare until old Dynan and his villanous priests are removed"? How did Colonel Turner mean them to be removed? The only meaning which I can attach to the letter is that Colonel Turner desires that the police should know that he will be well pleased if the priests had their skulls cracked by batons, or if some of them can be hit by ricochet bullets, such as have been heard of at Mitchelstown. I challenge Colonel Turner to say that he did not mean his subordinates to understand that he would not be sorry if violence were done to the worthy Vicar General of the Diocese and his priests. I now come to the case of the Resident Magistrates, and first I will deal with that of Captain Segrave. That hero has been too much forgotten. His case acquires particular interest from the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork charged Captain Segrave in this House with having embezzled the funds of his regimental canteen as well as money confided to him by a private soldier to send to his mother. Immediately after that the hon. Member, who was never before interfered with on account of his speeches, was charged in respect of a speech which differed in no way from those of which no notice had been taken, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. I believe, and the Irish people believe, that it was not really for the speech that the hon. Member was prosecuted, but for having exposed the misconduct of an official of the Crown. Captain Segrave has been allowed to resign his appointment, from which he ought to have been dismissed with ignominy. I wish to know what was the date of the resignation, and whether Captain Segrave has been allowed to resign in order to enable him at a future time to re-enter the public service. What amount of salary has he been paid since the date of his exposure in this House? Another Resident Magistrate is a gentleman whose name is constantly appearing on the black list. There is Colonel Caddell, a gentleman of whose legal knowledge nobody is satisfied. Only recently he insulted a young girl who was at the time in the custody of the police. The discrepancy between his sentences is remarkable, emergency men being treated with exceptional leniency. Out of the 75 Resident Magistrates whose names appear upon the Return of last March there are only 33 of whose legal knowledge even the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied, while the legal knowledge of the remaining 42 gives no satisfaction to any one in the world. Twelve Magistrates have been selected by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for their legal capacity. Only three of them are barristers, eight are retired officers when the General Election comes we will ask the voters to put them under the rule of "good behaviour," and prevent you for a time from exercising these functions. I can understand your taking a dozen of us, putting us against a wall, bringing up a platoon of soldiers and giving the order "fire!" That would be an intelligible policy, for "when a man's dead, there's no more to be said." But the system you pretend to carry out is that of making the Irish people love you by heaping indignities on their Representatives—on men like Dr. Tanner, who, after all, represents thousands of people. As long as Dr. Tanner was a Conservative, a friend of Lord Bandon, a member of the Cork County Club, but spending money in the interests of the Tory Party, as his brothers now do, he was all right and had a most amiable temper. He would, doubtless, have made a most admirable Resident Magistrate. Why, he has a brother who is a major, and who remains to you as a very strong Conservative; and I would suggest that he should be put before the Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor as a person of whose legal knowledge and experience those individuals might be satisfied; because gentlemen of this class are exactly the sort of men you make Resident Magistrates of. They are just the men who would have the supreme characteristic of being able to bind over to good behaviour the men who recommend the Belfast kidney paving-stone throwers to go and do their duty. Your's, however, is a game that two can play at. You may find it extremely convenient at the present time to have "removables" operating from one end of the country to the other, but no doubt it would be possible to get Magistrates as base as Roche and as irrational as Fitzgerald or Longbourne, even under a Home Rule administration. You can do almost anything with money; and there are a number of broken down gentry and landlords who would be very glad to take our pay—gentlemen whose estates have not been sold under the Ashbourne Act, but who have made bad bargains, and who may be had in sufficient numbers to deal with the hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite and their colleagues. In the meantime, the game is yours; we admit it. Carry it on; do your best—do your worst.

Mr. T. M. Healy

What I protest against is this sickening veil of hypocrisy. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is highly indignant with the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin for the extravagance of his language, and has stated that Dr. Tanner is not a first-class misdemeanant, but is, in point of fact, treated as an untried prisoner, and so, I suppose, is entitled to one or two ounces more of "skilly" than the other prisoners. It is the rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to give the go-by to the main facts of the case and to fasten upon some little pin-point which nobody cares anything about, and which has only been touched on by the way. He then magnifies the matter to enormous dimensions and draws his Excalibur in order to annihilate it. The Government pretend that their anxiety is all for the good of the Irish people—that it is all in the interest of Ireland and the downtrodden population; only, they will not give the downtrodden population a chance of managing their own affairs. They are proceeding with an extravagant amount of energy, and we are having the country developed by them. They appoint all these Magistrates to carry out their policy, and they cannot afford to tell the truth about what they do. They must play the hypocrite; and so long as they do that so long will we come forward and expose them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has lately been boasting how completely he has pacified Ireland—at least if he has not said so by word of mouth he has said it by his permanent conduit pipe; because we have had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham recently giving a garden party and have heard, under the influence of tea and muffins, what extraordinary strides have been made by the Irish people in the direction of prosperity and peace. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will back up the statements of the Sage of Birmingham, but these are matters which are taken note of in the "Black Country." I may have said that I observe curious signs making their appearance in Ireland—remarkable signs; and if these operations on the part of the Government continue—operations against which there is no appeal—if the pledges and promises of the Government continue to be falsified, and if Magistrates composed of ex-Sepoy, broken down barristers, Navy and Army men, and promoted policemen, are to be the persons to whom the Government are to entrust the liberties of a great portion of the Irish representatives, they will bring the people to see that the point of attack is the magisterial system, and, as always occurs when people are outlawed—for that is what is being attempted—the condition of affairs will become much more serious. The Government are showing them that there is no such thing as justice; they have produced a very unfortunate condition of the public mind, and while temporary prosperity may inspire some hope in the people's breasts, and may enable them to tide over a period which they view with great apprehension, there is at the same time being held over them the possibility of twenty years of "firm and resolute Government." While Ireland in the past was overridden by your sabreurs and dragoons, they, at any rate, were soldiers. They carried their lives in their hands against the Irish clansmen; but if these men, these wretched hirelings whom you can pick up in the purlieus of any quarter-master sergeant's rooms, if these men, whom nobody respects, are to be permitted to carry on the Government of the country, the Irish people—the Celtic race—will not permit them to carry on their operations unchecked. You are creating for yourselves an inevitable revulsion of feeling, and when the right hon. Gentleman has passed from his office and handed it down to his successor, it will be said, as is said now, that that successor is the most successful of all Irish Chief Secretaries, and while his friends are blowing his trumpet, they will say, "Balfour was an impostor; we have now got the right man." But when all this has happened, what will you have done for the consolidation of the Empire, for the establishment of peace, and for the prosperity of the people, both the English and Irish at home and abroad? Absolutely nothing. Your policy is a barren policy, foredoomed to failure, and if Englishmen opposite were wise, instead of sitting silent behind a Minister whom at heart they cannot support, they would get up boldly and give expression to their true opinions. We have heard a great many Debates on these subjects in this House, but we never hear what the Tory Party have to say. We see them go into the Division Lobbies, but they never give us the opportunity of judging of their intellectual calibre. If hon. Gentlemen can fairly support the policy of the present Government let them give expression to the faith that is in them, and do not let them be content to servilely follow a Minister who has led them into as fatal a course as ever despot pursued against the interests of the people.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I cannot allow this Debate to close without referring to one or two remarks which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary. Every sentence delivered by him is singular enough; but I do not think we have yet witnessed anything so singular or so utterly beyond what might have been expected as the extent to which he has gone this evening. I would remind him that the charge against Captain Segrave was brought forward several times in this House and was proved against him.

*MR. SPEAKER: Captain Segrave was referred to, but as his salary is not mentioned in this Vote the reference to him is out of order.

MR. GILL: I will not, then, refer to the right hon. Gentleman's justification of the conduct for which Captain Segrave was first cashiered from the Army, and is now suspended from service as a Magistrate in Ireland; but I will allude to what the right hon. Gentleman has said in regard to the charge against Colonel Turner. Colonel Turner was charged with writing what I pronounce to be one of the most infamous documents that ever passed between one Irish official and another. That was a letter in which Colonel Turner described one of the most venerable priests in all Ireland and the body of clergy by whom he is supported in language which could only come from the lips of a blackguard. He referred to the Very Rev.

Dr. Dinan, than whom in the whole Irish nation no more respected clergyman exists, in these terms:—

“The peace of this district will not be restored until old Dinan and some of his villainous priests are removed.”

This, I say, is the language of a ruffian and a blackguard. But when this letter is charged against Colonel Turner what is the reply of the right hon. Gentleman? Does he reprobate that language or does he deny it? The right hon. Gentleman practically endorses the statement and justifies the ruffianly language by levelling other reckless charges against the priest of Clare. He has levelled a most provocative and reckless insult against a body of clergymen, than whom there are no more respected men on the face of the earth, and I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to name a single one of these priests who comes justly under the description given by Colonel Turner. He has not the courage to do so, and I brand that conduct as blackguardly. Indeed, it is difficult for me to find words adequately to describe it. Now, Sir, another charge which has been made against Colonel Turner has not been answered, and that is the charge of going to a tenant on the Vandeleur estate, and urging that tenant—or rather the mother of the tenant—against the wishes of the landlord, and against the desires of the other tenants, as well as against the interests of peace and order in the district, to hold possession of a farm and to resist the complete settlement likely to be arrived at by arbitration. The right hon. Gentleman does not deny that Colonel Turner went to the tenant. He says that Colonel Turner merely told her that she would be protected by the law in holding possession of her farm. But what business had Colonel Turner to do anything of the kind? Why should he seek in this way to prevent a settlement being arrived at? I say that, in that case, he deliberately took the only step in his power to prevent a successful issue to the efforts to bring about harmony between landlord and tenant, and that he took up an utterly unworthy position. Reference has been made to the cases which have been tried under the Act of Edward III., and I should like to point out that during the last three weeks, there has been a regular recrudescence of prosecutions under that Act. I believe that there have been no fewer than thirteen cases. What is the meaning of it? Is it that the Coercion Act having failed in its purpose, the Government have felt bound to fall back on this old Act? They have not succeeded in crushing the Irish people with Coercion, and, therefore, they have had to take this step.

Mr. AIRD (Paddington) rose in his place and claimed to move “That the Question be now put,” but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that question.

Debate resumed.

Mr. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I join heartily in the protest which has been made from these Benches against the appointment of men to administer the law in Ireland who command no confidence in the people, and I must say I am surprised that a Member for a Metropolitan constituency who never distinguishes himself in Debate in the House should get up and move the Closure on this question. Throughout the length and breadth of this land people are now beginning to understand what it is that makes the Irish people so discontented. They realise that the law is administered by men who are incapable of administering it fairly and impartially, that it is administered by a pack of braves. I think if anything is required to give an impetus to the Debate to-night, it will be found in the conduct of the Chief Secretary, and in his references to the priests of County Clare. One of his Resident Magistrates has spoken of these priests as a “pack of villains,” and when complaint is made to the right hon. Gentleman of the use of language of this character with regard to a most respected body of men, what does the right hon. Gentleman, who is responsible for the Government of Ireland, say in reply? Does he deprecate the use of language of that kind? No, we do not hear a single word of condemnation come from his lips. Instead of that, he adds to the insult by declaring that the priests of Clare have disgraced their cloth.

Mr. Gill

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps I may be allowed to point out that I said there were some priests in the County of Clare who were not a credit to their cloth.

MR. W. REDMOND: Then I venture to assert it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to specify those priests to whom he alluded, and not to level an insult against the whole body of the clergy in that county. I must say I do not think that Colonel Turner, whose cause the right hon. Gentleman is championing here to-night, will have cause to be very much obliged to him for the language he has used. Of course one is bound, as far as possible, to keep within the limits of Parliamentary decorum, but I think the right hon. Gentleman would not dare, in any public place in that land of which he is the chief ruler, or before any audience of Irishmen in County Clare, to repeat the utterances which he is privileged to make on the floor of the House of Commons—he would not dare to use language of that kind, for if he did, he would probably require an extra force of police to protect him from the rotten eggs which the people would assuredly use against him. Who are these Resident Magistrates? If I were prudent I should not say a word against them which would increase the prejudice they already have against me. They have already given me three months' imprisonment for nothing at all, except saying three words on the impulse of the moment. One of the Magistrates who did that was a civil engineer and the other an ex-constable, and these are the men of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is supposed to be satisfied. With such lawgivers can you expect the Irish people to have anything but an utter contempt for your Government and your administration. These Magistrates do not even know how to conduct a trial in an ordinary manner, but they surround themselves with police, and the general public are refused admission to their Court. Mr. Cecil Roche, to my knowledge, threatened some people who, whether rightly or wrongly, were defending their homes, that if they did not come out he would make it hot for them when they appeared before him next day. How can the Irish people expect fair and level-handed justice from such men as these, who baton the people one day and try them the next day? If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary ever shows his nose in Clare after insulting in a most unwarrantable manner the priests of the county, I would recommend the people of Clare to give him a warm reception.

DR. KENNY: I may say that I have looked through the Prison Rules and I certainly cannot find that what my right hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin said as to the prison treatment of the hon. Member for Camborne was in any way exaggerated.

SEA FISHERIES (SCOTLAND) REGULATION BILL (No. 330.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill be discharged, and the Bill withdrawn."

MR. MARJORIBANKS: In moving to withdraw this Bill I should like to press upon the Government the great importance of dealing with this question as soon as possible. I hope the Lord Advocate will take it into his consideration during the Recess, and bring in a Bill next Session.

Question put, and agreed to.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 12.] SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [August 24.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 16th August, 1889.

SUCK DRAINAGE BILL (PRIVATE BILL).

On the Motion by the Chairman of Committees, Standing Orders No. XXXIX. and 143A be dispensed with in order to enable the Bill to be read the third time.

*LORD DENMAN briefly protested against the growing practice of suspending Standing Orders in order that Bills might be forced into law. He pointed out that if he pressed his opposition to the Motion to a Division, and secured a Teller, the House would be compelled to meet on a subsequent occasion, because the Standing Orders provided for the attendance of 30 Peers in order to make a Division effective, and at that moment there were not 10 noble Lords in the House. He did not propose to take that extreme course; but he thought it right formally to protest against this hurried legislation, which, he would mention, was always deprecated by the late Chairman of Committees, Lord Redesdale.

The Motion was agreed to, and the Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> and passed, and sent to the Commons.

PALATINE COURT OF DURHAM BILL. (No. 71.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments made by the Lords to the Amendments made by the Commons agreed to.

GENERAL POLICE AND IMPROVEMENT SCOTLAND (ACT 1862.) AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 228.)

Read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

POOR LAW BILL. (No. 195.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order) with the Amendments; further Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL. (No. 112.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order) with the Amendments; further Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons; and to be printed as amended. (No. 232.)

PAYMASTER GENERAL BILL. (No. 208.)

Read 3<sup>a</sup> (according to order), with the Amendment, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

COUNTY COURT APPEALS (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 104.)

Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments considered (according to order), and agreed to.

FEEs OF THE HOUSE.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had laid upon the Table (pursuant to order of yesterday) a table of the fees of this House relating to Appeals, Claims of Peerage, and Claims to Vote for Representative Peers; the same was ordered to lie on the Table, and to be printed, and circulated with the Standing Order of this House relating to Appeals, &c. (No. 231.)

ARBITRATION BILL. (No. 97.)

Commons Amendment considered (according to order), and agreed to.

COINAGE (LIGHT GOLD) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>d</sup> on Thursday next.—(The Marquess of Salisbury). (No. 233.)

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 16th August, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—CAPTAIN PRESTON, R.M.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Captain Preston, R.M., at Keady, County Armagh, on July 25th, refused an adjournment of certain cases for one month, and on application of District Inspector Starkie fixed the cases for August 8th; and that when the parties had gone to great expense and appeared in Court on August 8th, no Resident Magistrate was present, nor was the District Inspector present to prosecute; and, if he can state the reason of the absence of the Resident Magistrate and District Inspector?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand that on the application of the District Inspector the cases of assault on Wallace and others were adjourned by Captain Preston, R.M., and two Local Magistrates to the following Keady Petty Sessions, the 8th inst., on the ground that Wallace, who was injured, was unable to attend. There was an application to adjourn for a month and another for six weeks. The fact that the case was not proceeded with on the 8th was in no way due to no Resident Magistrate being present, as the Court was fully constituted by the attendance of two Local Magistrates, but solely to the unavoidable absence of the District Inspector who, as was explained in the Petty Sessions Court on the 8th inst., was in Dublin attending as a witness in a case of manslaughter.

THE STAFF OF THE ARMY.

COLONEL COTTON (Cheshire, Wirral): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that any officers of the Army Service Corps, unqualified by either Staff College certificates or by service on the staff in the field, have recently been appointed to important posts on the Staff of the Army, tenable hitherto only by officers qualified as above; and whether it is intended to abolish the Staff College qualifications for other branches of the Army?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Officers of the Army Service Corps have not been appointed to any staff positions of which the duties have hitherto been reserved for combatant officers with Staff College certificates or service in the field. The distinction maintained hitherto between supply, transport, and finance duties and general staff duties has been abolished, and a portion of the former are now open to competent officers with the usual staff qualifications; but it is necessary that some or most of these appointments should be filled by men who have previously performed similar duties departmentally. Beyond providing for the changes thus indicated, it is not contemplated to alter the regulations affecting staff appointments.

IRELAND—LAND LAW AMENDMENT.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to a meeting of the labourers and cottiers of County Armagh, held at Derrycorr on 3rd August, in which, as reported in the Lurgan Times, they requested the Government to have the Land Law amended, so that whatever terms were given farmers in purchasing their holdings should also be conceded to the labourers for the purchase of their cottages and plots of garden, repayable in 49 years at four per cent interest; and, if the Government would consider the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government are not aware of any meeting of the kind referred to in the question, and, moreover, I do not see that I can add anything to the reply which I gave to a question of the hon. Member on the 26th of July.

MR. BLANE: All I ask is that the right hon. Gentleman will give to the labourers the same terms as those which are given to the farmers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman must himself see that it would be premature for the Government to pledge themselves in regard to the provisions of any Bill which they may hereafter bring before the House.

MR. BLANE: I merely ask that the same facilities should be given by the Government to the labourers as those which are given to the farmers. I do not ask for more.

BODMIN GAOL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that, on Wednesday, 3rd July, George Symons, aged 22, of Parc-Bracket Street, Camborne, after serving a month's imprisonment with hard labour in the Cornwall County Gaol, Bodmin, on a charge of day poaching, had suffered so much from the prison treatment that he was in a semi-unconscious state when brought home, and died on the following Monday; that he was much emaciated when released; that his own clothes, which he had to resume on leaving the gaol, were in such a damp condition that they were covered with blue mould; that no inquest was held, a certificate of death from inflammation being supplied by the medical attendant at Camborne; and will the Government order any inquiry?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): It appears that George Symons, on admission to prison, was pronounced fit to undergo his sentence of one month's imprisonment; that during his imprisonment he made no complaint to the Acting Governor or to the prison doctor; nor, indeed, when he was seen by them the day before his discharge. He left the prison on Wednesday, July 3rd, in good spirits; and the senior officer reports that his clothes were clean and dry, and that he made no complaint as to their condition. His death on the following Monday was, according to two local newspapers, attributed to excessive eating. No grounds for an inquiry seem to exist in this case.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): Does it not follow that if excessive eating followed the release from prison the man must have been starved in gaol?

[No answer was given.]

IRELAND—DERRY GAOL.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if John M'Gee, who died at Dunfanaghy, County Donegal, on his way home from Londonderry Prison, was suffering from typhus fever a considerable time before his discharge, and if his case had been reported to the Lord Lieutenant as being in danger of death before his discharge; if any Report were made that his health was impaired by the imprisonment, and what was the nature of the Reports sent, and the date of each; what was the date of his transfer to the prison hospital; how long was he there, and under what circumstances was he sent back to his cell; how long was he in his cell suffering from fever; and, will the Government lay the Medical Reports of the case upon the Table of the House?

MR. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) put a question on the same subject, and added that he had received a telegram from Derry informing him that the prison doctor had stated that Mr. Conybeare was suffering from skin disease.

DR. KENNY: With reference to the cases of M'Gee and Seyes, two of the Falcarragh prisoners recently confined in Derry Gaol, and who have died since their liberation, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can state the dates on which they first complained to the prison doctor, and the entries, if any, made in his report book by the doctor as to their respective cases; whether they were removed from their cells to prison hospital; and, if so, the dates on which they were removed, and whether the cells they had occupied were flagged or boarded, the diseases from which they were respectively suffering when they were removed to hospital, if they were so removed, and the dates of their liberation; whether he can give similar particulars concerning the case of Diver, an untried prisoner from Gweedore recently liberated in ill-health; and, whether inquests have yet been held on John M'Gee and Michael Seyes, and, if so, he can state the findings of the juries in each case?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I have also to ask the Chief Secretary what account he can now give of the sanitary state of Derry Prison, and of the circumstances of the illness and death of John M'Gee and Michael Seyes, and the illness of Patrick Driver, all tenants imprisoned under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, and lately released from Derry Prison; whether M'Gee was twice in the gaol hospital during his imprisonment, and on each occasion was sent back to ordinary treatment against his protest, and on the second occasion was too weak to dress himself; whether the prison records of his illness will be laid upon the Table; whether, at the time of his release, M'Gee was in a delirious condition, and fell down on being deprived, by the intervention of a warder, of assistance in walking out of prison; whether M'Gee died within 48 hours after his release; and, whether emergency men in charge of an evicted farm at Falcarragh, his native place, hoisted the Union Jack on hearing of his death?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The results now received of the special investigation made by the medical member of the General Prisons Board show that Londonderry Prison has, for at least a period of 20 years, enjoyed a remarkable immunity from the principal zymotic diseases. There has been no case of fever among the prisoners during that period, nor is there any now. A thorough examination of the sanitary arrangements has satisfied Dr. O'Farrell that there is nothing in the present condition of the prison which could be in any way injurious to health. From references contained in the questions, some hon. Members appear to be under the impression that the prisoners specially named in the question were under sentences imposed under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act. That is not the case. M'Gee and Seyes were convicted before a jury at the last Spring Assizes. Diver was an untried prisoner. Two prisoners convicted under that Act were recently discharged—namely, the Rev. Mr. Stephens, on the ground of ill-health (though he himself is understood to have protested that he was well), and F. Kelly, on the conclusion of his sentence. The prisoner M'Gee was in the prison hospital from the 1st of June till the 3rd of July, when he was transferred to his cell, as his further detention in hospital was not considered necessary. He was, however, still carefully looked after by the doctor in his cell, and, getting worse, he was again placed in hospital on the 24th of July, and detained there until the expiration of his sentence on the 8th of August, when he was discharged on his own demand. The doctor was most unwilling that he should go out. He specially warned him that he was not fit to travel, and he offered to get him into the County Infirmary if he was unwilling to remain in the prison hospital. M'Gee, however, insisted on going away, and refused to use the van provided for him, and, on his way home, travelled 20 miles on an outside car in inclement weather. An inquest in his case is proceeding. Seyes was discharged on the 13th of last month. He was then recovering from an attack of pneumonia of one lung, and through the recommendation of the medical officer, the remission of the remainder of his sentence had been granted, as it was believed that his recovery would be more rapid in his native air. At the time when the order for discharge was received, however, the medical officer thought that the prisoner was not fit to travel, and he urged him not to go. The prisoner, however, insisted on taking his discharge, and there was no power to detain him. He is said to have since died; but whether of fever or some independent cause is not known to the authorities. Diver, an untried prisoner, awaiting his trial on a charge of murder, was committed to prison on the 28th of February, 1889, and between that date and the 29th of July he was treated in hospital on three different occasions for spitting and passing blood. On the 29th of July he was discharged on bail on this ground, and he is believed to be making a good recovery. There does not appear to be any reason to apprehend any risk of contagion in the case of the hon. Member for the Camborne Division, or any other prisoner.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: Has the right hon. Gentleman received any information similar to that conveyed in the telegram to me—namely, that the doctor of the prison has reported that Mr. Conybeare is suffering from skin disease, and, if not, will he cause inquiries to be made?

MR. SEXTON: There is one part of my question which the right hon. Gentleman has not answered, whether on each of the two occasions that Mr. M'Gee was sent back from the hospital to his cell against his protest; whether, on the second occasion, he was too weak to dress himself; whether the prison records about his illness will be laid on the Table; whether at the time of his release he was in a delirious condition, and whether he fell to the ground when deprived of the support of the warders on leaving the gaol? I would further ask how it happens that Seyes and Magee were so ill as not to be fit to travel; whether Magee died in 48 hours after his release; and if an Emergency man did not raise the Union Jack at one of the houses at Falcaragh upon hearing of Magee's death?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no truth in regard to the Union Jack being raised. I believe that Magee died owing to an illness contracted through travelling on an outside car during inclement weather against the doctor's orders. I do not believe Magee was in a delirious condition when released, and there is no truth in the statement that when he was sent from the hospital to his cell he protested against that course being taken. The confidential Report of Dr. O'Farrell has been received, and I will consider the desirability of placing it on the Table.

MR. SEXTON: Also the prison records.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think they will be required in addition to Dr. O'Farrell's Report.

MR. M'ARTHUR: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he has received a telegram about the health of the hon. Member for Camborne?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no telegram. All these things are carefully watched, and I have no doubt that I shall receive full information.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the Government have been obliged to discharge four prisoners from Derry Gaol in the last three weeks owing to the condition of the building, and have not two of them died, the others being so seriously ill that they have been admitted to bail, although bail was previously refused? Under such circumstances, I request that an independent medical man may be sent to the gaol to investigate the condition of the prison.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet read Dr. O'Farrell's Report. I see no reason for ordering an inquiry, although no doubt there are circumstances which are still deserving of examination. But it has been found that the illness in each of the cases spoken of was not due either to the medical treatment or to the unsanitary condition of the prison itself.

MR. T. M. HEALY: One of the prisoners who is now dead was, prior to his imprisonment, as fine a young man as could be found in the whole country. It is precisely a similar case as that of the man Larkin, whose father was unable to recognise him after he had been in prison.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think there are any grounds for an independent inquiry. No doubt there have been these unfortunate cases. Occasionally things of this kind must occur, but the death rate in Derry Gaol is much lower than the death rate in Derry town.

DR. KENNY: The fact that the death rate in the gaol is lower than that in the town does not amount to much. The right hon. Gentleman has not answered a portion of my question—namely, whether the cells are boarded or flagged. Will he give us the Reports to the Prison Board upon these cases, from beginning to end?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I can see my way to lay the Reports upon the Table I will do so. They contain all the information the hon. Gentleman requires.

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT CLAIM ON INSURANCE COMPANIES.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of T. M. Bonar, of Staplehill, Bristol, who in October, 1888, insured himself against accidents with five different Insurance Companies, and in May, 1889, made claims against each of them for a broken leg alleged to have resulted from an accident sustained in Glasgow; and whether it is the case that two eminent Glasgow surgeons who examined the case deponed that Bonar's leg had never been broken, and that Dr. Campbell, the medical attendant whose name was appended to each of the five certificates sent in in support of the different claims, has deponed that his purported signature is in every case a forgery; and, if so, if he would state the grounds on which the Crown Office directed the public prosecutor at Glasgow not to bring forward the case for trial?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): My attention has been called to this case. It is the fact that an eminent surgeon who saw Bonar's leg was of opinion that it had not been broken, but he thought the injury sufficiently serious to justify the use of splints, and he granted a certificate upon which one of the Insurance Companies made a grant of £6 a week for two weeks. As this was the only sum of money actually obtained from any of the companies, and as it was paid upon the certificate which I have mentioned, and not upon the strength of any of those to which Dr. Campbell's name was improperly appended, Crown counsel were of opinion that a conviction would not be obtained, and that the circumstances, although highly irregular, were not such as to justify a prosecution.

NUISANCE AT KENSINGTON.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the existence of a nuisance caused to some of the residents in the parish of Kensington by the burning of bricks in certain fields outside that parish; and whether Her Majesty's Government will promote or support legislation, with the view of making such nuisances removable by law?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: The Secretary of State's attention has been called, by a memorial submitted to him by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Kensington, to the existence of the alleged nuisance. Apart from such remedies as may be open to individuals for injury to private rights, the abatement of nuisances in the Metropolis is committed by Statute to Local Authorities, such as Vestries and District Boards, and the Secretary of State has no power to initiate proceedings, except where the nuisance complained of amounts to smoke nuisance within the meaning of the Act of 1853, or where it is made to appear to the Secretary of State that the Local Authorities fail to proceed actively and impartially in noticing and suppressing nuisances. No pledge can be given as to legislation.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: In consequence of the answer of my hon. Friend, I beg to give notice that early next Session I will ask leave to bring in a Bill to deal with such nuisances affecting the Metropolis.

IRELAND—LAW AND POLICE— PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any complaint has reached him that Francis Sherlock, of Ootehill, who was a witness in a case against John Glennan and others on the 11th and 12th October, 1888, at Cavan, received a letter from the Clerk of the Crown and Peace to the effect that he had paid a cheque for 10s. 6d. not to Sherlock but to Buchanan; and whether this man will get paid his expenses out of pocket and loss of time also?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It appears that Buchanan forged the names of Goss and Sherlock to two cheques of 10s. 6d. each, which had been issued in payment of their expenses as witnesses, and entrusted to him for transmission to them. Buchanan was subsequently sentenced to six months' imprisonment for the forgery. In the circumstances, the Crown Solicitor was authorised on the 30th July to issue further cheques to Messrs. Goss and Sherlock for these amounts, which, I presume, they have before this received. Mr. Sherlock put forward a further claim for expenses and loss of time, which, however, it was found, upon inquiry, could not be sustained as a charge against public moneys.

THE DUBLIN AND WEXFORD TRAINS.

MR. O'HANLON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is a fact that the trains to and from Dublin and Wexford stop at a station only one mile from Newcastle, and that no letters are sent either way, but that the letters are carried on foot seven miles to Newtown Kennedy, at a very great loss of time and inconvenience to the traders; and, whether he will arrange that in future letters be lifted at Newcastle Station by the train service?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The hon. Member is correct in stating that the trains to and from Dublin and Wexford stop at a station which is about one mile from the Newcastle Post Office, and that no letters to and from this office are conveyed by these trains. The correspondence is conveyed on foot between the Newcastle and Newtown Mount Kennedy offices, which are three miles apart. The morning delivery of letters commences at Newcastle at 7 a.m., and no improvement in this respect is needed. The day mail letters are delivered at 5 p.m., at the same time as the collection for the night mail takes place. An acceleration could be made in the hour of delivering the day mail letters, and a later hour for posting letters in the evening could be granted, if the train service were utilised; but the amount of correspondence is far too small to justify the additional expenditure which this alteration would involve.

BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having in view the hardship inflicted upon small landowners by their being driven to the expense of opposing before a Parliamentary Committee the inclusion within a borough boundary of land of a rural character, he will make provision that the attention of Parliament shall be directed to any future case in which it is proposed to obtain an extension of the boundary of a borough by a Local Bill, instead of by application for a Provisional Order under "The Local Government Act, 1888?"

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): In the case of Bills promoted by Local Authorities dealing with matters under the jurisdiction of the Local Government Board, the Board, in accordance with the Standing Order, submit Reports to the Committees to which the Bills are referred. Attention would be drawn in these Reports to any proposal to extend a borough by Local Bill.

BELTED CRUISERS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is any truth in the statement of the Times correspondent of August 10th—namely,

"I must, however, call attention to the fact that in one of the belted cruisers of our squadron if the sheet anchor is let go there is absolutely no means of weighing it, as a six-inch wire hawser has been supplied in lieu of a chain cable. Nautical men will know what this means. And, further, if there is steam on the main engines it is also on all the auxiliary engines, as no stop-valves are fitted. Fires had to be put out the other day in order to make good a leak in a joint of the steam pipe of the capstan engine;"

and, if so, whether he will ascertain who is to blame for such shortcomings?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The allowance of chain cables at present supplied to the belted cruisers is 350 fathoms, and if proved to be necessary that amount will, after the manœuvres, be increased. The other statement with regard to the absence of stop-valves has evidently been made under a misapprehension, as there is a separate system for the auxiliary and main engines, and in no case would it be necessary to draw the fires in order to repair a leak in the steam pipe of the capstan engine.

IRELAND—FAIR RENTS IN NEWRY.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Stephen M'Oann, of Lislea, Camlough, County Armagh, and 25 other tenants on the estate of the late Mr. Edward Quin, of Newry, had their applications for having a fair rent fixed dismissed by Mr. D. Tuckey, B.L., at Newry Land Commission, and that, in the judgment, the Commissioners stated that the leases were dated between the years 1826 and 1832, the period covered by the two subletting Acts, and that the cases were dismissed owing to a defect in the Act of last Session, which did not embrace leases which contained no non-alienation clause; and, whether the Government would amend the law so as to cover the leases mentioned?

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that I have introduced a Bill—the Leaseholders Bill—to remedy this defect, and that when I have repeatedly endeavoured to move the Second Reading, hon. Members below the Gangway opposite have always objected, and, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, will the Government give facilities for the progress of the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that it is the fact that the Bill to which my hon. Friend refers does deal with the subject raised in the question of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Blane), and my impression is that it has been objected to by hon. Gentlemen sitting in that quarter of the House. In reply to the question on the Paper, I may say that I have received no Report in regard to the cases mentioned. Personally, I should be extremely glad if the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim (Mr. Macartney) were to become law.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS (TRANSFER OF POWERS) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Provisional Order Government Departments (Transfer of Powers) Bill is to be abandoned in consequence of the Report of the Select Committee; if a similar Bill will be introduced next year; and, if not, how the Government propose to carry out the undertaking they gave last year to enlarge the powers of County Councils by transferring to them certain duties of the Government Departments?

Mr. Blane

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman will recognise that the Government have, by introducing the Government Departments (Transfer of Powers) Provisional Order Bill, fulfilled the undertaking under which they came last Session, and I regret that the Report of the Select Committee to which the Bill was referred precludes the Bill being proceeded with this year. No enlargement of the powers of the County Councils can take place without legislation, and I cannot give any assurance as to the legislation that may be proposed next Session.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to give notice that on a future day I will call attention to this subject.

THE ULSTER AND TYRONE CANAL.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the agreement of transfer, in accordance with "The Ulster and Tyrone Navigation Act, 1888," has been ratified; and, if so, when; whether the Company has yet received any money from the Treasury; and, if so, how much; whether the Company has yet executed any repairs or performed any work on these canals; and, if so, to what extent; and, whether in addition to the grant the Company has obtained or is seeking for a loan from the Treasury?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): 1. The agreement for the transfer of the Ulster and Tyrone Canals to the Lagan Navigation was completed on the 8th March and the transfer has been carried out. 2. The Company has commenced the work of repair, and has, I am informed, done about 25 per cent of the contemplated work. 3. The Board of Public Works has advanced to the Company out of the Parliamentary Grant the sum of £1,500. No loan has been or is in process of negotiation at present.

FOREIGN OFFICE LIST.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the publication known as the Foreign Office List, with a large royal crown upon it, is a Government publication or is subsidised by the Government and edited by a Government official; if so, whether the Secretary of State has sanctioned its being made up in great part of trade advertisements, and mixed and interleaved with such advertisements, so as to render it very troublesome to find indexes, maps, &c., hid among the copious advertisements of patent medicines, insurance offices, and other matters?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N. E.): The Foreign Office List is not an official publication, and is not subsidised by Her Majesty's Government. It purports to be edited by a member of the Civil Service. There is only one page of advertisements interleaved immediately before the maps and one before the Index at the end of the book.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Have the publishers any authority for putting the mark of the crown upon this publication?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

HYDERABAD—BRITISH RESIDENT.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Mr. Howell, having been appointed to the Hyderabad Residency at an exceptionally difficult crisis, and having acted in the capacity of Resident to the satisfaction of the Government for 18 months or upwards, has lately been removed because he differed from the Nizam's Ministers in regard to the grant of fresh concessions to the parties in London who obtained the Deccan Mines Concessions in collusion with the Nizam's representative; whether the Secretary of State in Council has disapproved of the arrangement so made, and referred it back to India; and whether, under these circumstances, care will be to maintain the independence of judgment of the British Resident?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Mr. Howell was never appointed Resident at Hyderabad. He was in March, 1888, directed to officiate as Resident during the absence of the late incumbent of that office, and he continued in the temporary post until a successor was appointed. The Secretary of State has no reason to suppose that the non-appointment of Mr. Howell to the permanent office was due to any difference of opinion with the Nizam's Ministers in respect to the Deccan Mining Company. The Secretary of State has not disapproved of the arrangements made. He has no doubt that the Viceroy, in selecting an officer for the important post of Resident at Hyderabad, has exercised the discretion vested in him with due regard to the public interest.

UNQUALIFIED MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the report in the Daily News of 26th June of an inquest held at the Coroner's Court, High Street, Borough, on the body of a child named James Abraham Smith, when evidence was given to the effect that the child had been attended and prescribed for by an unqualified medical practitioner; that a qualified practitioner who had been called in and had declined to give a certificate, deposed to making a post mortem examination, which showed that death was due to narcotic poisoning; that a certificate was afterwards signed by another doctor who had never seen the child, but stated the cause of death to be dentition and convulsions; and, whether the Registrar General proposes to take any action in the matter?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have made inquiry of the Registrar General and am informed that the death of a child named Smith was registered on the certificate of Mr. Carr, a duly registered medical practitioner, who stated on his certificate that he had attended the child during its last illness, and that the cause of death was, to the best of his knowledge, "Dentition. Convulsions." From information received by the local registrar from other sources, he thought that the case was of a suspicious character, and sent information to the coroner. An inquest was held and a verdict found that the cause of death was narcotic poisoning, but whether caused by an overdose of prescription given by an unqualified practitioner there was not sufficient evidence to show. The coroner requested the registrar to inform the Registrar General that Mr. Carr had certified that he had attended the child, although he had in fact never seen it, the child having been attended by Mr. Carr's unqualified assistant. The Registrar General has asked to be furnished with a copy of the depositions.

He has not yet received them, and he has therefore at present no evidence on which to take action.

THE ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY.

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Royal Dublin Society to whom in 1888 and 1889 sums of £5,000 were paid for the encouragement of the breeding of horses and cattle in Ireland, out of the share of the Probate Duties allotted to Ireland, is a body subject to any proper control; whether he will state how many bulls have stood for service under this Grant in the mountainous districts of Ireland where the poorer portion of the population reside; whether in such cases, if any, he will state the name of the place where the bull stood, and the breed to which he belonged; whether it is a fact that no stallion has stood under this Grant in the County Kerry either in 1888 or 1889; and, whether the County Kerry has been excluded from the scheme proposed for stallions in 1890; and, if so, whether he can state the reason for this systematic exclusion of the County Kerry from the benefits of this Grant as regards stallions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet received a Report upon this question, and must therefore ask the hon. Gentleman to defer it.

THE DUTIES OF THE IRISH POLICE.

MR. MAHONY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at a Court which was held at Kingscourt, County Cavan, on the 7th instant, presided over by Messrs. A. M. Harpur and H. Turner, Resident Magistrates, where Margaret Fitzsimons, of Tullybrick, was prosecuted for having taken forcible possession of the house from which her husband was evicted on 11th April last, and Sergeant Robert Backhouse, Royal Irish Constabulary, Kingscourt, deposed that on the day following the eviction he, on behalf of Samuel Eatkins, who had taken the farm, offered Mrs. Fitzsimons £15, if she would leave the premises; whether it is part of the duty of the police to act as agent for persons like Eatkins, and to facilitate their getting possession of evicted farms; and, whether he is aware that Mrs.

Fitzsimons had Samuel Eatkins summoned for assaulting and threatening to shoot her, but that these summonses, having been postponed five times at Petty Sessions on the intervention of the police, pending the prosecution of Mrs. Fitzsimons, were finally dismissed by Mr. A. M. Harpur, Resident Magistrate, on the ground that Mrs. Fitzsimons was a trespasser, and that therefore Eatkins was entitled to take the law in his own hands and to assault and threaten to shoot her?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the case that Sergeant Backhouse acted on behalf of Eatkins in the matter. Eatkins when reporting to the police that the farm had been retaken forcible possession of mentioned that he would gladly give Mrs. Fitzsimons £10 or £15 to leave quietly. The sergeant when on patrol duty at the farm stated during a friendly conversation with Mrs. Fitzsimons that it would be better for her if she left quietly getting at the same time this sum of money than to have to leave eventually without it. Mrs. Fitzsimons summoned Eatkins for an alleged assault. The case was postponed five times, at first on the application of Eatkins' solicitor on the ground that the Crown were considering a case of forcible possession against Mrs. Fitzsimons, and that it would be almost impossible to separate the two cases, and at the end of July Mrs. Fitzsimons further charged Eatkins with threatening to shoot her. All these cases were heard before Mr. Harper at Petty Sessions on 7th August. He decided that there was no evidence of the alleged assault or attempted shooting, and that Mrs. Fitzsimons was a trespasser. He did not say that Eatkins was entitled to take the law into his hands.

THE 3RD LEICESTERSHIRE REGIMENT.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY (Leicester, Melton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the 3rd Battalion Leicestershire Regiment, at their last annual training, was obliged to go to Stratford-on-Avon for its musketry course, owing to the refusal of the Volunteer Authorities at Ashby-de-la-Zouch to let the regiment in question use the ranges at Ashby, which are hired by the Volunteers: and that the cost of transport of the 3rd Leicestershire Regiment from Leicestershire to Stratford-on-Avon and back exceeded £240; whether it is a fact this refusal also extends to the 17th Regimental District Depot; and, whether, if this is so, the War Office will consider the advisability of providing a range for the 17th Regimental District Depot, and the 3rd Leicestershire Regiment, which will be within reasonable distance of their headquarters?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The range at Ashby is private property, and the owner will not permit its use by the Regular troops and the Militia. The 3rd Battalion Leicestershire Regiment was, therefore, sent for musketry to Stratford-on-Avon as the nearest range available. Every effort has been made, hitherto without success, to obtain ground for a range nearer the headquarters of the regimental district.

THE TEMPLETON AND HOPE ESTATES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a large number of the tenantry on the Templeton and Hope estates in the Castleblayney Union have had applications to have a fair rent fixed listed for hearing by the Land Sub-Commission for nearly two years, and which have not yet been heard; whether he is aware that the landlords of these estates are issuing ejectments against these tenants, with the purpose of depriving them of the right to have fair rents fixed; and whether he will cause the Land Commission to promptly afford facilities for hearing the cases of these tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have not yet received a Report I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question.

ORANGEMEN AND CATHOLICS.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Saturday evening, the 3rd instant, between 7 p.m. and 8 p.m., an Orange fife and drum band from Ballymena stopped opposite the Roman Catholic church in the town of Antrim, and there, surrounded by a large crowd, obstructed the thoroughfare and played Party tunes, including "Kick the Pope," while the priests and people were at their devotions in the church; that, when the sergeant of police ordered them to move away, a member of the band used most insulting language and brandished a drum stick in the sergeant's face; and that the band, on going away, began to curse the Pope and make use of other insulting language in the presence of the police; whether this same band misconducted themselves in Antrim on another occasion within the last three years, when the police were chased into their barracks; whether any, and what, steps will be taken to prevent a repetition of this conduct and to protect the Catholic people from insult when attending devotions in their church; and whether he can state if there is any Roman Catholic holding the Commission of the Peace within the Petty Sessions district of Antrim, and, if not, why some of the eligible Catholics living there are not appointed Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the Constabulary Report received in the matter it would appear that the facts are altogether exaggerated in the question. So far as the police are aware, there was no Divine Service going on in the chapel. The parish priest was observed at the chapel door and afterwards at his house, and he did not inform them that there was any service going on. A drummer did shake his drumstick at the sergeant, but the band do not appear to have cursed anybody or used insulting language. It is not the case that this band ever chased the police into their barracks or committed any breach of the peace. The police will at all times take every possible step to prevent any interruption to Divine Service. There appears to be one Roman Catholic Magistrate who has attended occasionally at the Antrim Petty Sessions. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland is always ready to consider the names of any properly qualified Roman Catholics who may be recommended to him for appointment to the Commission of the Peace by the Lieutenant of the County.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not the fact that on a recent occasion when a Nationalist band defended themselves against an attack by the crowd, the bandsmen were all summoned? In this case it appears that the band defied the police.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information.

CATTLE DISEASE.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Vice Chamberlain if he can say whether the Lord President of the Council has received a copy of a Report agreed to at a special meeting of the Cattle Diseases Committee of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, again inviting the Privy Council to re-consider their intention to permit the importation of animals from Holland without the safeguard of slaughter or quarantine, which has been insisted on as necessary for the exclusion of contagious disease since 1877; whether in view of his statement that foot-and-mouth disease existed in Schleswig-Holstein as lately as 16th July last, and of the admitted existence of foot-and-mouth disease in other parts of Germany and in Belgium, the Privy Council remain satisfied that Holland can, by means of existing regulations, offer reasonable security against the possible passage of contagion through the Netherlands to this country if no precautions whatever are taken at the ports; whether he can inform the House of the precise date at which the Privy Council became satisfied of the reasonable security of the Netherlands; and, whether, under existing circumstances and in the face of the alarm very generally felt in this country, he can hold out any hope of the revocation of the Order admitting Dutch animals, or will at all events assent to a further postponement of its execution?

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN (Viscount LEWISHAM, Lewisham): A letter has been received from the Central Chamber of Agriculture on the subject of the importation of animals from Holland without being subject to slaughter or quarantine. The Privy Council were satisfied at the date of the passing of the Animals Amendment Order on March 1 last that the Netherlands Government had complied with the provisions of the 5th schedule to the Act of 1878, paragraph 4, and having regard to the terms of the Act they felt that they had no option but to admit cattle from that country without being subject to slaughter or quarantine. Since that date nothing has occurred to alter the view their Lordships then took, and under the circumstances they do not propose to further suspend the operation of the Order.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: Arising out of the question may I ask whether, in view of the fact that foot-and-mouth disease exists not only in Germany but also in Belgium, attention will be called by the Privy Council to the Order of the 1st of March, at all events until the Board of Agriculture have considered the subject.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM: The Board of Agriculture will have to be guided by the same Act of Parliament as the Privy Council.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK: I beg to ask the Vice Chamberlain whether, with reference to the detailed Return now in course of preparation relative to the cost of compensation for slaughter of animals in outbreaks of pleuro-pneumonia in the United Kingdom, he can state to the House the total sum accounted for as paid for compensation in England and Scotland respectively in each of the last three years, distinguishing the amount incurred in respect of diseased cattle, and cattle in contact with animals suffering from disease?

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM: The following amounts were returned as having been paid as compensation for the slaughter of diseased and healthy animals in the years 1886, 1887, and 1888, but in some cases in the two former years the amount received by the Local Authorities for the sale of carcasses was not deducted:—England, 1886, diseased, £14,641 2s. 3d.; healthy, £7,809 11s. 11d.—total, £22,450 14s. 2d.; 1887, diseased, £10,534 10s. 10d.; healthy, £7,209 0s. 9d.—total £17,743 11s. 7d.; 1888, diseased, £10,260 15s.; healthy, £37,178 16s. 10d.;—total, £47,437 11s. 10d., together £87,631 17s. 7d. Scotland, 1886, diseased, £6,299 5s. 2d.; healthy, £8,832 0s. 5d.—total, £15,131 5s. 7d.; 1887, diseased, £10,863 14s. 4d.; healthy, £15,657 1s. 10d.—total, £26,520 16s. 2d.; 1888, diseased, £3,005 12s. 4d.; healthy, £20,513 12s. 3d.—total, £23,518 4s. 7d., together

£65,170 6s. 4d. Total England and Scotland in the three years, £152,802 3s. 11d.

THE COINAGE.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is a fact that the Bank of England have been instructed not to issue any more half-sovereigns at present, but to put into circulation instead as many double florins and crowns as possible; and whether, taking into consideration the serious inconvenience likely to arise therefrom to farmers during harvest he will at once allow the usual issue of half-sovereigns to take place?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No, Sir; instructions have not been given to suspend the issue of half-sovereigns altogether, but I have requested the Bank of England to limit the issue of this most expensive coin as far as possible, and in consequence of the numerous complaints made in this House and elsewhere with regard to the difficulty of obtaining sufficient silver coin, I have urged the Bank to do their best to meet these complaints. The proportion of half-sovereigns in circulation is immense. The remonstrance of my hon. Friend comes from the only quarter of the kingdom from which so far any murmurs have reached me. They have been stimulated by a circular from a private bank stating erroneously that I had altogether suspended the coinage of half-sovereigns. As to the question of inconvenience in the greater use of silver, I admit the possibility of somewhat greater trouble to bankers and employers; but, on the other hand, far from being inconvenient to those who receive the coin, in the great majority of cases one of the first things which the receiver of wages has to do is to change the sovereign or half-sovereign which has been given him, and that change in many quarters of the country has not been readily procured. I understand that an employer of labour in the eastern counties said he wanted £2,000 in half-sovereigns every week. That is more than any single individual has a right to demand of that particular coin. The wear and tear of a half-sovereign is nearly as great as that of a whole one. The percentage of loss, therefore, is nearly double on it. There are supposed to be £20,000,000 in circulation of half-sovereigns—i.e., 40,000,000 of this coin. They may not circulate in equal proportions in all parts of the country; but the sum total seems to be much more than enough to perform the functions at present expected from this coin.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Have the Bank of England increased the circulation of double florins and double half-crowns, and will the right hon. Gentleman give directions to have the value of the coin stated on the reverse of either of those two coins, to obviate the difficulty which many persons experience in distinguishing between them?

*MR. GOSCHEN: There is practically the same difference between the four-shilling piece and the five-shilling piece in design as there is between the two-shilling piece and the half-crown, but no doubt the amount is not stated on either of the two coins. The matter has been brought to my attention, and if I could be sure that the circulation of this class of coin, which I believe to be not at all inconvenient to many of the working classes, would be increased by a change, I should be glad to consider the point.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the great difficulty that has been experienced in obtaining small silver coins?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have given an answer once or twice upon that point, but am glad to repeat it. There is a large stock of shillings and sixpences at the Bank of England. If they have not been circulated in the country so extensively as may have been desired, it has been because the bankers themselves did not pay them out to their customers. So far as the Mint is concerned there are large stocks of the coins, and the profit upon them is sufficient to make the Government desire to stimulate their circulation.

THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will state whether any, and what, classification prevails in the Postal Telegraph Service; whether the like classification prevails in all towns; and what appointments are properly described as of the first class?

*MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member will find the classification of the telegraph staff fully set forth in a Parliamentary Paper, No. 286, ordered by the House to be printed on the 17th of June, 1881. The classification then approved applies to the central staff as well as to the staff in the provincial offices. Appointments which belong to the first class are those to which the highest class of duty appertains.

THE 4TH HUSSARS.

MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Island Bridge Barracks were duly handed over to the 4th Hussars on their arrival from Cork, and that the headquarters, recruits, and married men were settled there; if the Royal Barracks were too unhealthy for the 5th Dragoon Guards, why the 4th Hussars are to be removed there; and, if they are removed from Island Bridge, whether the expenses incurred by the married men will be repaid them?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The details of these removals are all arranged by the Commander of the Forces in Ireland, and I have not yet received a Report on the circumstances, and I would only now repeat what I said yesterday—that in the cavalry barracks in question there has been no recent case of fever nor any evidence of unhealthy condition.

THE CRAWFORD CASE.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the indignation expressed by Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy and the Parsee community of Bombay at certain statements recently published in the Blue Book on the Crawford case; and whether any opportunity will be afforded to the author of those statements of publicly explaining them?

SIR J. GORST: No representation on this subject has been made to Her Majesty's Government.

THE BOMBAY-BURMA TRADING CORPORATION.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether sanction has been accorded by the Secretary of State to the concession of a monopoly in the working of the forests of Upper Burma to the Bombay-Burma Trading Corporation; and whether the Correspondence on this subject, with the text of the contracts or agreements between the Government of India and the Bombay-Burma Trading Corporation, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR J. GORST: The Bombay-Burma Trading Corporation were in possession of a monopoly, granted by the late King, at the time of the conquest of Burma. An agreement on the basis of the rights then possessed by the Corporation was made a year ago between the Corporation and the Secretary of State in Council. Papers on the subject, if moved for, will be laid on the Table.

SEIZURE OF FISHING NETS.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherlandshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the seizure of five fishing nets belonging to Martin Kennedy and Lachlan Curry, fishermen, in Lochindaal, on the night July 23rd-24th, by Major Wise, a lessee of certain fishings in Islay; whether it is true, as stated, that the seizure of nets referred to took place half-a-mile beyond the protected line, and was consequently illegal; whether it is true that a fortnight after the seizure of the nets, Major Wise had not lodged any complaint with the criminal authorities, but retained the nets, and refused to deliver them to their owners; and, if, on inquiry, it appears that the appropriation and retention of the nets was illegal, in view of the frequency of similar treatment of fishermen by fishing tenants in the Highlands, he will instruct the Procurator Fiscal to institute proceedings in this case?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone this question until next week.

THE MAILS TO THE NORTH.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received an excerpt from the Minutes of the meeting of the Magistrates and Town Council of Thurso on the unsatisfactory state of the conveyance of the mails to the North; whether it is the case that the mail trains have been two and three hours late for several weeks; and why the Postal Authorities have ceased sending the sorting van to Wick?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member I beg to say that I have received a copy of the Minute of the Town Council of Thurso on the subject of the Mail Service, and it is now under consideration. I regret that it is the fact that since the beginning of this month the night mail train has been very late, and strong representations have been addressed to the Highland Railway Company. The principal cause appears to be the pressure of the traffic owing to the large number of passengers proceeding to the North for the shooting season. The sorting carriages never proceeded so far North as Wick. But it is true that the journey was shortened last year in connection with the arbitration with the railway company, the reason for curtailment being that the advantage derived from the longer journey was not sufficient to justify the large expenditure which the continuance of the previous arrangement seemed likely to involve.

THE SEWERAGE SYSTEM OF DERRY —DERRY GAOL.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him that the sewerage system of Derry is a tide locked sewerage, and that the Corporation, although aware of the defects of this system, have deferred the question of the proper ventilation of the sewers indefinitely; also that the sewerage of the gaol runs into this defective sewerage of the city; and whether, inasmuch as the gaol is situated at the very summit level of the city, and necessarily becomes the receptacle of the sewer gases, which must rise up to it and escape through the ordinary sewer traps into the gaol, he will take steps to remedy this danger to the health of prisoners in this gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer this question until Tuesday, because before that date the Local Government Board inform me they will not be able to send a Report.

In reply to Mr. Sexton,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I gather from the Report of Dr. O'Farrell that no danger need be entertained.

MR. MAC NEILL: Seeing that the medical officer of the prison, Sir William Miller, is closely connected with the Corporation and that there is a distinct charge brought against the Corporation, is it not advisable that there should be a distinct medical investigation?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must await the Report of the Local Government Board before I can answer that question.

THE MACCLESFIELD SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to that portion of the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Macclesfield Savings Bank, in which Mr. Andrews, the Actuary of the Manchester Savings Bank, advised the Actuary of the Macclesfield Bank as to the use and disposal of the separate surplus fund; whether the separate surplus fund of Trustee Banks, in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, can be drawn upon and used in the manner suggested; and, whether the Treasury will take steps to prevent the squandering and any misuse of the separate surplus funds of Trustee Banks, in the manner indicated in Mr. Andrew's letter, or otherwise?

MR. GOSCHEN: My attention has been called to the whole of the able Report of the Commissioner to inquire into the affairs of the Macclesfield Savings Bank. Mr. Andrew's advice to the Actuary of the Macclesfield Savings Bank seems to consist of two parts. In so far as he recommends that the separate surplus fund should be used for building a new bank, if such new building was required by the increase of business, I do not think his advice is open to exception; but his further suggestion (if I rightly understand the letter) that the bank should increase its expenditure, not, as it seems, because greater experience was necessary, but because there happened to be money which he considered available for it, seems to me very regrettable. The nature of the purposes to which the separate surplus fund can be applied seems open to some doubt. I believe that the National Debt Commissioners have power, by means of the certificate required before any portion of the fund is paid over to any bank, to prevent any "squandering or misuse." But I agree with the Report of the Committee that those purposes should be more clearly defined by legislation.

THE CASE OF SAMUEL HUNTER.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a Memorial from certain persons in the borough of Salford, praying for a remission or mitigation of the sentence passed on one Samuel Hunter for forgery and perjury; whether he will state the number of signatures to such Memorial, and what number of them were members of the Gas Committee, in connection with which frauds were discovered; whether he has given any reply to such Memorial; and, if so, what reply has been given; and, whether, before giving any reply, he will consent to lay upon the Table of this House a copy of the said Memorial, together with the names and descriptions of the persons who signed the Memorial?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: Yes, Sir. Such a Memorial was received on the 13th inst. It is signed by 26 persons, among them being the Chairman of the Gas Committee, the Mayor of Salford, and several Aldermen and Councillors. No reply has yet been sent to the Memorial. It would be contrary to all precedent to lay a Memorial on a criminal case on the Table of the House.

MR. HOWELL: Will the request of the memorialists be acceded to before a copy of the Memorial has been laid upon the Table?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: It would be contrary to precedent to lay a copy of the Memorial upon the Table of the House.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to give notice that if the Home Secretary accedes to the prayer of the Memorial I will call attention to the whole question, and ask for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider it.

Mr. Gorchen

CONTAGIOUS DISEASE IN THE INDIAN ARMY.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office are in possession of any statistics from India relative to the alleged increase of contagious disease in the Indian Army since the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts; and whether he can give any information on the subject?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: So far as the British troops are concerned, the admissions for venereal disease have risen from a yearly ratio of 323 per 1,000 for the year 1887 to 560 per 1,000 for the first four months of 1889.

In reply to MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton),

*MR. E. STANHOPE said: The statistics are made out on the responsibility of the Medical Department.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Debate on the Cantonment Bill in the Legislative Council of India, on the 14th inst., is correctly reported in the London newspapers of the 15th inst.; whether General Chesney then stated that the suspension of the Contagious Diseases Act had resulted in an alarming increase of disease among soldiers; whether General Sir F. Roberts, the Commander-in-Chief, then stated that the percentage of soldiers upon the sick list had doubled since the suspension of the Act; and, whether the Cantonment Bill contains powers and provisions which will mitigate the prevalence of this disease and the sufferings caused by it?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has seen the reports in the Press of the Debate in the Legislative Council and has no reason to doubt the correctness of such reports. The Cantonment Bill contains provisions for mitigating the prevalence of all contagious diseases within Cantonments; and regulations for that purpose are now under the consideration of the Government of India.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND COUNTY COUNCIL.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed by the Northumberland County Council to prevent any Member of the said Council from bringing forward a Motion for building a bridge which may be required in his locality; and whether such a prohibition is legal and in accordance with the provisions of "The Local Government Act, 1888?"

*MR. RITCHIE: I have been in communication with the Clerk to the County Council of Northumberland, and am informed that no such resolution as that referred to in the question of the hon. Member has been passed by the County Council.

In reply to a further question by MR. BURT,

*MR. RITCHIE said: I believe that some resolution has been passed by the County Council, but if the hon. Member wishes for further information he had better put a question on the Paper.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now fix a day for the Indian Budget statement?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am not in a position to name a day for the Indian Budget. It will be necessary in the first place to make considerable progress in Supply.

THE CONDITION OF THE WESTERN COAST AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have received any Report from the Secretary for Scotland concerning his recent inquiries into the condition and needs of the population on the Western Coast and Islands of Scotland; and whether he is now prepared to state the intentions of the Government in reference to the provision of piers and harbours and of railway or other communication calculated to benefit the fishing industry in these districts?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government have received a Report from the Secretary for Scotland with regard to the subject in question, and they will give that Report their most careful consideration during the Recess. They hope to be able to bring in a Bill next Session dealing with the subject on the same lines as those of the Piers and Harbours Bill dealing with Ireland.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Will the right hon. Gentleman consult the Scotch Members on the subject before they make any proposal to the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. and learned Member will see that any proposal which is made must be made on the authority and responsibility of the Government. The Scotch Members will be afforded a full opportunity of expressing their opinion.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Will the Report be laid on the Table and circulated among the Members of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; it is a confidential Report.

AN AUTUMN SESSION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government will consider the advisability of a short adjournment before reaching the later autumn months; and, if so, whether the Scotch Votes will be taken before or after the adjournment?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member is the only Member of this House who desires that there should be an Autumn Session. I am sorry that I am not in a position to say when the remaining Scotch Votes will be taken, but certainly not in an Autumn Session.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Will a fair notice be given when the Scotch Votes will be taken, so that the Scotch Members may have an opportunity of attending? Will the right hon. Gentleman promise that they shall not be taken again at a time when the House is indisposed to take any other business?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I presume that the hon. Gentleman receives a copy of the Votes and Proceedings of the House, and if he will look at it he will see when the Scotch Estimates are down.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: But a considerable number of Scotch Members are absent, and I wish to know if they will receive fair notice?

[No answer was given.]

THE FEMALE TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why the Civil Service Commissioners have held no examination in Ireland of candidates for female telegraph service in the General Post Office since September 1888, when only three places were offered in Dublin, whereas several examinations have been held in London and Edinburgh since that date; and when the next examination in Ireland will take place?

*MR. RAIKES: The reason why no examination has taken place for female telegraphists, Dublin, since September, 1888, is that no vacancies have occurred since March, 1888, and the three successful candidates in the September, 1888, examination are still at the Postal Telegraph School, Dublin, waiting their turn for appointment. I am unable to state when it will be necessary to hold another examination.

PALATINE COURT OF DURHAM BILL [LORDS]

Lords Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Sir Edward James Harland, Baronet, for the City of Belfast (Northern Division).

THE TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I ask leave to submit to you, Sir, a question relating to the Bill which stands first on the Order Paper to-day—namely, the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill. You are aware of the Amendments which it is proposed to introduce into this Bill, and I would ask you what is the practice and the rule of this House with respect to the introduction of Amendments of a very extensive character into a Bill during its passage through Committee. Perhaps I may be allowed to refer to the authority which we all refer to on these occasions. I have here Sir Erskine May's book on Parliamentary Practice, in which it is stated that—

"When a Bill has been committed pro forma it is not regular to introduce, without full explanation, Amendments of so extensive a character as virtually to constitute it a different Bill from that which has been read a second time by the House and committed. In 1856, the Partnership Amendment Bill having been committed pro forma, it was extensively amended, but no Amendment was inserted which it was not clearly competent for the Committee to entertain; yet, when an objection was urged that it had become a new Bill, the Minister in charge of it, while denying the alleged extent of the Amendments, consented to withdraw the Bill. When the Amendments affect the principle of the Bill, the more regular and convenient course is to withdraw the Bill and present another."

That is what Sir Erskine May says. I observe that on the occasion here referred to Mr. Henley, a Member of great experience in the practice of this House, objected to the introduction of extensive Amendments affecting the principle of the Bill. Mr. Lowe said that—

"The hon. Member for Oxfordshire had given notice of his intention to move that the Bill should be rejected, on the ground that there had been an abuse of the forms of the House by the practical substitution of a new Bill."

Then Mr. Henley said that—"He felt that the new clauses had essentially altered the character of the measure, and that much inconvenience would result if the principles of what was really a new Bill were discussed in Committee."

Accordingly that Bill was withdrawn, in order that a new Bill might be introduced. I would now ask you, Sir, kindly to say whether, when Amendments are of so extensive a character as practically to constitute a new Bill and to introduce essentially new principles into a Bill, it is not the rule and practice of this House that the Bill should be withdrawn, in order that a new measure may be introduced in its place?

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Member was good enough to give me notice that he would put this question to me, and as a very important principle is involved I propose, with the leave of the House, to go fully into the matter. I will first cite two precedents which, if they do not bear immediately upon this question, certainly illustrate the principle involved in it—the precedents of 1873 and 1878. In 1873 the University Tests (Dublin) Bill was introduced, and after leave had been given the measure was very much changed—so changed that the Speaker, having been appealed to, held that the Bill then before the House was not the same Bill for which leave had been given, and that Bill was accordingly withdrawn. In 1878 there was another Bill, the Hypothec (Scotland) Bill. When the Order for the Second Reading was read, objection was taken that the Bill had been so transformed as virtually to amount to a new Bill, and the Speaker then from the Chair ruled that, inasmuch as the Bill was a different Bill from that for the introduction of which leave had been given, a new Bill ought to be substituted, and the leave of the House should be asked to introduce it. The House will be good enough to observe that those are two cases of objection taken before the Second Reading, when the alterations had been introduced on the sole authority of the Member who had introduced it, and not by a Committee of the House. But the measure now before us—namely, the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill—is in a different position, for it has got into Committee. If I correctly gather the feeling of the House, it is that I should give a ruling with reference to this particular Bill. I wish expressly to say that in answering before a question upon this subject I desired to safeguard, as I do now desire to safeguard, the rights and the jurisdiction of the Chairman of Committees. I do not think it is proper that an appeal should be made from his decision to mine, and the House must run the risk of any collision of opinion, which, however, I may say very respectfully I do not think is very likely to occur. I now come to the case cited by the right hon. Gentleman as a precedent—namely, the Partnership Amendment Bill of 1856. That Bill was committed pro forma, and a great number of Amendments were proposed in Committee, which so changed the Bill as to transform it into an entirely new Bill. The objection was taken, as the right hon. Gentleman truly says, by Mr. Henley that the Bill was entirely different, and that it would be inconvenient to discuss in Committee clauses the principles of which had not been affirmed at the stage of Second Reading. That, I think, is a most powerful and cogent argument. Now the present Bill, the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, having been in Committee for some time, new clauses have been put down upon the Paper by the Government, and on comparing the Bill it would stand with these new clauses embodied in it with the original

Bill, that—namely, for the introduction of which leave was given, and which was read a second time, I am bound to say that I see a complete difference between them. In fact, nothing of the old Bill remains except the Saving Clause, the Interpretation Clause, and I think two or three other lines at most. [An hon. MEMBER: "A line and a half;" and cries of "Order!"] In these circumstances, it seems to me that the Bill would assume such a shape that it would differ largely from that for the introduction of which leave was given. The right hon. Gentleman asks me what is the rule and practice of the House? I hope I am not afraid of taking responsibility upon myself; but in this case I do not wish to travel beyond the proper responsibility which attaches to me, and I express the practice of the House rather than the rule of the House, if I may distinguish between them. The practice of the House has unquestionably been, when a Bill has been so transformed, as in my opinion this Bill has been, that a new Bill should be introduced; that leave should be given to introduce it; and that the Second Reading stage should be gone through, when the general principles of the measure, as distinguished from its component clauses, can be affirmed. I express my opinion upon this point without the least hesitation, and I desire to affirm that opinion very strongly. Having said this much, I think I ought now to leave the matter in the hands of the House and the Government. I could not stop the Bill on the point of order as constituting a new Bill; but I do unhesitatingly affirm that the practice of the House has been in a case of this kind to withdraw the old Bill and then to introduce a new Bill in the amended form.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have listened with great attention to the ruling which you, Sir, have now given on the question which has been addressed to you by the right hon. Gentleman opposite—a question arising out of the objection which was taken yesterday or the day before to our proceeding further with this Bill. I understand you to say that it would be contrary to the practice of this House that, in the circumstances in which we are placed, the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill in its present form should be further proceeded with. The first duty which I have to discharge in this House is to pay respect to any ruling which you may give from the Chair. It is with very great regret that I feel myself obliged in these circumstances to withdraw this Bill, which we had hoped to pass with the support of the great majority of the House. We were ready to agree to the changes proposed to be introduced into the Bill, although they would have undoubtedly altered very considerably the substance of a measure dealing with a question of great complexity and difficulty, and we certainly endeavoured to meet, as far as we possibly could, the reasonable objections of those who differed from us with regard to the course to be followed with a view to promote law and order in certain parts of Her Majesty's dominions. But, in the circumstances, there is only one course for me to pursue—namely, to move, with very great regret, that the Order for resuming the consideration of this Bill in Committee be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order for resuming Committee on the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill be read and discharged and the Bill withdrawn."

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The right hon. Gentleman must not misunderstand the object which I have in view. If the Government will now proceed with a new Bill in the form in which the Attorney General for the convenience of the House has drawn up those Amendments I, for my part, concur so entirely in the general principles of those Amendments—I am not speaking of all the details—that I will undertake to do all I can to assist the Government in passing such a Bill. The reason why I have objected to proceeding in the particular form of amending the old Bill is, first of all, because I believe—in fact, I may say I know—that considerable portions—not the whole, but considerable and important portions of the plan of the Government, portions of which I strongly approve, including the abolition of the power of distraint, could not have been introduced in the old Bill, and could only have been introduced in a new Bill. There are other portions, the portions that deal with the remission of the tithe in certain circumstances and the deduction from the rent to the landlord—those are parts of the Bill I think extremely important and valuable, and they could not have been proceeded with, in my opinion, under your ruling, Sir, which excluded the Instruction proposed by the hon. Member for Bristol, which was almost identical in its effect. If we are to go on with the old Bill and attempt to renege it "lock, stock, and barrel," we should make a mess of the whole concern. We should not be able to introduce any of the principles which the Government have desired to introduce, and the Paper would be in a state of chaos. What I desire is that the Government should introduce a clean Bill, if I may be allowed to call it so—such a Bill as that circulated in the form of the Amendments of the Attorney General. We can then consider that Bill and deal with it. It contains a principle which we on this side of the House approve of and have supported—namely, that the tithe shall be put upon the owner and not on the occupier. It contains a further principle, that the tithe shall be reduced when the rents and profits are not adequate to meet it. That is the principle we approve of and are prepared to support, and we also especially approve of the principle that in the future the power of distraint shall be abolished. These are three very valuable principles, but there is yet another principle in the proposed new Bill. There is the constitution for the first time of a universal Land Court for this country. The Government have proposed that the County Court should be appointed to inquire into and investigate rents, and to see what relation the tithe bears to rent, and that if the rent is not adequate to meet the tithe, the tithe shall be proportionately reduced—that is, the Government propose to appoint a Land Court of Arbitration throughout the country to deal with all rents and all tithes. So valuable and, as some Gentlemen may think, so revolutionary a principle has probably never been introduced by any Government, not to say by a Conservative Government. Even if the Bill disappears, the principle is enshrined will remain, and if the Bill is introduced the principle of a Land Court will be affirmed, because from a Land Court like the Court proposed in this Bill, appo deciding I shall be at fall in re establish the "rents and profits"—vague terms and difficult to define—but the Court is to determine how much of the tithe, or if the whole of it, is to be remitted—everyone can see that there is only another step to giving these Land Courts power to adjudicate between landlords and tenants, with power to reduce the rents. All I can say is that these Amendments of the Attorney General, upon which I congratulate him, which propound the principle of these Land Courts, which are to have plenary and absolute jurisdiction, I think without appeal, to determine per se the rights existing between the titheowner and the landowner—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is travelling somewhat wide of the question. It is my duty to inform him that according to the ruling of my predecessor in the year 1875 it is not possible for the right hon. Gentleman to discuss the merits or demerits of a Bill on a Motion for the discharge of the Order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was only discussing the merits of the Bill, Sir; but perhaps I was falling into the grave error of writers of epitaphs, and was including in my remarks too many encomiastic adjectives. What I desire to say, Sir, is that I myself, and I believe I may say a good many Gentlemen on this side of the House—though I have no right to speak for all on this side of the House—would be very glad to see the principles of this Bill established; and if the Government are in earnest in this matter, and if they will to-day introduce this Bill, already drafted and printed, and propose it for a Second Reading on Monday, so far as I am concerned they will have my support. I see there are some Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite who are not at all anxious to see this Bill passed; but I am happy to say that is not the feeling of all hon. Gentlemen opposite, for I am happy to see that the hon. Member for Maldon, to whom great credit has attached, and will attach, for the independent course he has taken in this matter, has a Notice on the Paper to-day that he will introduce a Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, and I hope he will do so. If he introduces the Government Bill I think he might carry it, as he carried, or rather did not carry, the Instruction which has converted the Government.

So far as I am concerned I shall be very happy to assist the Government in passing this Bill if they will introduce it. Do not let it be objected to on the ground of loss of time. There will be much less loss of time in discussing a Bill in this clear and concise form presented by the Amendments than the time that would be lost in discussing the chaotic mass of Amendments to the old Bill as it stands. Do not let it be said, if the Government are not going on with the Bill, it is because they have not time. The Government have quite as much time for dealing with a new Bill in this concise form as they would have had for discussing the Amendments to the old Bill. I make this offer to the Government sincerely, and I hope they will accept it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise, Sir, at once to acknowledge the encomiastic adjectives of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman generally uses adjectives in great abundance. He has asked the Government to introduce a Bill similar in character to that which they hoped to pass with the Amendments on the Paper, and he has offered his personal assistance to the Government to pass such a Bill into law. If, Sir, the Government had any hope whatever that that offer of the right hon. Gentleman's would result in the speedy, rapid, and successful consideration by this House of this important measure they certainly would give most careful consideration to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman; but we have to consider the language of the right hon. Gentleman by the light of the acts of his hon. Friends whom he usually leads. I find on the Paper to-day three pages of Amendments proceeding from the opposite side of the House—three pages of Amendments to these valuable proposals of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. If this is the work of the 24 hours which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said would be absolutely insufficient to consider the Amendments of my hon. and learned Friend, what will be the effect of the further delay which, according to the forms of the House, must necessarily intervene before we reach the Committee stage with a new Bill? If the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends will give the Government an assurance that this Bill as it is now shadowed forth will be passed forth-with, the Government will at once go on with it. But I read the Amendments on the Paper, and I see expressed in those Amendments determined opposition to the Bill as proposed. What interpretation, therefore, can I put upon these friendly assurances, these encomiastic adjectives of the right hon. Gentleman? I have heard this language used before by right hon. Gentlemen who occupy the Front Opposition Bench, and I have been obliged on many occasions to discount it by the action and conduct of their friends. If the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to give those assurances which have frequently been given, and which, I might almost say, were uniformly given by Oppositions in times past, though not during the present Parliament I am sorry to say—if he can give those assurances, then we shall be exceedingly glad to avail ourselves of his suggestion.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say, as a Representative of that part of the country which has been pointedly alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman, that, speaking for my Colleagues and myself, while we are not unwilling to give a general approval to some of the broad principles of the new Bill, we shall feel bound to weigh and scrutinise most carefully its details, some of which may arouse our most strenuous opposition.

MR. SWETENHAM (Carnarvon): Before the Order is discharged I desire to say that it is with very great regret I heard the determination of the Government. But I would ask you, Sir, whether it is not competent at the present time for the Government to withdraw the Amendments of the Attorney General and to take up the Bill where it was before they were put on the Paper? I think it would be most deeply to be deplored that this Session should terminate without a Bill passing which would certainly have the effect of restoring, or helping to restore, law and order in many parts of the country. To quote an expression used by the South Wales Daily News, "the tithe question is a useful lever for effecting disestablishment." As strongly as I can, I urge the Government to go on with the Bill. I may be permitted to say that, so far as the Amendments of the Attorney General are concerned, I entirely agree with them in principle. Not only in this House, but for the last three or four years on every platform in the country it has been declared that among the many things for Parliament to do is the putting the tithe upon the owner, as was intended by the Tithe Commutation Act. While I agree entirely with the principle expressed in the Amendments of the Government, I cannot conceal from myself that even on the Ministerial side of the House there will certainly be Amendments to those Amendments. This will have the effect of keeping up the discussion for a long time. Therefore, unless the Government see their way to take up the original Bill, I hope they will persevere with the Motion to withdraw the Bill altogether.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I hope I may be allowed to say a few words, for I have taken great interest in this subject, which I have pressed upon the attention of the House, I hope not unduly. I hope the Leader of the House heard the remarks of his follower who has just sat down, because they will bring home to him and to the country that the opposition to the Bill does not proceed alone from this side of the House. I hope we shall not have it said that our opposition prevented the passing of the Bill. If the House will allow me I will shortly explain my own position. There are two parties in the State who are much interested in tithe reform—one who object on conscientious grounds to the payment of tithes, and the other, in the agricultural interest, who only wish for a fair tithe. I am one of the latter, and should be prepared to support any Bill brought forward by the Government in the sense referred to by the right hon. Member for Derby. At the same time, I must admit that I think that the principle of re-adjustment ought to be included in any measure brought forward.

*MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): In a few words I should like to state my view of this very complicated situation. I listened, Sir, with great respect to your ruling, and with great interest to the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and of the Leader of the House. When I heard the right hon. Member for Derby I hoped there was a prospect of settling this vexed and thorny question, because I am bound to give the right hon. Gentleman credit for straightforwardness when he says he is willing to help the Government in passing the amended Bill. The right hon. Gentleman speaks with great responsibility when he addresses the House, because, unfortunately, the usual Leader of the Opposition is not present. We are, therefore, bound to take what was said by the right hon. Member for Derby as the words of the responsible Leader of the Opposition. We had, then, an announcement from the Opposition, expressed through their Leader, that they would give their best assistance in passing the amended Bill. Now, I desire to say, with a full sense of my responsibility as representing as large a number of tithe-owners as any Member in the House; that I am prepared also to give the Government every assistance in passing the Bill, as it is proposed that it should be introduced. In doing so I am, of course, ready to make great sacrifices on behalf of many tithe owners. At the same time, there is such a prospect of solving this vexed question as has never occurred before, and is not likely to occur again for a long time. I accordingly earnestly beg my right hon. Friend to re-consider the half decision at which he has arrived, and between now and Monday to come to the conclusion to introduce a new Bill. I know I am speaking the mind of at least some hon. Members on this side. I can promise the assistance of myself and my friends in passing such a measure. There must in such a question be compromise; there must be surrender, even loss. I earnestly hope that this question, which relates not only to the just rights of tithe owners, but to the peace of a great part of the country, may be peaceably settled. Such a settlement will not only remove the grievances of tithe owners and tithe payers, but will calm the disturbances which have arisen in so many parts of the country.

MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I do not profess to express any opinion but my own when I say I do not believe that any settlement short of disestablishment will give any satisfaction to the Principality, and therefore I shall give all the opposition I can to the measure.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): It has invariably been the practice in the House to accept the statement of a leader as expressing the opinion that he could carry his Party with him. I think it, therefore, somewhat discreditable that the right hon. Member for Denbighshire, rising after the right hon. Member for Derby, should have expressed a different view. I appeal to the Leader of the House, although the confidence of the Party has been somewhat shaken, to proceed even at the last moment with this Bill, which has been promised for three years, and is now almost brought to maturity. My right hon. Friend has declared that this Bill has been brought forward for the sake of maintaining order in the Principality. To maintain order is the duty of every Government, and is certainly the first duty of a Conservative Government. I earnestly trust, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will assure his supporters that he intends to stick to the Amendments of the Attorney General, and not to leave his Party in the extremely disagreeable position in which they now stand.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I do not intend to prolong the Debate, or to enter into the question as between the Bill abandoned and the Bill to be proposed; but, after what has been said from this side, I do not think I ought to sit quiet and allow it to be supposed that I will support the new Bill. I at once enter my protest against being supposed to agree with the provisions of this Bill. As my right hon. Friend said just now, it will require most careful consideration, and many of its provisions will be met with stern opposition.

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS (GREAT BRITAIN AND SWITZERLAND).

Address for—

"Copy of Correspondence" on the subject of the reciprocal admission of Medical Practitioners qualified in either Country to practise in Great Britain and Switzerland."—(Mr. Tapling).

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to: Amendment to Arbitration Bill (Lords);

Amendments to Amendments to County Court Appeals (Ireland) Bill, without Amendment; Paymaster General Bill, with an Amendment; Poor Law Bill; Official Secrets Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to proceed with the Statute Law Revision Bill?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman now state what will be the effect of the withdrawal of the Tithe Bill on the immediate progress of business?

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): May I ask when it is proposed to take the Light Railways Bill, and whether the Leader of the House will cause the Bill to be examined in the light of the recent ruling of the Speaker, in order to see whether the measure is not substantially a new Bill?

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give the House any information with regard to the proposal of the right hon. Member for Derby, that a new Tithe Bill should be introduced?

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask whether the Government will grant facilities for passing the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill?

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): May I remind the Leader of the House that we have had the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill in its present form only about half an hour in our hands?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, I think, Sir, it is time that Irish Members should know what the Government intend to do with regard to the Irish Sunday Closing Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think it will be convenient if the First Lord of the Treasury will state, when he moves the Motion with regard to Saturday's Sitting, what Bills the Government intend to proceed with.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE—SATURDAY.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that would be a convenient course. I beg to move the Resolution that stands in my name, namely—"That this House do sit to-morrow, and that such sitting be held subject to the Standing Orders which regulate the sitting of the House on Wednesdays."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby will see, if he looks at the Paper, that there is practically no seriously opposed business to be dealt with, with the exception of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill.

Several hon. MEMBERS: The Technical Instruction Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe there is a very strong desire on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to pass the Technical Instruction Bill, and we propose to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Gorton (Mr. Mather.) With regard to the Statute Law Revision Bill, there is a notice on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) against that measure. These Statute Law Revision Bills were prepared by a most impartial and able Commission, whose duties have always been exercised with great ability and with great advantage to the public; and I should be sorry if the Bill had to be postponed. If, however, serious objection be taken to it, I cannot say it has been before Parliament a sufficient time to justify us in pressing it. With regard to the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill, I understand that no new clause has been inserted in that measure; and it cannot be said that the Bill is in the slightest degree altered. The Standing Committee have, as they were fully entitled to do, struck out many of the clauses of the Bill; but the measure remains substantially as it was. Under these circumstances we think we are bound to proceed with the measure, and I believe it will be convenient to hon. Members to take it to-morrow. I am exceedingly anxious that the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill should be passed, and we will endeavour to find an opportunity for the consideration of that measure. The business to-morrow will be the Light Railways Bill, and Supply, if we can reach it. I think it would be convenient to hon. Members from Ireland if we took the Irish Estimates on Monday. We propose to take the Votes in Class II. in their regular order. As to the question put my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed), I can say nothing beyond what I have already stated to the House. I must remind the hon. Member and those who take an interest in the tithe question that notice is given of serious and protracted opposition to the measure as amended by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, and, under the circumstances, I think the Government would, at this period of the Session, be incurring a very great responsibility in asking the House to take up the question, unless we received assurances from the Party opposite generally, such as have been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), that the Bill will be passed through its remaining stages with the adequate despatch which is necessary at this period of the Session.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will sit to-morrow, and that such sitting be held subject to the Standing Orders which regulate the sittings of the House on Wednesdays."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the intention of the Government to ignore the exceedingly strong representations which have been made to them from Australia with reference to the Western Australia Constitution Bill?

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): The First Lord of the Treasury stated on Thursday that no contentious business would be taken on Saturday. The Light Railways Bill is distinctly contentious business, and I, therefore, appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to fulfil the pledge he has given.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I venture to think that the House is entitled to a distinct assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury as to what business the Government intend to take during the remainder of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman has now all the time of the House, and he intends to take all the days of the week as well. We are entitled to hear what Bills are to be proceeded with, whether any are coming from the Lords, and what attitude the Government will assume towards the private Bills which are on the Paper, and which subject hon. Members who oppose them to a great deal of trouble. There are 26 Government Bills on the Paper, 21 private Members' Bills, and 80 Votes in Supply still to be taken, and this is the 16th of August. With regard to the Statute Law Revision Bills, I have had great pleasure in helping these measures forward during the last two or three years, and in order to enable the cheap edition of the Statutes to be published. But the cheap edition was no sooner published, bringing the Statute Law revision down to 1800, than a Bill is introduced to repeal some of the Acts which were reprinted as representing the Statute Law of the country. Without very considerable explanation, I cannot consent to that. It is proposed to go back to the reign of Edward III. in regard to the repeal of Acts. I am afraid that if the right hon. Gentleman finds himself in Committee dealing with the Acts of Edward III., we shall have something to say about one of them. This Bill deals with the Acts of the present reign, including the Tithes Commutation Bill, Lands Clauses Act, the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act. We cannot consent to deal with the statutory legislation of the present reign simply upon the allegation of a Government Department or Secretary of State that such legislation is unnecessary. That is the sole reason why I object to the Government proceeding with the Statute Law Revision Bills during the present Session. I suggest that the Bill be postponed until next Session, and then that it should be referred to a Select Committee, on whose Report the House might act.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The Light Railways Bill has been entirely altered in the Standing Committee, and I warn the right hon. Gentleman that unless he abandons his intention of proceeding with the Bill to-morrow, I shall certainly feel it necessary to vote against a Motion for a Saturday Sitting.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: May I ask whether the Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Bill will be proceeded with?

SIR W. HARCOURT: There are 26 Government Bills on the Paper for to-morrow and Monday. If the right hon. Gentleman will put his pencil through a large number of those we shall know better where we are. Without expressing any opinion of my own upon the Light Railways Bill, it is clear that it is a highly controversial measure, and I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will not take it to-morrow. I see in the Statute Law Revision Bill what is quite new to me—namely, the repeal of certain Statutes as “unnecessary,” by omitting “the words ‘and be it enacted’ and all the words that follow.”

SIR R. WEBSTER: It is in order to save printing, and the saving on the whole will amount to half a volume.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is a very good reason. I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will be able to reduce the list of Bills.

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that Lord Knutsford has promised several hon. Members that he will not proceed further than the Second Reading of the Western Australia Bill?

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): It will be some consolation to a large number of Members of this House if the right hon. Gentleman will give the House an assurance that the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill will be one of the first measures introduced next Session.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): My right hon. Friend has said we all want to get away, and for my part I want to get away so much that I am going away, so that I can speak about what is going to happen after I have gone with more impartiality than hon. Members who are going to stay. At the present period of the Session the demand for a Saturday sitting is reasonable; but we are in a peculiar position. Ministers have taken the days of private Members, and have recklessly wasted them. I think we ought to take the first opportunity of expressing our disapproval of the reckless waste of public time on the part of the Government. I shall feel it my duty to register in a Division my opinion that Her Majesty's Ministers have scandalously wasted the public time.

MR. HOWELL: I have gone through the Statute Law Revision Bill, and find that 19-20ths of it consist of simple repeals of unnecessary words in existing Acts of Parliament, about which, I suppose, there can be no contention on the part of anybody except lawyers who want to make the law as complicated as possible. The Bill removes from the Statute Book a lot of rubbish which ought never to have encumbered it. I hope the Government will press the Bill through the House.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman, who has an enormous majority, will give the House a chance of passing the Light Railways Bill to-morrow.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it well to answer the questions which have been so far asked of me before they are entirely obliterated by a series of others. I believe the most important question put to me is that which has reference to the Light Railways Bill, and while I recognise the warmth of feeling which the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) has shown in reference to that Bill, as I wish to pass the measure, and do not wish to waste a sitting, I think it would be desirable not to take the Bill to-morrow, after the opposition that has been shown, but to put it down as the first order on Monday. I hope I will then have the support of hon. Members in passing it through as quickly as possible.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): Will it now be necessary to have a sitting to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, certainly. With reference to the Statute Law Revision Bill, I am desirous that the Statute Book should be purged of useless and unnecessary enactments, but I must admit that it is reasonable that the House should have an opportunity of examining and considering a measure of that kind. I recognise the fairness of the contention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fowler) with regard to a Bill which has only been in the hands of hon. Members for three days, and I cannot at this period of the Session press the House to consider it. Even although it may be all that the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) desires, still it justifies and requires examination. I am asked to expunge certain Bills from the Order Paper. I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that there are remarkably few Bills which would in the ordinary course be considered at hon. Members' tables. There were Paper for a matter of fact, there are about that number of Government Orders on the Paper, but the number of Bills is very much less. There is the Interpretation Bill, upon which a question is raised as to whether Wales should be included in England or not. I do not know that there need be much difficulty about that.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: There will be.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know that we shall make any difficulty about it. The Technical Instruction Bill, I believe, will not take an hour to consider in Committee. Then comes the consideration of the Lords' Amendments to the Local Government (Scotland) Bill, which I suppose will take a few minutes only. The Judicial Rents (Ireland) Bill follows, and it depends on hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway whether that Bill shall pass or not. [Cries of "No" from Irish Members.] Very well, then. The next is the Steam Trawling (Ireland) Bill, which was introduced at the instance of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, and should not take long. The Infectious Diseases Notification Bill and the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill ought to go through without delay. The Council of India Bill ought not to take five minutes of the time of the House if hon. Members have any regard for economy of administration in India. The Merchant Shipping (Pilotage) Bill, I think, will be accepted without discussion. Then, as to the Western Australia Bill, I have been appealed to by the Member for Fermanagh. I am under an engagement to the House not to proceed beyond the Second Reading of that Bill. I hope to take the Second Reading, but it will be at a late period of the Session, so as not to interfere with or impede other business. There are two Bills—the Registration of Assurance and the Local Registration of Titles Bill. Those Bills will not be proceeded with. The London County Council (Money) Bill is a necessary measure.

MR. SEXTON: The Bann Drainage Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It stands for Monday, and if it is opposed it will not be proceeded with.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And the Suck Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Suck Bill also will. The Merchant Shipping (Colours) Bill is a matter of little importance. With regard to private Members' Bills we have no control over them; and I can assure hon. Members that no effort will be lost to bring the Session to a close at the earliest moment.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch): I wish to ask whether the County Council Bill will be taken on Monday or not, and, if Supply is to be the business to-morrow, what Supply will be taken?

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will exclude from to-morrow's business Class V. I really think this is a matter of very serious consideration. The House has been unable during this Session, on account of the exclusive possession of its time by the Government, to give attention to the most important affairs which naturally arise under that Vote. We have all the rest of the world outside Her Majesty's Dominions to consider under that Vote. I can understand that there are some questions of foreign policy that the Government would be very glad to exclude from consideration on this Vote, but is a course which no Government ought to take which respects itself. Apart from that there are many questions affecting poor uneducated natives in other parts of the world who cannot help themselves, and who look for help and defence and counsel to the representatives of the constituencies in this country. I think it a little unfair that a day like Saturday should be taken for questions of this kind. It was only last night that there was any intimation given that there would be a Saturday Sitting at all. There are large numbers of Members interested in these questions, who find it absolutely impossible to make arrangements to be present to-morrow. Of course, we are not excluded from bringing forward these questions on Report of Supply, and if the Diplomatic Votes are run through in a small House to-morrow, we shall be compelled to take the only remaining opportunity open to us on Report of Supply to bring forward our objections.

*SIR R. N. FOWLER (City of London): The hon. Gentleman has been in several Parliaments. I appeal to him, and to the right hon. Member for Denbigh on the Front Bench (Mr. Osborne Morgan), whether it has not been the practice to hold Saturday Sittings at this period of the Session, and whether a similar Motion has not constantly been made by the right hon. Member for Mid-Lothian?

Mr. T. M. HEALY: The Government have stated their intention of giving time for the consideration of the Intoxicating Liquors Sunday (Ireland) Bill, to which in the abstract I have no objection whatever. But I oppose it, because the licenses are entirely under the control of the Resident Magistrates, and so long as that is the case I will continue to oppose it. But there are other and more important questions affecting Ireland, among them the subject of appeals in criminal cases. The Chief Secretary some years ago said we should have an appeal in all cases, and the Bill I propose carries out the intentions of the Government in that sense. I would ask the Government whether if they are going to support a private Member's Bill, with regard to the curtailment of the liquor traffic, I am not entitled to ask for some consideration of the subject of appeals in criminal cases, which is a question of far greater Constitutional importance than the Intoxicating Liquors Bill.

Mr. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Technical Education Bill will be taken to-morrow, and, if so, whether it will be put early among the Orders, that we may have time to discuss it and take the sense of the House?

Mr. NOLAN (Louth N.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if, in giving facilities for the consideration of the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill, he has considered the fact that one of the hon. Members who took a very great interest in this question, and who was the head of the opposition to it in Committee, is at present in custody through the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and has been for the past four months?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I omitted one Bill, the Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service with regard to Superannuation. That Bill is necessary. As to postponing Class V., we are scolded if we postpone Estimates, and now, when a quiet Saturday Sitting is offered, we are asked to postpone Votes. I shall, however, agree to postpone Class V. if not reached to-night. As to the hon. Member for Longford, no doubt he will find an opportunity for himself. I am ignorant of the merits of his measure, which possibly may be opposed. If it is an unopposed Bill, he is perfectly well aware that the measure will pass through the House without any difficulty and without any assistance of the Government.

*Mr. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider his decision with regard to Class V.? There are a large number of Members present who are interested in the important subjects to be discussed under that Vote, and it would be inconvenient to postpone Class V. until a period of the Session when they, perhaps, cannot attend. The hon. Member for Leicester is quite alone in asking for the postponement of Class V.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: Really, Sir, I see no reason why, if we reach Class V. to-night, it should not be disposed of.

Mr. STUART: As to the London County Council Bill, I wish to know when it will be put down, in order that Members may not attend unnecessarily.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I hope we may be able to take it on Monday.

Mr. BRADLAUGH: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Indian Budget will not be taken to-morrow week?

Mr. H. W. LAWSON (St. Patrick): There is no opposition whatever to the London County Council Bill. A new clause is to be moved which can be taken after 12. and upon which a ### MOTION.

—o—

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY (NO. 2 BILL).

On Motion of Mr. Gray's Bill to amend the Law relating to the Recovery of Tithe Rent-Charge, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gray, Colonel Cotton, Mr. John Talbot, Sir John Puleston, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Hunter, Mr. Hobhouse, and Mr. Seale-Hayne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 381]

EXPIRING LAWS CONTINUANCE BILL. (No. 376.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: There is a matter in this Bill on which I propose to offer a few observations, namely, the Land Commission. I think the position of the Land Commissioners is unsatisfactory. I have in the first place to congratulate the Government on the course they have taken with regard to the leaseholders. I suppose it was absolutely necessary that they should deal with their case; at the same time I think that they have acted in this matter rightly. Certainly I have no hesitation whatever in giving them that credit. But, Mr. Speaker, that is only one portion of the Bill. With regard to the Land Commission, I think that for the last two or three years the position must have been most unsatisfactory to the gentlemen concerned, Mr. Wrench, Mr. John George MacCarthy, and Professor Lynch and Mr. Litton. I think it is most unsatisfactory that gentlemen occupying these onerous and weighty positions should be left entirely at the mercy of the Government of the day. Mr. Litton and Mr. Wrench were appointed in 1881. Mr. Litton was appointed for seven years, and Mr. Vernon was appointed with him. Mr. Vernon died, and Mr. Wrench got the balance of the seven years. But instead of getting an absolute term, these gentlemen are carried on from year to year, not knowing the moment when the Government may turn them out of office. I am not going to express any opinion either as to Mr. Wrench or Mr. Litton personally, except that gentlemen in the position of Judges, especially Judges where property is concerned, ought to be in a position of absolute independence. I think it is most unfair to the suitors in this Court that these gentlemen should be placed in the position of not knowing when their appointments come to an end. If that is so with regard to Mr. Litton and Mr. Wrench, how much more is it so with regard to the Commissioners under Lord Ashbourne's Act. Take the case of Mr. Lynch and Mr. MacCarthy. It is most unsatisfactory that they should be placed under the suspicion of being open to the nods and becks and winks of their superiors. I do say that gentlemen in the position of Judges, and exercising functions with regard to the expenditure of millions of money, should be put in a position which would remove them from the level of Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner, and other gentlemen of their notoriety and reputation. Sir, a Bill ought to be introduced putting the Land Commissioners in the position of irremovables, at any rate for several years to come. I say the same with regard to the Land Purchase Commissioners—even more strongly in regard to them, because the Government have proclaimed, or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has proclaimed for them, that this position in regard to Ireland is the position of land purchase. If you take the case of the Auditor General of Public Accounts, he is irremovable except on an address from both Houses. I think it is a most undesirable state of affairs that these gentlemen should not be placed in an equally strong position. If the Government were to bring in a Bill I think it would be certain to pass almost without discussion.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I entirely agree with the substance of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech. It is extremely unsatisfactory to leave these Judges in what is, after all, a great Appeal Court on a yearly tenure, and I should like to put an end to the present arrangement. I tried to do so last year in a Bill which there was not time to discuss; and I had hoped to bring in another Bill dealing with the matter this year. This, however, has been found impossible; but it is the desire of the Government to carry out next year this scheme.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): It seems rather unusual to take the Second Reading of the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill at this time, and I trust those who have charge of it will give us at least a week's notice before it goes into Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL (No. 365.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Jackson.)

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): There are two questions I wish to ask—whether the interest on English and Scotch loans has been reduced from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent, as in the case of Irish loans; and, whether there is also a long list of Irish loans written off? I should like some explanation of this.

MR. JACKSON: With regard to the reduction of the rate, there are no loans in England and Scotland of the kind on which the interest has been reduced in Ireland. Every year those amounts are written off which are deemed irrecoverable, but this does not discharge the debtors from their legal liabilities. It is thought desirable to err, if at all, on the side of over-caution.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I congratulate the Government on having introduced this Bill. There is, however, one deserving class, the Irish labourers, who have to pay for the loans, and who are still charged 4 per cent interest on the amounts advanced for their cottages. The reduction would be to them a substantial concession, and there is no reason why the Bill should not include loans under the Labourers' Act.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I presume the hon. and learned Member's suggestion will have to be considered in connection with artisans' and labourers' dwellings generally. But the matter is one deserving consideration, and I will not fail to consider it.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that artisans' dwellings stand on a different footing to labourers' holdings. In the case of the former the rating is of such a character that any deficiency in the value is small; whereas in the case of the rural ratepayers, they are saddling themselves with a heavy burden, and if the rate of interest can possibly be reduced to 3½ it will be a substantial relief to them.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Lichfield): Will Her Majesty's Government take into consideration the reduction of interest upon drainage loans in England, where we are paying 6½ per cent, while in Ireland the money is raised for one-half that amount?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I would remind the hon. Baronet that the Legislature has stepped in and dealt with the landlords and tenants of Ireland on different principles to those which have been followed in this country.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin): Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the fact, in dealing with the subject, that the artisans' dwellings are the only security, whereas in Ireland there is the security of the rates?

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee)

CLASS IV.

Motion made, and Question proposed

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I wish to ask for some explanation with regard to the grant for the purchase of pictures. When an unusually extravagant bargain was concluded some time back, the House was given to understand that the grant would be suspended until the purchase-money had been wiped off. That has not been done, yet a sum of £5,000 for the purchase of pictures is put down in the Estimates.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item D, Purchase of Pictures, be reduced by £3,800."—(Sir George Campbell.)

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I must admit that in this case, from the hon. Member's point of view, the Government have been guilty of some error.

gance. It is true that when the purchase to which the hon. Gentleman refers was made it was agreed that for a time the grant for the purchase of pictures should be suspended, though no definite number of years was fixed. No doubt, however, it is in spirit intended that the grant should be suspended to enable the amount to be spread over a number of years. That arrangement has continued, but from time to time appeals are made to the Government when opportunities offer to purchase pictures which in the opinion of authorities ought not to be missed. I believe the plan will work satisfactorily and economically. I believe the Government have done right to give the £5,000. It is a less sum than we have formerly given, and it will continue at that small sum for a period of years.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

*Mr. H. W. LAWSON (St. Pancras): Mr. Courtney, I wish in a very few words to impress upon the Financial Secretary the growing intensity of interest taken by our Metropolitan population in the movement for nationalising our national collections, in reality as well as in name, by opening them on the Sunday so that the vast majority of the people may be enabled to enjoy and make use of them. The case could not be better put than by one of the Trustees of the British Museum, who said with regard to this Institution—

"The real question was whether certain public collections formed by the State and paid for by taxation levied on all classes of the community, should be accessible to the great mass of the people during the only day of the week on which it was practicable for them to visit them. He thought there was a strong prima facie case in favour of the principle of the resolution, and it became stronger when they looked at the size and character of the metropolis. The city in which they lived was the largest capital in the world, and certainly of the most picturesque. Residents in small towns could easily escape from them by a moderate walk; but there were upwards of 600,000 of people who lived in the interior of London who could not escape from the long procession of streets, often squalid and generally dirty, and where, certainly on a Sunday, there was nothing to give pleasure or create interest."

These are the words of a supporter of the present Government, Lord Derby, who always speaks with great common sense on social questions. I would point out to the hon. Gentleman that we are advancing by leaps and bounds in this matter. Formerly, no public collection was open on the Sunday. Now, more than half the free libraries of the Metropolis are open on that day. There was a great stride made when not only the libraries but the resources of the People's Palace were opened upon Sunday. It was quite in vain that the Lord's Day Observance Society tried to get up a petition amongst the dwellers in the East End to stop the action of the managers of the People's Palace. The Report which has been issued from Birmingham by Mr. Whitworth Wallis gives astounding proofs of the interest taken by the people in this concession. And surely in London we ought not to be in a worse position than they are in Birmingham, Manchester, and others of our large towns. A vote was taken in the County Council this year on the subject, and only nine formed the minority. The Trades Council have unanimously voted in its favour, and twice the Trades Congress by a majority of two to one have affirmed the desirability of opening our National collections on the Sunday. We owe the First Commissioner of Works a debt of gratitude for the manner in which he has dealt with the parks. Kew Gardens, Hampton Court, and Greenwich Hospital are open on Sunday, and there is no reason why the National Gallery should not be thrown open for the enjoyment of the great mass of the people, who have not time to visit it during the week. So far from such a course being detrimental to the interests of true religion, it would be an immense lever in the work of social reform. I hope the hon. Gentleman will consider that some of the most eminent of the trustees have expressed themselves in favour of this course. As to the financial question, recently it was my privilege to forward to the trustees a letter signed by the Duke of Westminster and Lord Thurlow, offering to supply the necessary funds, but I do not think it possible that the Financial Secretary would grudge the small sum needed. I am quite certain that neither he nor any other Member of the Government desires to make Sunday more oppressive and monotonous to the great mass of the people of London than any other day of the week. I hope that during the next few months the Government will consider this subject, and that next year some definite action will be taken with regard to it.

*MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): Sir, I can see no reason myself why, if Hampton Court, Kew Gardens, and other places are open on Sunday, the National Galleries should not also be open. The opposition comes from a party who think that Sunday ought to be rather a day of punishment than a day of enjoyment. But my hon. Friend opposite is hardly consistent in this matter, for I can recollect a case not very long ago in which he opposed the opening of places of refreshment on Sunday, and voted that they should be all closed on that day. I do not want to raise unpleasant feelings among hon. Gentlemen opposite. Nor to doubt their consistency which I dare say they believe they possess to a very great extent. I merely mention this fact, that I think the encouragement of the Salvation Army, and things of that sort have militated against the opening of the National Museum. But I did not rise for the purpose of making these observations. I am, Sir, going to make some criticisms on the action of the Directors of the National Gallery, notwithstanding that they are extremely thin-skinned. The misfortune of our present system is that our Art and other collections are not under one responsible Minister, who knows something about them. And I wish to call the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to an extraordinary freak on the part of the Directors of the National Gallery. The matter has been brought before the Government already. I refer to the changes which have been made in the names of the pictures. Claude discover these old historical names. I would ask the Secretary of the Treasury to give instruction to those who manage the National Gallery, to see that the names by which artists are historically and familiarly known, are written up in larger and more legible letters on the picture frames. It would not cost a great deal to do this. At the Louvre where the system of double nomenclature is adopted, the well-known name of the painter is written in letters quite as large as the proper name. I would urge the Government to have this reform carried out.

*MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I rise to support the appeal of the hon. Member for West St. Pancras (Mr. Lawson) that the National Gallery and kindred Institutions may be open to the public on Sundays. I am in a position to say how the privilege is appreciated in towns where it has been granted. It is largely valued in Dublin. There, the National Gallery and the Museum, which corresponds in some measure with the British Museum, the Zoological Gardens, and the Botanical Gardens are all open to the public on Sunday, and the number of people who attend on that day shows the advantage the public derive from the system. The number of people who attend the National Gallery and Museums on Sunday is larger than on all the other days of the week put together. As I conceive that the object of these exhibitions is that the public shall enjoy them, the fact that they are visited more on Sunday than other days is to my mind, a conclusive reason why, of all days in the week, they should be open on Sunday. Moreover, I think these places should be open at night. Now that we have the electric light, I think it should be availed of in these places so as to give an opportunity for people who are engaged during the day to visit them. I do not think the small additional Sabbatarian views which would make the Sunday a black letter day, and I do not think that either religion or morality can be promoted by opening the drinking shops on Sunday and closing the Museums. I would moreover strongly advocate, regardless of the question of expense, the opening of our public Galleries and Museums at night. Night is the time when the majority of the public can best avail themselves of the opportunity of visiting these places which are, and ought to be, National Museums.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I also would support the appeal of the hon. Member for West St. Pancras for Sunday opening, and I would make a suggestion on the subject. I regret that this discussion was not raised on the Vote for the British Museum, as I think Museums are more proper things to open on Sundays than even Picture Galleries. But we refrained from entering upon the subject last night knowing that the Irish Members had a very important question to raise in connection with the Vote for the British Museum. Though I do not believe the people of London care much for this old Art, yet, no doubt, people who come from the country and do not know better, like to visit the public galleries, and I think they should have facilities for doing so at the time most convenient to them. I do not say whether I am a Sabbatarian or an Anti-Sabbatarian, but I think this matter should be decided by the people according to their own views. I say to the people of London, "It is not for me to decide this question, but for you." A feeling is growing up in Scotland for the granting of facilities of this kind, and I hold that the decision of the matter should be left to the public in the different localities. What I would suggest in the present Vote is this: We are told that the County Council of London by a large majority have voted and petitioned in favour of the opening of the Galleries and Museums on Sunday. Well, I think that is a great test of the feeling of the public, but I would carry it further and say to the County Council, "If you are in earnest in this matter bear the extra expense yourself." Though these institutions are, no doubt, national, we cannot lose sight of the fact that the people of London have special facilities for availing themselves of them, and I think they should show their willingness to bear any expense which the acceptance of the proposal of the hon. Member for West St. Pancras would entail. If the localities are willing to incur the expense the Government should raise no difficulty in the matter. As to the grant of £5,000 for new pictures, the Secretary to the Treasury has pleaded guilty to having paid this money in breach of an understanding that no further money was to be granted pending the making of a final arrangement. It is the old story. However much you give the Trustees of the National Gallery they must have more. But much as I dislike this grant, and however contrary it is to the understanding, it is impossible to resist it in such a House as this. I protest against the Vote being taken at such a late period of the Session.

*SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): There is a great deal of feeling throughout the country on this question of the Sunday opening of Museums, and I hope it will not be lightly considered on an occasion like the present. I believe that a large preponderance of the working masses are opposed to the principle, and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will hesitate before they accept the advice of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I would appeal to my hon. Friend not to divide the Committee.

MR. LAWSON: I do not intend to divide the Committee, but I would point out that the Trades Union Council have passed a resolution by a majority of two to one in favour of the Sunday opening of Museums, whilst the London Trades Council have passed a similar resolution unanimously, and the Edinburgh Trades Council have passed one by a large majority.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. £1,291, to complete the sum for the National Portrait Gallery.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £13,000 (including a Supplementary sum of £1,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890, for Grants in Aid of the Expenditure of certain 'Learned Societies in Great Britain and Ireland."

Dr. OLARK (Caithness): Under "a" I see an item of £1,000, which it is proposed to grant for a catalogue of scientific papers. I suppose this is to be given to the Royal Society. I want to know on what ground this sum should be given to the Fellows of the Royal Society? I am not prepared to vote a penny to that Institution, or to the Royal Irish Academy, so long as Scotland is treated so shabbily. The Royal Society of Edinburgh only receives £300 a year, which comes back again to the Exchequer in the shape of rent and taxes; whereas the Royal Irish Academy receives £2,000 a year, and the Royal Society of London £4,000 a year, and £15,000 a year for meteorological work. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, for the Royal Society, be reduced by £1,000."—(Dr. Clark.)

Mr. JACKSON: There have been already published, at the public expense, three volumes of this catalogue, and another volume has now been prepared. These societies come to the Treasury and say that on previous occasions they have come to us and we have paid for these extra volumes. The Government came to the conclusion that, instead of undertaking to pay the whole cost of the publication, they should grant £1,000 and leave the expenditure, whatever it is, to be met by the Royal Society. Some small sums have been received as the proceeds of sales, and they have been paid into the Exchequer.

Dr. OLARK: Where are these scientific papers? Are they in the British Museum, or in the Library of the Royal Society, and are they open to the general public, or only to the Fellows of the Society? Is this catalogue a catalogue of papers of the Royal Society, or of scientific papers generally?

Mr. JACKSON: Of scientific papers generally.

Dr. OLARK: Where? All over the world?

Mr. JACKSON: Certainly.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

4. £8,810, to complete the sum for the London University.

5. £21,000, to complete the sum for Universities and Colleges, Great Britain.

Dr. OLARK: There is a sum of £15,000 distributed amongst colleges. I should like to hear the names of the colleges to which the money goes, the grounds on which it is allocated, and whether any of it is given to Scotland.

Mr. JACKSON: The question has not been one of England or Scotland, but in what way the objects can best be attained which the grant is intended to promote. I believe that general satisfaction is expressed at the way in which the money has been allocated by the Committee which was appointed for that purpose. The colleges which have received the grants are these:—

Owens College Manchester ..	1,500
University College, London ..	1,700
King's College, London ..	1,700
Liverpool University College ..	1,500
Mason College, Birmingham ..	1,400
Yorkshire College, Leeds ..	1,400
Nottingham University College ..	1,400
Bristol University College ..	1,300
Durham College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne ..	1,300
Firth College, Sheffield ..	1,200
Dundee University College ..	500

Dr. OLARK: What is the basis upon which the grants have been made?

Mr. JACKSON: I am afraid the hon. Gentleman does not read his Parliamentary Papers, because full information has been given on the subject in a paper entitled, "Grant to University Colleges in Great Britain." The concluding words of the Report of the Committee are as follows:—

"In determining the distribution of the grant, your Committee calculated the amount to be given to each college under two heads, A. and B.; A. being regarded as consisting in providing appliances (professorial staff and apparatus) for adequate and full instruction of a University character in arts and science, and B. being in proportion to the amount of local support and instruction given. In consequence of the suggestion in the Report certain percentage on the total amount of local subscriptions and students' fees. It is difficult to award a grant in proportion to the number of students directly, as a distinction must be drawn between those attending a few lectures in a desultory manner and those giving their whole time to college work. To get over this difficulty your Committee have taken the income from students' fees as a basis. A grant so determined will be in direct proportion to the amount of instruction given; those taking short courses or attending some evening classes paying small fees, and so on in proportion. Thus the grant under B. is, roughly, a percentage on the college income from all sources."

It was thought that this was the truest way of appropriating the money so as to secure the greatest advantage from the expenditure.

DR. CLARK: I am glad to have got this information. Probably this Paper is one of those that a Member only obtains by applying for. I have not had one. I tried to get the Librarian to obtain one for me, but he was unable to do it. Now that I know the facts I find that Scotland, as usual, has been neglected. There was no Scotch Member on the Committee, and nothing has been given to Anderson's College, Glasgow, which Dr. Birkbeck, who was a student there, took as his model in establishing colleges throughout England. That college, though all these other colleges practically originated from it, does not get a farthing. The Heriot-Watt College does not get anything, and only £500 out of the £15,000 goes to Scotland. Scotland gets only one-thirtieth of the money. It is too late this Session to raise this question, but undoubtedly next year, if there is no change made, I shall move a reduction of the Vote, and raise a claim for the Scotch colleges.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I really think Scotland has been unfairly treated in this matter. Why should she only receive one-thirtieth part of this grant? The University of St. Andrew's has done much to give an excellent scientific education, and if any institution obtains aid of this kind St. Andrew's ought. I cannot understand why Dundee should get £500, and poor St. Andrew's, with its desire to give scientific instruction, should get nothing at all. I cannot conceive how the thing has been arrived at, and I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will tell us who were the members of the Committee. I gather there was no representative of Scotland upon it.

*MR. JACKSON: I had no idea that there was any ignorance as to what was taking place. The members of the Committee were Sir John Lubbock, Sir Henry Roscoe, Dr. Percival, Mr. G. R. Brown, and Mr. R. G. C. Mowbray. I find that in the Report of the Committee it is said there was only one application from Scotland and that that application was met. The application was in respect of the University College of Dundee. Surely it was perfectly well known that a certain sum of money had been set aside by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be used in this particular way. Of course, all the colleges and institutions which did come within the terms laid down for the apportionment of the grant were open to make application.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am sure there could not have been a better Committee as far as England was concerned, but as to Scotland not one member of the Committee had the smallest connection or personal knowledge of that country. As to the absence of applications, we find that many Members of the House of Commons did not know much about this matter. Is it surprising, therefore, that the people of Scotland did not know much about it?

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I must confess to a good deal of ignorance in this matter. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us he was going to set aside a sum for the encouragement of scientific researches in the Universities, I really thought his remarks applied to England and Wales. I know that some of the scientific classes in Glasgow are in a very distressed condition; certainly had we known that the grants would be extended to Scotland we should have applied for aid. However, I am sure the Treasury have no wish to treat Scotland differently to any other part of the United Kingdom, and that now the subject has been broached they will see that the claims of Scotland are properly considered.

DR. CLARK: The hon. Gentleman has not answered my question—namely, whether this grant is only for the present year or for a number of years? I know that some of the colleges I have mentioned have applied to the Treasury and been refused, and I am not aware that the other colleges had any notice given to them. There was no Scotchman on the Committee, and it is quite evident that Scotland has been neglected. The authorities of the Scottish colleges did not know this money could be got. Otherwise I know they would have made application. If the grant is only for the present year I have no objection to offer, but if it is for a number of years I shall have to take a Division.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is only for this year; the Vote will have to come up again next year. The hon. Gentleman forgets that we have this year increased the grant to the Scottish Universities by £8,000, and that we help the Scottish Universities as we do not help the English Universities. We now give £42,000 a year to the Scottish Universities, and there is but a very small parallel grant given in England—namely, that given to the London and Victoria Universities. The hon. Member may rest assured he will have an opportunity another year of pressing the claims of any Scotch college.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I understand that as regards the English colleges this Vote is presented in pursuance of a system which is perpetual, but that that is not the case so far as the Scotch colleges to which a grant has been made is concerned. Although an allowance has been made to the Dundee University College that institution has not been placed on the same footing as the English colleges. I am informed there is this difference between the University College of Dundee and all the other colleges—that the average grant made to the English University colleges is about £1,500 per annum, while the amount allowed to the Dundee colleges is only £500. Another difference is that the English colleges are assured that the grant in their case is to be a perpetual grant, whereas the grant to the Dundee College is expressly limited to this one year. Now that, on the face of it, looks very like undue preference. I understand, too, that one reason why the Dundee College received a grant was that in a very short time it will occupy peculiar relations to one of the Scottish Universities. I respectfully submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the Secretary to the Treasury that, however excellent may be the plan to which they have assented, they have certainly manifested an undue preference for the English colleges.

MR. MOWBRAY (Lancashire, S.E., Prestwich): As a member of the Committee entrusted with the distribution of this grant, let me say it was precisely because there was an idea that the University College of Dundee might be brought into connection with the University system of Scotland that the Committee considered the case of the Dundee College to be an exceptional one for this year, and we treated it therefore in an exceptional manner. As to the absence of Scotch Members on the Committee, I should like to observe that Dundee was in the very favourable position that the Member for South Manchester (Sir H. Roscoe), who was a member of the Committee, is himself a member of the Governing Body of Dundee, and therefore takes a great interest in the welfare of that institution. As to notice being given to the Scottish colleges, I can only say that as soon as the appointment of the Committee took place, I received a letter from the Principal of Dundee College, laying the claims of the college before me. It appears to me that if the heads of the other colleges, who are now disposed to put in a claim for a share of this grant, had shown the same activity, their cases might also have been considered. As a matter of fact, there was not the slightest suggestion made that any other college in Scotland laid claim to a grant.

MR. CALDWELL: There is one point I should like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider, and that is that the claims of the Scotch Universities are peculiar, because their maintenance is one of the conditions of the Union. They have no national property to fall back upon, because it has been merged in that of the United Kingdom. The position of the Scotch Universities must be maintained by the Imperial Government. It is a responsibility from which they are not entitled to relieve themselves.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have not the least doubt that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray), and the other members of the Committee, acted in perfect good faith, but it does not seem to me that the hon. Member's statement has bettered the case as far as Scotland is concerned. He says that the Dundee College was really represented in the Committee, and therefore it got a grant. Those who were not in the swim, so to speak, got nothing. I hope that, under the circumstances, the Government will see their way to give some grant to the other Scotch Colleges.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The hon. Gentleman has admitted that the Dundee College is exceptionally treated, because of its probable connection with the University system of Scotland. The Universities of Scotland will be unwilling to encourage this affiliation if they have to pay for it. I protest against the grant to Dundee being so small as it is and being limited to one year.

DR. CLARK: As this question will come up next year, I will not say much more about it. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has scarcely fairly stated the case. In this very Vote there is £12,000 set down for the North Wales Colleges. In Vote 16, £36,000 is taken for the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, of which we get back about £5,000. The three old English Universities were endowed, but all the new Universities started since then get grants from Parliament. I am not prepared to admit the great increase in the grant to the Scottish Universities; but it must be borne in mind that the property by which those Universities were maintained became British property by the Act of Union, and, therefore, you ought to maintain those institutions. I think, too, you ought to maintain them in a decent fashion, and not begrudge every farthing you give them.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS V.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £116,698 (including a Supplementary sum of £7,650), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Expenses of Her Majesty's Embassies and Missions Abroad."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have given notice of an Amendment to reduce the amount of the salary of the Minister to the Argentine Republic by £1,300. There are many Ministers in South America. Most of these Ministers used to be Consuls General and Ministers Resident, but they have been raised to Ministers Plenipotentiary. Why they have been so raised except to spend a little more money and give a little more patronage I do not know. In the case of the Argentine Republic you converted your Consul General into a Minister Resident, and then you converted him into an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary. I have no objection to our Representative having any number of titles he likes; but, unfortunately, when a change of this kind is made it costs the country a great deal. £3,000 a year is paid to the Envoy Extraordinary to the Argentine Republic, £500 to the Secretary to the Legation, and £200 to his clerk, and £435 to the Second Secretary to the Legation; £400 is allowed for rent. In the case of a Minister Resident and Consul General there is no Secretary to the Legation, and there is no Second Secretary. The Minister Resident and Consul General at Chili receives £2,000, without any allowance for rent; in all our representative at Chili costs us £2,250, as against £4,535, the cost of the Legation in the Argentine Republic. Chili is just as respectable and important a country as the Argentine Republic. In Peru and Paraguay, which are close by, you find Ministers Resident and Consuls General. Besides an Envoy Extraordinary in the Argentine Republic you have at Buenos Ayres a Consul, to whom you give £900 a year, with an allowance for office; and in Chili you also have a Consul receiving, I think, £1,000 a year. If you have a Minister Resident and Consul General in the capital of the country, you surely do not require to have a Consul General at £900 or £1,000 per annum besides office expenses. But my great point in regard to the Argentine Republic is that really there is no difference between the Argentine Republic and any other place in South America. There is not sufficient difference to justify you in spending £3,000 more upon the Mission there than upon the Mission to any other South American Republic. A friend of mine told me the other day that it is really an absolute waste of money. He said—

"The inhabitants of the Argentine Republic are very sensible people. They despise all this fuss and show; they know nothing about an Envoy Extraordinary; they want a quiet, decent, honest man, who receives a reasonable salary, without all this fuss and bother, costing £5,000 a year."

They are perfectly satisfied with your Minister Resident and Consul General, or they would be satisfied with having a Consul General alone. I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £1,300, which will bring the salary of the Envoy Extraordinary to about the level of the salaries of our Representatives in other South American Republics.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, &c., be reduced by £1,300, part of the salary of the Minister to the Argentine Republic."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. BRADLAUGH: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers my hon. Colleague, I should like to ask him if he can give us any further information as to the result of the investigation concerning the unfortunate emigrants who suffered such severe privations in the Argentine Republic, and I would at the same time ask whether it is not possible for our Representative in the Argentine Republic—Minister, Consul General, or whoever he may be—to send information to this country before the evils rise to such an extent that of necessity they are brought before the attention of this House. I admit that after attention was drawn to these matters in the House the Foreign Office acted with great promptitude, and a great deal was done to relieve the distress, but it was after the distress had risen to a height to attract public attention, and while the agents of the Argentine Republic were still allowed to tempt emigrants.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I will first answer the points raised by the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He has moved the reduction of the Vote for the salary of Her Majesty's Minister at Buenos Ayres, and he says

Member thinks the duties might well be discharged by an official of lower rank, and that the staff of a Minister Plenipotentiary is not required, and that the South American Republics are indifferent to representation of this country by officers of high rank. These, I think, are the chief grounds upon which he moved the reduction. Now, on all these points I must traverse what the hon. Gentleman has said. On this subject I think I cannot do better than refer to the Report of the Committee which sat on the Diplomatic and Consular establishments in 1870. In that Report it was stated that it was desirable to give Her Majesty's Representatives at various places in South America the rank of Minister without increasing their pay. Lord Hammond, who was then Under Secretary of State, gave evidence before that Committee as to the importance of keeping Representatives of the higher rank at those posts; and he said so keenly did these South African Republics feel the importance attached to our representation being by officials of high rank that one of these Governments, when accrediting a Minister jointly to this country and France, fixed the residence of their Representative at Paris instead of London, because we kept a Representative of lower rank in South America. Lord Hammond particularly noticed the case of the Argentine Republic, and dwelt on the importance of British interests there. Since 1870, the Argentine Republic has greatly advanced. The country has developed in an extraordinary degree during the last 10 years. Last year about 1,100 persons emigrated from this country to the Republic, and there are probably 100,000 British subjects there now. Our commercial interests there have very much increased, and undoubtedly our relations with that Republic are more important now than with any other South American country, except, perhaps, Brazil. Her Majesty's Representative at Buenos Ayres was already a Minister Plenip-

Majesty's Minister there, and I cannot speak too highly of the manner in which that official has devoted himself to the interests of the poor people who have emigrated there in large numbers. He has been well seconded by the British residents, who formed themselves into a Committee for the assistance of poor emigrants, and requested the British Minister to put himself at their head. The junior Member for Northampton has asked a question as to the result of the inquiries made with regard to emigration. I have had considerable experience in watching emigration to our own possessions and to foreign countries, and I have never heard of so much care being taken of emigrants in any country as in the Argentine Republic, except in our own possessions. The Argentine Government, according to our information, have made careful and liberal arrangements for their reception and distribution. No doubt there has been mischief done by unscrupulous agents in Europe who have held out hopes to all sorts of people of fortunes to be made in the Argentine Republic, and many unsuitable persons were sent from Ireland—bad characters and persons of idle habits. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I suppose even in Ireland there are people of bad habits. I am speaking of facts within my own knowledge when I say that most unsuitable persons were collected and sent out as emigrants to the Argentine Republic, but there is abundant evidence that able-bodied men with small families can do as well there as in our Australian Colonies. Great pains are being taken to form Englishmen and Irishmen into special settlements under conditions suited to their former habits, and where their interests can be looked after much better than if they were scattered through the whole country. I believe the Argentine Government are now very much more careful as to the agents they employ, and we have done our best to furnish the Emigration Office in London and the Irish Government with all the information that can be obtained from the full Reports sent home by Her Majesty's Minister at Buenos Ayres. so

Mr. BRADLAUGH: May I ask whether there has come to hand the result of the investigations into the alleged insufficient supply of food to emigrants and bad treatment on the voyage out by the agents of the Argentine Republic?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, that has been gone into, and the Papers, if they are moved for, will give the House all the information we possess on this subject. I cannot find there was much wrong in the food supply on the voyage except, perhaps, on one vessel where there was a dishonest steward. On the whole, I do not think that the emigrants suffer greater hardships than may be expected by newcomers in any country. I think the Committee will see that no case has been made out to justify the reduction of the Vote on the grounds put forward by the hon. Member for Northampton.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I do not think that anybody who has listened to the right hon. Gentleman will agree that he has made out a case against the reduction. The right hon. Gentleman has based his defence on one ground. He defends the expenditure of £3,000 a year more in the Argentine Republic than in other South American Republics on account of the rank of our Representative, on the ground that there is a large emigration from this country to Buenos Ayres and that the Minister looks after the emigrants. Now the right hon. Gentleman has distinguished himself as a Governor and in other ways, but I do not think he was ever on a mission. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has had some diplomatic experience at Constantinople. But I may tell the right hon. Gentleman that the last place an emigrant thinks of going to is the Legation if there happens to be a Consulate. No emigrant to America ever dreams of going to the British Minister at Washington. I really do not think the right hon. Gentleman supports his position in any way when he says there are more emigrants go to the Argentine Republic than to other South American Republics. He tells us there was a Committee in 1870, and no doubt there was, and the rank of our Plenipotentiary and a Chargé d'affaires, and it may make them happier. The Committee wanted to do something, and they made their recommendations. We know how these things happen in Committees. But you do not carry this out fairly; you make a distinction in regard to the Argentine Republic. Now, Monte Video is almost opposite Buenos Ayres, just as Calais is opposite Dover.

*SIR R. FOWLER (London): Ninety miles apart.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, I know; and Calais is only 24 miles off. You have Uruguay on the one side, and, I suppose, there are a considerable number of emigrants there, and there you have a Consul General to whom you pay £1,600, or, with his clerk, £1,750; and at Buenos Ayres, opposite Monte Video, you have a Minister and his Secretary, &c., costing £4,635. The right hon. Gentleman mentions a case in which he says a South American Republic, influenced by the rank of our Representative out there, fixed the residence of their joint Representative for England and France in Paris. Well, of course it is the same in South America as in North America—the people like Paris, they look upon Paris as a place for good people to go to. Having a choice between London and Paris they prefer Paris. It may be bad taste, but so it is. Really, considering the Ministers we have had from these South American Republics—I have known some of them—the less we have of them the better. So far as I am concerned they may all live in Paris. I am not speaking of present Representatives—let these be exceptions—but my experience of these gentlemen who have the title of Ministers is, that they get little salary; they get their livelihood in a precarious, speculative sort of way; they make bogus treaties, and they play billiards. When we are told that we ought to pay £3,000 extra to one of these South American Republics, because if we do not that Republic may positively be so antagonistic that they will send their Minister to live at Paris instead of in London, it is a little too absurd. If that view is the true one, then we ought to make them all Ambassadors at once for fear of exciting jealousy. It is the duty of the Under Secretary to defend it; but with his experience of the Foreign Office, he must know perfectly well that it is an utterly useless and wasteful expenditure of public money. Under the circumstances, I must ask the Committee to divide.

MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): I shall support my hon. Friend, not that I can enter into these diplomatic distinctions and what he calls fuss and feathers, for I am bound to admit I do not understand these things; but in regard to emigration I may say a word or two. Our Ambassador—or whatever he is called—in the Argentine Republic took no precautions whatever in regard to the arrival of emigrants.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. The Minister engaged himself with the Relief Committee beforehand, when he heard that a large number of English and Irish emigrants were coming. It happened that a large number of emigrants had arrived a day or two before, and the barracks where emigrants are accommodated on their arrival were full. The Minister with the British Relief Committee took immediate action. The Committee provided for some of the poor people in their own houses, and but for the relief afforded by the Committee the people would have suffered much more than they did.

MR. MOLLOY: The fact remains that no action was taken by the Minister until the British residents formed themselves into a committee and went to the Minister and induced him to put himself at their head. Agents came from the Argentine Confederation to England and Ireland to induce people to emigrate, but what notice of this was taken before these agents came over? The intention was well known in Buenos Ayres, and yet no information was given, no precaution was taken; the evil was allowed to be done, and no action was taken until the British residents took the matter up, and, thus invoked, the Minister gave his assistance. The explanation of the right hon. Gentleman is not satisfactory. For what purpose I cannot conceive, the right hon. Gentleman stated, as an excuse for the mistakes that these unfortunate people suffered, that the emigrants were mostly Irish and of bad character.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No.

MR. MOLLOY: I noticed at the same time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to stop the right hon. Gentleman by pulling his coat-tail. Now this is a grave accusation to make. We know these people who went out yielded to the temptations of the Argentine agents over here, and owing to the want of precautions taken by our Minister. What warrant has the right hon. Gentleman for saying that the people who went from Ireland were mostly composed of idlers and bad characters?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I never said such a thing. I said that too little care was taken in the selection of suitable emigrants, and that many sent from Ireland were not fitted to make good colonists; that a considerable number were of idle habits. It was the fault of selection. I know that there are a large number of Irishmen now in the Argentine Republic who are doing exceedingly well, and are good colonists from every point of view. I never said anything approaching the statement that the Irish emigrants were chiefly bad characters. I said there were many who were unfortunately chosen.

MR. MOLLOY: The great majority of them.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I never said so.

MR. MOLLOY: Certainly the impression conveyed was that a large number were composed of idlers and bad characters, and I at once drew attention to the remark across the House, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to check it. Does anybody know if an emigrant is well fitted until he becomes acquainted with the habits and work of a new country? Still the fact remains that the Minister Plenipotentiary, with practically nothing to do—I have visited some of these countries, and I know their life is that of ease and leisure—allowed these agents to come to England and Ireland and induce these families to go out, and sent no word of warning that might have saved them from the miseries they underwent. There is nothing more unfortunate in the history of my country than the miseries that emigrants have had to undergo. I have seen them landed in foreign countries where we has been afforded to give them a fair chance; the men become drunkards, the women become something worse. How is it with all this expenditure on the Diplomatic Service no precautions are taken against these things? Go to any country you like, it is not from the diplomats the emigrants get any assistance, whatever help there is comes from private associations. And here in this House we have excuses made, and no word of sympathy for the unfortunate people who have suffered these miseries that a word of warning might have prevented. So far as I know, and I have made some inquiry, notwithstanding the examples we have had, notwithstanding the evil that has been done, no public warning has been sent by the Minister. It may be he has done so in private but that is of no use to the public. The agents are still endeavouring to get people to emigrate, and there is no warning of the dangers and difficulties before them. I shall support the hon. Member in his Motion for a reduction, not on the ground he has himself taken, but on the ground that the work for which these gentlemen are paid has not been done, and in order to mark the opinion of the Committee with regard to the grave dereliction of duty on the part of the Minister Plenipotentiary in the Argentine Republic.

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Before we divide I should like to assure the Committee of my own knowledge that there is not the slightest foundation for the statement of the hon. Member that her Majesty's representative at Buenos Ayres has been in the least degree indifferent to any of his duties, and particularly in looking after emigrants who have gone out there. That gentleman has gone out of his way to take an immense deal of trouble to assist them. He has also sent home a large quantity of useful information, as will be seen when the Papers are distributed.

MR. MOLLOY: I do not dispute that he is doing so now—

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: And has done so all along.

MR. MOLLOY: I challenge denial when I say that no warning of any sort was sent by our Minister Pleni-

Mr. LABOUCHERE: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise the distinction between a Minister Resident, or Envoy Extraordinary, and a Consul? The business of the former is to communicate with the Government respecting political matters, while the latter has to send home Commercial Reports. You have at Buenos Ayres, in addition to the Minister Resident, a Consul General who receives a salary of £1,000 a year, besides expenses to the extent of £500 a year. You have also a Consul at Rosario who gets £500 per annum. Why do not these gentlemen look after emigrants, and why is so much more given to our Representatives at Buenos Ayres than at Monte Video?

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I did not hear the formal speech of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but I heard the account given of it by my hon. Friend, and I must say that the few words which have just been uttered have not materially qualified that account. In defending the inaction of the Minister to the Argentine Republic the right hon. Gentleman has defamed the character of the people of Ireland. You give this Minister a salary of £3,000 a year, while your Consul gets £1,000 a year, and when it is obvious that poor people have been seduced from Ireland by false representations, these officials might surely have issued a warning as to the conditions under which the emigrants could be safely conducted. But the Consul gave no such information, and I should like the right hon. Gentleman to tell us why. Surely the Minister could have made some arrangements for the reception of these emigrants and have issued some notification to the people at home, which would prevent a recurrence of these disgraceful calamities. It does not appear that up to a recent date any sort of information was given, though the Minister now seems to be atoning for his neglect. With regard to the attack which the right hon. Gentleman felt himself justified in making on these emigrants, my heard, either in this House, or out of it, that the Irish emigrant is unwilling to turn himself to any particular work, and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell us what work it was that these emigrants were unwilling to do. If the charge be true that these people were idle and not good colonists, then they must be different from all the Irish emigrants I have ever heard of, and I think the Home Secretary, who has had some experience of Ireland, will be able to confirm me when I say that if there is any hard work to be done, the Irish emigrant is the man to do it. I repeat that these Irish people are about the best colonists that can be obtained. They are as ready and as able as any other people to accommodate themselves to different kinds of labour. If the right hon. Gentleman knew anything about the Argentine Republic, he would know that it is Irishmen who have done most to build up the prosperity and make the progress of that Republic; and, in the face of these facts, I think he was not judicious in rising at the Table and making an attack on an inoffensive people who were led to a distant part of the world by false representations. I noticed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was on the Ministerial Bench at the time, and did not interfere; but had the First Lord of the Treasury been present, no doubt he would have used his influence to prevent such unfounded charges being made.

*Sir J. FERGUSSON: The right hon. Gentleman could hardly have heard my answer to the hon. Member for Northampton with respect to the hardships suffered by some emigrants to the Argentine Republic. I thought it proper to give the information which I have received, and which will soon be in the hands of Members. What I said was that for the most part the emigrants did very well, but that in some cases there had been a careless selection of emigrants, some of whom were not Minister has been doing his duty and exerting himself on behalf of colonists.

Dr. CLARK: I think good reason has been shown for this reduction. Why should the Argentine Republic have both a Minister and a Consul, while seven other South American States are satisfied with a Minister and Consul General combined in one person? Why should the Argentine Republic have a special envoy?

*Sir J. FERGUSSON: I have already answered that point. I cannot help it if the hon. Member was not in the House when I answered the hon. Member for Northampton.

Dr. OLARK: I was in the House and heard the attempted explanation of the right hon. Gentleman; but certainly, so far as I can judge, he gave no reason why we should vote this extra money to the Argentine Republic.

*Sir J. FERGUSSON: What I said was that British trade and interests were greater in the Argentine Republic than in any other South American State except Brazil. The expense of living at Buenos Ayres, owing to its rapid development, has largely increased of late years. There is no reason at all for the reduction of the Vote.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I admit that the right hon. Gentleman has given reasons for this heavy expenditure, but they are not good reasons. The cost of living in the Argentine Republic is not greater than in Peru or Monte Video, and the Minister is not called upon to entertain to any considerable extent.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 101.—(Div. List, No. 313.)

Original Question again proposed.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I have an Amendment to reduce the Vote by £3,000, but I propose only to move a reduction of £500, and in doing so I have to discuss two points, the first being the salary paid to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Vienna. There is nowadays a great tendency to appoint Ambassadors where Ministers Plenipotentiary and Envoys Extraordinary have been before. An Ambassador has a higher salary and a higher retiring pension, in return for which the country gets no practical advantage, the only difference between the wo

Monarch of the country to which he is accredited, because he is supposed to be the direct representative of the Sovereign who accredits him; whereas a Minister Plenipotentiary and an Envoy Extraordinary has not that right. It seems to me that this is a small and impracticable advantage. I have taken the case of Austria because it is first on the list, but the same observations apply to other countries. In Spain and Italy, for instance, Envoys Extraordinary have been converted into Ambassadors. It may be said that where foreign countries send Ambassadors here we should send an Ambassador to those foreign countries; but that is not true as a general rule. In some cases we send Ambassadors to foreign countries which only send Envoys Extraordinary here. That is my first point. My next is that the Ambassador at Vienna is paid £500 a year more than the Ambassadors at Berlin and St. Petersburg, and I want to know the reason for that difference. It is said that the Ambassador is given this high salary at Vienna because the expense of living is very high. I should have thought it was as expensive at Berlin, but there is no question of this—that the expense of living at St. Petersburg is at least one-third higher than in Austria, although we pay less to our Representative in St. Petersburg than we do to the Ambassador in Vienna. I, therefore, ask the Committee to agree with me in making this reduction as a protest, in the first place, against the whole system of these Ambassadors abroad; and, in the second, against paying our Ambassador in Vienna so much more per annum than those in Berlin and St. Petersburg. There is another small point I wish to deal with. There is £300 put down for a chaplain. There is no such thing as a chaplain to an Embassy, but in places where there is a Consul a chaplain can be paid double the sum subscribed by the residents for his support. Here the chaplain is put down as chaplain to the Ambassador. I find that there is a Consul General at Vienna. He is a very ornamental sort of gentleman, because he receives no fees, and the total fees he collects during the entire year are £85. The existence of this gentleman entails upon us a cost of tion of the salary of the Ambassador in Austria by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item A, Salaries, &c., be reduced by £500, part of the Salary of the Ambassador to Austria."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am glad the hon. Gentleman has not referred to the Vienna Embassy because he objects to it particularly, but only on the general ground that Ambassadors are not necessary, and that the work may as well be done by representatives of lower rank. Well, Sir, it has become the practice of late years for the Great Powers to be represented at each other's Courts by officials of the highest rank. It is a matter of International courtesy, and certainly English interests abroad are not less now than in times past. The hon. Gentleman has remarked on the recent raising of the rank of the Representative at Madrid to that of Ambassador, but he has fallen into the mistake of imagining that the Spanish Representative in our Court is not an Ambassador. It was because he was raised to the rank of Ambassador that Her Majesty's Government raised the rank of our Representative at Madrid. The proposal came from the Spanish Government, and it was not thought desirable to refuse such a mark of respect to a country which I am glad to say has, of late, been making remarkable advances. The change made there has been made without any additional cost to the public. That has been avoided by a rearrangement of salaries and allowances in other places. As to the chaplain, it has long been the custom to maintain a chaplain at such places, and it is a very comfortable thing for British subjects when they go to a foreign country to find their own church is represented there.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman has thrown a most extraordinary light on the mode in which money is obtained and spent on this Vote. We have hitherto managed with a Plenipotentiary in Spain and were perfectly satisfied. Suddenly Spain in a swagger sort of way—being a little Power that wants to be a great Power—sends an Ambassador to London, and as a consequence we have to send an Ambassador to Madrid. How is the money got? By the transfer of salaries from other offices. Then the right hon. Gentleman admits either that the Government have been most cruel to other public servants, or year after year they have been paying salaries which are unnecessary. Does the right hon. Gentleman know whether the Spanish Ambassador receives the same salary as our Ambassador in Madrid? I should say that most undoubtedly he does not. So that Spain has made an uncommonly good bargain, because she gets a much larger amount of British money spent in Madrid than she sends to England. How far is this to go? If the Republic of Honduras should send an Ambassador here, would Her Majesty's Government return the compliment? There is one country which shows common sense in this matter. The United States never appoints or receives Ambassadors. An Envoy is good enough for that great country. Then the Under Secretary says it is a pleasant thing to find a church abroad. That may be so, but it is not a pleasant thing for me to have to pay for the chaplain of a church which is not necessarily my church. There are many sects in this country, and for my part I regard them as pretty equal. There is a sect called the Church of England, and there is one called the Presbyterian. The right hon. Gentleman, being a Scotchman, may be a Presbyterian. Does it not shock his sense of justice when he goes to Vienna and finds that, as a member of the fine old sect of Presbyterians, he has to pay for the Church of England chaplain, and cannot find any Presbyterian church? The shameful thing is that this is done by trickery and dodgery. The Ambassador has no right to a chaplain. By rights, I ought to divide twice over—that is to say, in regard both to the Ambassador and the chaplain—but I think I shall have done my duty if I divide the Committee over the Ambassador.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Briggs): I have been struck with the argument used by the hon. Gentleman in regard to these chaplains. I find we have such chaplains in Austria, Denmark, Greece, Spain, of which we have not one, and in no chaplain there. In Russia and Italy we are chaplainless, and why on earth do we not have a chaplain in Persia? We have as our Representative there a very eminent former Member of this House, and one would have thought that his spiritual affairs would have been looked after more carefully. The fact is, it is simple nonsense, and the excuse is simply an excuse. There is no reason that could be given in regard to any one of these cases that would not apply just as much to the other. As to the question of Ambassadors and Envoys, I should like to know why one is paid more than the other, seeing that they do exactly the same work and have exactly the same responsibility. Why should you pay a man more because you give him a nicer name? I shall certainly feel it my duty to vote with my hon. Friend, unless some explanation is given of the change in the rates we are paying for an article which is admittedly the same.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 96.—(Div. List, No. 314.)

Original Question again proposed.

the purpose of peace, but which appears to be practically an alliance of a defensive kind against either Russia or France singly, or Russia and France combined. Now, I am one of those who think that the less we meddle in affairs on the Continent the better it will be for us. This country is an Island, and it seems to me that we ought to take up the same position towards the Continent as the United States adopts towards Europe. If the Continental Powers go to war certainly we ought to regret it, but we ought not to put ourselves between the hammer and the anvil. We ought, perhaps, to give good advice, which probably would not be listened to; but we ought not, directly or indirectly, to enter into any engagement or liability which might drag us into a Continental war. The Emperor of Germany has lately been in this country. I asked a question some time ago as to whether there was any truth in the statement that conversations had taken place between the Emperor of Germany or Count Bismarck and Lord Salisbury defining our position in regard to the Triple Alliance? An allegation

Envoy Extraordinary; they want a quiet, decent, honest man, who receives a reasonable salary, without all this fuss and bother, costing £5,000 a year."

They are perfectly satisfied with your Minister Resident and Consul General, or they would be satisfied with having a Consul General alone. I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £1,300, which will bring the salary of the Envoy Extraordinary to about the level of the salaries of our Representatives in other South American Republics.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, &c., be reduced by £1,300, part of the salary of the Minister to the Argentine Republic."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. BRADLAUGH: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers my hon. Colleague, I should like to ask him if he can give us any further information as to the result of the investigation concerning the unfortunate emigrants who suffered such severe privations in the Argentine Republic, and I would at the same time ask whether it is not possible for our Representative in the Argentine Republic—Minister, Consul General, or whoever he may be—to send information to this country before the evils rise to such an extent that of necessity they are brought before the attention of this House. I admit that after attention was drawn to these matters in the House the Foreign Office acted with great promptitude, and a great deal was done to relieve the distress, but it was after the distress had risen to a height to attract public attention, and while the agents of the Argentine Republic were still allowed to tempt emigrants.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I will first answer the points raised by the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). He has moved the reduction of the Vote for the salary of Her Majesty's Minister at Buenos Ayres, and he says he does not know what good reason there can be for raising the rank of Her Majesty's Representative at these places in South America.

MR. LABOUCHERE: At this place alone.

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Yes, in the Argentine Republic. The hon.

Mr. Labouchere

Member thinks the duties might well be discharged by an official of lower rank, and that the staff of a Minister Plenipotentiary is not required, and that the South American Republics are indifferent to representation of this country by officers of high rank. These, I think, are the chief grounds upon which he moved the reduction. Now, on all these points I must traverse what the hon. Gentleman has said. On this subject I think I cannot do better than refer to the Report of the Committee which sat on the Diplomatic and Consular establishments in 1870. In that Report it was stated that it was desirable to give Her Majesty's Representatives at various places in South America the rank of Minister without increasing their pay. Lord Hammond, who was then Under Secretary of State, gave evidence before that Committee as to the importance of keeping Representatives of the higher rank at those posts; and he said so keenly did these South African Republics feel the importance attached to our representation being by officials of high rank that one of these Governments, when accrediting a Minister jointly to this country and France, fixed the residence of their Representative at Paris instead of London, because we kept a Representative of lower rank in South America. Lord Hammond particularly noticed the case of the Argentine Republic, and dwelt on the importance of British interests there. Since 1870, the Argentine Republic has greatly advanced. The country has developed in an extraordinary degree during the last 10 years. Last year about 1,100 persons emigrated from this country to the Republic, and there are probably 100,000 British subjects there now. Our commercial interests there have very much increased, and undoubtedly our relations with that Republic are more important now than with any other South American country, except, perhaps, Brazil. Her Majesty's Representative at Buenos Ayres was already a Minister Plenipotentiary when we were represented by a Chargé d'affaires at other places in South America, and it has always been considered that the post there is more important. The tide of emigration which has flowed towards Buenos Ayres and the Argentine Republic has thrown a great deal of extra work on Her right hon. Baronet says that the Government have not committed themselves to any possible junction with the Triple Alliance, and I do not wish to misinterpret the right hon. Gentleman, but these words seem to me to be of a rather sweeping character.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should not like to be misunderstood. In order to be quite precise I quoted what I stated before, to which I entirely adhere. I said, "Her Majesty's Government were under no engagements to employ the Military or Naval Forces of this country except such as were known to the House."

MR. PICTON: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for completing my information, "except such as were known to the House." Unfortunately we private Members are not able to keep ourselves exactly informed as to the precise terms which occur in the various public documents, and we would be extremely grateful if on occasions of this kind Members of the Government would tell us precisely to what we are committed. We want to know, for instance, whether the pressure put upon the House by the Government to increase the powers of the Navy this year was occasioned by the consciousness that we were committed to warlike contingencies. So far as hon. Members are aware there is no engagement except that relating to Belgium; we do not know of any Treaty binding us to maintain the unity of Italy. The pressure exerted by the Government in the matter of naval defence did occasion much uneasiness to some Members who may be regarded as specially lovers of peace—peace consistent, of course, with honour; and I do not think that the information we have received as yet can be deemed satisfactory. We on these Benches are quite as much concerned in the honour as well as in the safety of our native land as any hon. or right hon. Gentleman opposite; but we contend that our honour is not concerned in the defence of institutions which ought to be maintained by the inhabitants of the country that loves those institutions. Anxiety is quickened when we hear of rumours which are not completely contradicted that we are committed to the maintenance of the Triple Alliance.

MR. WADDY: Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House accept implicitly any statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, either as a private gentleman, or as a public official; but that is not the difficulty. The difficulty lies beyond that. I observe that the right hon. Gentleman did not tell us in definite language that there have been no assurances whatever given by this country, and that there would be no interference whatever by this country to secure the objects of the Triple Alliance. Instead of telling us what it is to which he pledges himself, he resorted to the quotation of words which related to another period; and he used a phrase calculated from past association to arouse suspicion. He spoke of a rumour not being authentic. That word "authentic" has a very unpleasant history.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If the hon. Member likes, I will say it is perfectly absurd.

MR. WADDY: That the statement of the Opinions is perfectly absurd?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No.

MR. WADDY: Ah!

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, the statement which the hon. Member made. I gave a categorical answer at the time as regards the quotation from the Opinions showing that it was incorrect. I said the rumours to which the hon. Member for Northampton referred are quite unauthentic, and I will go so far as to say they are absurd.

MR. WADDY: I do not understand the distinction drawn between things that are unauthentic and things that are absurd. I said that the word "authentic" has an unpleasant history. We all remember that a very eminent authority, when he was asked in another place questions with regard to a treaty, said, "the rumours in question are altogether unauthentic, and not deserving of the confidence of noble Lords." At the very time that was said the Treaty had been written, and the "unauthentic" statement was perfectly true. What we desire the right hon. Gentleman to tell us is whether we have entered into any undertaking to support Italy by military or naval force. We do not want to hear about what is included or excluded by any particular Treaty. Will he say that there is no truth whatever in the statement that this country is a party to any assurance or inducement to any member of the Triple Alliance?

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman has told us he repeats the words he used in a previous Session, and those words, as I gather them, are that he can assure the House that no engagement has been entered into with Italy to employ the Forces of Her Majesty in the defence of Italy.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I said, "Her Majesty's Government were under no engagement to employ the military or naval forces of this country, except such as were known to the House."

MR. LABOUCHERE: But without being under any engagement to employ the Military or Naval Forces of the country in defence of Italy, you may yet convey to Italy in an indirect fashion that so far as the Members of Her Majesty's Government are concerned they approve of the Triple Alliance, and that should any harm come to Italy through her forming the Triple Alliance they will, if they are in office, use their best offices to protect Italy against any loss of territory. I do not suppose that Lord Salisbury, who stands in fear of public opinion, will give any assurances to Italy that will not leave the right hon. Gentleman free to make and repeat the declaration he has quoted. But I will submit to the right hon. Gentleman a form of words that will give satisfaction:—

"That no communication has been made to Italy by Her Majesty's Government, since the accession to office of Lord Salisbury, either orally or in writing, which may lead that country to suppose that Her Majesty's Government would, in any eventuality, protect Italy from the possible consequences in the Mediterranean of her finding herself the ally of Germany, or that Her Majesty's Government approves of the alliance entered into between Austria, Germany, and Italy."

These are broad words; they cover everything; they express what I mean. I have written them down to make it perfectly clear what I mean. I am a simple-minded person, and do not understand all the refinements of the right hon. Baronet or of his chief. I remember the rumours in the Press and the statement of Lord Salisbury with respect to an agreement made with Turkey. If the right hon. Gentleman refuses to give any clear and specific declaration that nothing in the nature suggested by my question has been done, or if, on the other hand, he will give us a declaration which we shall be able fully to understand and be prepared to accept, and which, if given, will prevent our urging at any future time that any secret arrangement has been arrived at in this matter, we shall know or infer what is the true state of affairs. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs will answer my question. I am ready to accept the statement of those gentlemen, either jointly or separately. I hope we shall have some sort of assurance from one of them. [Laughter from the Treasury Bench.] The right hon. Gentleman laughs. He perfectly well knows that he cannot give any such assurance. He knows that when Lord Salisbury disappears from the Foreign Office traces of this business will be left behind, and the noble Lord will be discovered as he was once before when he made certain statements which were not put forward in that direct, right, or proper manner in which such statements ought to have been made and understood, in order to suit the exigencies of his European policy. I now ask the right hon. Gentleman, as the representative of Lord Salisbury, whether he can give a satisfactory reply to the question I have written out? As I have said, this question covers everything; but if the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to give such an assurance as I have asked for and falls back on the sort of vague, ambiguous, and evasive statement he made last year—of course I mean no offence to the right hon. Baronet in saying this—I, and many others in this House will continue to believe that there is some secret alliance between the Prime Minister of England, Lord Salisbury, and the members of the Triple Alliance, and that that alliance is levelled, to a considerable extent, against France and Russia. I think it is more likely to be levelled against France than Russia, because although Lord Salisbury has a perfect mania with regard to the ambitious projects of Russia, he has, nevertheless, a special hatred against France, and has shown this hatred and grossly insulted that counlations between Great Britain and the Great Powers of Europe we are absolutely denied any information whatever, the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs having told us nothing except that, in order that the Government might not commit themselves, he read to us a statement repeating the words he had used in February last. Since then there have undoubtedly been a great number of communications between our Government and the Governments of France, Italy, and Germany. Things have not stood still in regard to the relations between Italy and Germany, and, as is well known, there is a considerable feeling of uneasiness as to the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Triple Alliance. There is a feeling that we may have been committed to engagements on this subject without being made aware of the extent of our responsibility. I venture to think that it would be much wiser if Her Majesty's Government were to pursue a more open line of policy in foreign affairs towards the people of this country. They should recognise the fact that this House and the electorate of this country ought to be made aware of our relations with foreign Powers, and what engagements they are committed to. The English people are not at all averse to undertaking obligations such as it may be deemed necessary to undertake; but they view with apprehension the possibility that they may be committed to engagements, the extent of which they do not know, and which they may be called on at a very awkward moment to fulfil. I would most earnestly urge the Government to give us, if possible, some fuller information as to what are the actual relations of this country towards the Triple Alliance.

*MR. LEA (Derry, S.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said there never has been a time when foreign affairs received so little attention in this House. That proves clearly that this House has perfect confidence in Her Majesty's Government with regard to the foreign relations of this country, and that confidence is reflected outside this House.

MR. MOLLOY: Looking at the statement made by the First Lord of the Treasury, I understand him to have said that there is no treaty and that we are not committed to any particular policy with regard to Italy or the Triple Alliance, and that, in point of fact, England is in no sense committed to any of the Powers of Europe. I do not think we could ask for more than this, and we certainly ought to feel bound to accept that statement; because I do not think the right hon. Gentleman would have used the plain language he did if he had believed the words conveyed a meaning that could not be comprehended by the Committee. I think that that statement was very fairly made, and as I am quite prepared to accept it, I have to say that under these circumstances, anxious as I always am to vote with my hon. Friend below me, I do not think I can vote with him on this occasion.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 315.)

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I have to move the reduction of the Vote by £100, being part of the salary of the Ambassador to Turkey. I make this Motion in order to draw attention to recent events in Armenia, and to the policy of the Embassy at Constantinople as a vehicle of information in regard to the condition of the Christian population of Asia Minor, and as an instrument of English influence on the policy of the Porte in reference to these matters. The result of the previous Debate on this subject was that we were left in a Cimmerian darkness by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. All that was then made manifest was that our policy at Constantinople was merely a policy of shutting our eyes and ears, and not even venturing to state our opinion with regard to what was going on in Turkey and Asia Minor, for fear that if we expose these outrages we shall be weakening the authority of the Turkish Government. The information we have obtained through the pressure brought to bear by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, as given in the Blue Book which has been laid on the Table, shows that the policy of the Government is not fully carried out by Her Majesty's Representative at Constantinople—the policy of shutting the eyes to what is going on in those Eastern regions. The statements in the Blue Book confirm almost every

Majesty's Representatives supplemented in a singularly vigorous manner by that of the head of the English Church. We have the evidence of Mr. Browne, substantiated by independent witnesses like Mr. Athelstan Riley and Dr. Cholmondeley, who have several times visited these Nestorians as to these outrages. How have we been met on the opposite side by the Turks in the matter? Why, the Turkish view was put forward by the Turkish Ambassador, and is given on page 35 of the Blue Book. The Turkish Ambassador represents the attitude adopted at Constantinople, which was, apparently, too easily acquiesced in by Her Majesty's Representative in that city. The Turkish Ambassador wholly denied the facts thus established by independent evidence which would convince any Court of Justice in this country, and actually went so far as to say that Mr. Browne was the plague of the neighbourhood, and should be removed, and that no one desired his absence more than the Patriarch of the Nestorian Church—Mar Shimoon. This view was enforced on Her Majesty's Government through the Turkish Ambassador; but what I have to complain of, further, is that we have in this instance, as we have in a great many others in connection with these matters, the familiar kind of memoranda got up by English officials who are under the Constantinople influence, and who seem, as I have said, to have eyes and ears open only to statements which tell in favour of the Turkish Government—I refer to the memoranda of Colonel Trotter and Colonel Bell. These memoranda show the willingness of Her Majesty's Representatives in Turkey to accept whatever representation the Turkish Government puts within their view, and which may serve to cast doubt or throw cold water on the evidence of people on the spot, who tell us of atrocities such as those perpetrated on the Nestorians. I denounce this policy on the part of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople as reflecting no credit upon the good sense of those who carry it out, or upon the honour of this country. I have referred in detail to this matter because of a passage in one of the despatches of Sir W. White. Speaking of these atrocities on the Nestorian Christians, he says they may break out again during the present year; and I would like to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they have any later information as to the position of these Nestorian Christians than that of which the House is in possession? And now I would refer to the horrible atrocities with which we have been familiarised during the last two months, which have occurred in Armenia proper, chiefly in the District of Van, and which are connected, mainly, with the notorious Kurdish Chief Moum Bey. What has been the action of Her Majesty's Representatives and the Turkish Authorities in this matter? The subject was touched on in this House and another place by the representative of the Foreign Office with much hesitation and uncertainty of tone. The alleged atrocities with which Moum Bey is specially connected were indignantly denied by the Turkish Ambassador, and there has been far too much disposition to accept or not to challenge those denials. What has been the policy of Her Majesty's Representative at Constantinople? That policy is shown clearly by a typical passage in the Blue Book, in a despatch of Lord Salisbury to Sir W. White, on page 57, in which the statement of the Turkish Ambassador is quoted to the effect that—"There were occasionally Kurdish raids, but they were repressed, and large bodies of police were employed to maintain order. The Porte selected the best officers at its disposal for the Armenian Provinces, and his Excellency maintained that the improvement there, as well as in the other Provinces of the Empire, was very remarkable."

And I wish to draw special attention to the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, which is also given in the despatch:—

"Sir James Fergusson observed, in reply, that Her Majesty's Government had, as his Excellency knows, abstained from pressing the Porte on the subject in spite of the reports which had reached them, that the Armenians were suffering from considerable hardships, for they knew the difficulties with which the Porte had to contend."

That is my complaint, that Her Majesty's Government will not use such powers as they have for fear of embarrassing the Porte, though they well know from the Reports of their Consul that these atrocities are taking place. Then in the Blue Book there is a statement by the Sultan to Sir W. White, in which he says that these atrocities are carried out by nomad Kurds from the Persian Frontier, who raid into Armenia and then escape from Turkish jurisdiction, so that nothing can be done. And he adds, characteristically, that the atrocities which were attributed to Moussa Bey were so repugnant to the customs and habits of Mahommedans that he refused to credit them. That statement, which was transmitted to us by Sir W. White, was echoed without comment by the Prime Minister in another place, when he spoke about the atrocities being carried out by Kurds who come across the frontier into Armenia. This statement was absolutely denied by the Persian Ambassador, Malcom Khan, and is wholly disproved by the Reports of Her Majesty's Consuls on the spot. The scene of these outrages was the district between Bitlis and Moush, at a distance, I am told, of not less than 250 kilometres from the Persian Frontier. The whole history of this ruffian, Moussa Bey, is given by Mr. Devey, Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Van, of whom Colonel Ohermside speaks in the highest terms—who has been four years in the neighbourhood of Erzeroum, who has made himself thoroughly acquainted with the neighbourhood, and whose Reports give with an exactness—almost photographic—the details of these atrocities. He establishes absolutely the whole of the worst facts alleged against Moussa Bey—his long career of violence and crime which has led to the present state of things. The Committee must bear in mind that these Kurdish Chiefs are living in the centre of Turkish Armenia, and form part of the local powers of the district. Mr. Devey shows that Moussa Bey was not a nomad at all, but was the ruler over five villages in the district of Khuit, in the plain of Moush, near Bitlis, and had an armed force of nearly 1,000 men at his disposal. This man has been able to make atrocious attacks on missionaries, to perpetrate outrages on women, to burn villages, and to murder men and women for years past; in fact, it is clear that he has been the scourge of this fruitful plain. And there has been no redress. The Turkish Authorities have been petitioned to interfere, but Moussa Bey is hand and glove with all the Powers of Bitlis, and they have constantly laughed at the orders to arrest him. Repeated complaints have been made to Constantinople, but these complaints are not infrequently disastrous to those who make them. One of the Christians who took an active part in these petitions, Ohannes, the head man of a village in the plain of Moush, was waylaid and put to death by Moussa Bey's men under circumstances of the most revolting barbarity. Anyone who reads the evidence given in the Blue Book will see that the descriptions of the way this man was burnt to death are only varied in matters of detail in a manner quite natural, seeing that they come from various sources. We see how this man is regarded in Turkey. Instead of being brought to justice, he was nominally arrested by the Local Authorities. He at once escaped, and actually threatened the Local Authorities that he should come down on them and exact the restitution of the bribes he had given them for ignoring the atrocities. He is received with honour in his own neighbourhood, and escorted by his friends to Constantinople, where he is received by Bahri Pasha, who holds high office at Constantinople and is a relative of Moussa. He has every guarantee that the Sultan absolutely disbelieves beforehand in any of the crimes charged against him. Finally, we have in the Turkish Pro-Memoria, forwarded by Sir William White to Her Majesty's Government, the very climax of outrageous and transparent mis-statement, amounting to a simple drawing of the pen through notorious facts, and stating that the Bey is an angel who is very much injured and wishes to have the charges inquired into. Consul Devey says in his Memorandum, on page 73, that the Porte has to rely only on the Reports sent to him by his own employés, and he especially comments on the invariably unsatisfactory nature of those Reports. He also draws attention to another phase of the question. It is not merely a question of these outrages, but one of deliberate political persecution which is being carried on by the Turkish Authorities in Armenia. He refers to the persecution, the arrest, and the banishment of many people for suspicions which they incurred many years back, and says that even persons who have combined to provide funds for the sick and children left orphans after the war between Turkey and Russia, have been arrested and sent into exile. The Armenians are treated as rebels and disorderly people, and the charges made against them are bolstered with such absurd reports as that of the Armenian brigands referred to the other night by the hon. Member for St. Pancras. Those young Armenians were undoubtedly patriots, and the papers on them showed their patriotic instincts. It is perfectly ridiculous to say that they were brigands and plunderers. The present Vali of Van, Halil Pasha, is described by Consul Devey as a suspicious tyrant who is carrying out the most effective policy for producing disorder in Armenia. Consul Devey says that in the neighbourhood of Bitlis, which he knows most familiarly, there is really no disaffection on the part of the Armenian population. He states that the Kurdish persecution is as bad as ever, that the sufferings of the people are really pitiable, and that if they are not looked on with suspicion by the Government, the utter contempt with which they are treated must be severely felt. He adds that the "Kurdish Sheiks ever hold that the Vilayet is under exception, and that the laws in force elsewhere do not apply." The Armenians have great reason to complain also of the land laws, under which they have been deprived of their land, owing to defects in their title, and have had it sold to Circassians and Kurds. They have also to complain of judicial and fiscal corruption and tyranny and of the practical enslavement of many of them, especially young Armenian women, who are captured and carried off by Kurdish Chiefs. Now, what I wish to know is whether we cannot make some use of our Representatives in Asia Minor and in Turkey to mitigate and bring to an end this state of things? In the first place, can we not have an end of this policy of accepting and palliating these false statements; can we not have a franker and a fairer denunciation of crime when it is clearly brought before the knowledge of Her Majesty's Representatives? I should like also to ask whether we cannot use our influence to induce the Turkish Government to send into Armenia, as

Consul Devey suggests, stronger and more just and wiser men. As it is now, the Turks, instead of sending good men into Armenia, send the worst, as a disgrace. The other day it was stated that some of these evils were to be mitigated, because a new Pasha was to be sent to Bitlis. I hold in my hand a passage from a French paper, Le Temps, in which it is said—

"Raoûf Pasha, who has only been three months Vali of Beyrouth, has, owing to frequent complaints of the foreign Consuls against his proceedings, and probably also because of the frequent murders of Christians and Mussulmen which he has been unable to control, has been transferred to Bitlis, which is equivalent to disgrace."

But we have a further line to take up. I venture to declare that there is a distinct obligation on the part of this country under existing treaties to exercise such form of protection as lies within our reach over these miserable Christian populations. That is a point which, I think, has been unfairly dealt with by the Prime Minister in another place. His argument has been that England would have to do this alone, and to do it with force at our back, a course which he knows the English people are not willing to sanction. The Treaty of Berlin contemplates not a warlike intervention in the affairs of Turkey, but a peaceful supervision of the Signatory Powers over the carrying out of the reforms in the Turkish dominions. I venture to say we have a right, on behalf of the suffering people of Asia Minor, to press upon her Majesty's Government the real meaning of the Treaty of Berlin. Are we to go on shutting our eyes to the outrages and miseries these unhappy people suffer, shutting our eyes to the fact that these things are attributable to the policy of the Power whose influence we wish to maintain? This is not a matter of sentiment; it is a matter of policy. In Armenia you have a people not altogether in sympathy with Russia. Russia has behaved unwisely and unjustly in her dealings with the people of Armenia and in relation to their religious institutions, and it is perfectly possible by the joint action of the Powers, under the influence of England, to create such a state of things that you would have in Armenia a buffer and a bulwark against Russian advance in the direction of Van and Erzeroum. We should insist that the Governors of these two Provinces should be Armenians and Christians, for there the Christians are in a large majority in the population. I do not wish to detain the Committee at further length. I will only add that if a Conference of the Powers would press this reform, and the institution of an armed Constabulary Force in Armenia, with English or other European officers, these two reforms alone would, if carried out, do immense good in Armenia. I must apologise for the time of the Committee I have occupied. I have endeavoured to put the question forward to the best of my ability, and I trust this discussion may result not in bringing about, as some misguided people have said, conflict between Christian and Moslem inhabitants in Armenia, but in making it clear that English opinion is alive to the necessity of a just policy in Armenia and of strengthening English influence in Constantinople, bringing back the days when Lord Stratford de Redcliffe really did produce some good by the representations he made to the Porte.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, Salaries, &c., be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the Ambassador to Turkey."—(Mr. Channing.)

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I rise to support the Motion of my hon. Friend and to express my entire concurrence in the views he has so clearly put before the Committee. I think the attention of the House should be specially called to the Correspondence on the affairs of Asiatic Turkey which has been laid on the Table within the last few days—this account of what I may call the Armenian atrocities. Not since the days of the Bulgarian atrocities have we been presented with accounts of more horrible misgovernment and cruelty, and if Members had had the time to read through this Correspondence, I am sure that the feelings of indignation aroused would have found vent in a very warm discussion indeed. But such has been the preoccupation of the minds of Members with other matters in the last few days that few have had time to master this Correspondence. Never, I say, since the time of the Bulgarian atrocities have I read accounts of more shocking misgovernment and greater cruelty perpetrated upon a helpless Christian population. We could have nothing more fitted to arouse the feelings of the country, and I believe if the people at large come fully to understand the conditions under which the Armenians live and the dreadful cruelties to which they are exposed at the hands of the Mussulmans, we shall see such a feeling excited that it will be necessary for the Government to take up a stronger attitude on this matter than they have hitherto done. Now, the point especially brought out in these Papers is not only the fact that the Christian population have suffered abominable treatment, but that this treatment has been connived at by the Turkish Governors. This cannot be denied or ignored, the evidence of independent travellers fully confirms the very worst accounts we have in these papers. No person who reads through these papers can doubt that had it not been for the presence of an English clergyman, the Rev. W. H. Browne, there would have been a massacre of Christians greater than any that took place during the Bulgarian atrocities period. The evidence is undoubted that there was a conspiracy among the Kurdish Tribes, the most turbulent of the Turkish subjects to extirpate the whole Christian population of Tiari, consisting of many thousand persons. But for the fact of the Rev. Mr. Browne living in the district, and being able at personal risk to bring pressure to bear at Constantinople, and from Constantinople on the Kurds, we in this country should have heard some fine morning that 10,000 or 20,000 Armenians had been massacred in cold blood. This statement rests on undoubted testimony. My hon. Friend has referred to two English travellers who were passing through the district, and who have supplied authoritative accounts of what was taking place. I will ask the Committee to listen while I give one or two quotations from a report sent by one of these gentlemen, Mr. A. Riley, to the Prime Minister. Writing his memorandum in London on December 1st, he in the course of it says:—

"This summer the sheep of Astritha, the largest village of Tiari, were being fed in a 'soma,' or mountain pasture outside Tiari, in charge of between 200 and 300 women and girls and two men."

Mr. Riley explains that the Ashirets or tribal Assyrians have such a small area of land available for cultivation in their valleys that they are obliged to pasture their flocks outside the valleys—

"On July 31st the encampment was suddenly surrounded by a large body of Kurds, the two men were killed, all the women and girls violated, five were killed, one pregnant woman being ripped open, the child protruded, and one slowly put to death by 25 dagger wounds (I saw the husband of this woman, Rais Yakhani), four others wounded, and the rest stripped entirely naked, and left in that state to make their way back to Ashitha. So terrible an outrage has not occurred since the massacres of Bedr Khan Beg in 1843. The object of the outrage was clearly to draw on the Tiari Tribe to attack the Kurds, and this happened; the men of Tiari prepared to avenge the honour of their women."

Mr. Riley goes on to describe how the Kurds assembled in overwhelming numbers, evidently prepared for a massacre of the whole Christian population, and the Turkish Authorities did not interfere until the energetic efforts of Mr. Browne induced them to send troops, and the Kurds dispersed. I might quote a number of statements of the atrocious outrages perpetrated on these Armenian Christians. Mr. Browne, since he took up his residence at Kochoannes as the guest of the Armenian Patriarch, has been subjected to every species of annoyance by the Turkish Authorities in the hope of driving him out of the country, and but for his presence there is little doubt the Kurds would have extirpated the Armenian people in that part of Asia Minor. In consequence of his representations the Turkish Government were unwillingly forced to send troops into the district, but I am sorry to state that there is the clearest evidence in the despatches to show that the outrages are again reviving against the Christians, of women being carried off, of the burning alive of old men, the destruction of villages, and the stealing of sheep, and, in fact, the Armenian Christians are subjected to treatment under which life is hardly worth living. A person who has largely figured in connection with these proceedings is Moussa Bey, who appears to me to be a kind of Chafket Pasha of Bulgarian atrocity fame. The correspondence is full of accounts of the abominations committed by this man; and yet after many years of this kind of work he visited Constantinople and was treated with honour by the Authorities, notwithstanding that Her Majesty's Government had sent to the Turkish Government full proof of the complicity of Moussa Bey in the atrocities. I complain that the Government have not taken a sufficiently earnest stand in this matter. I do not say that they lack sympathy, no British Government could fail to sympathise with an oppressed people like these Armenians. I freely admit they have done something, indeed they have done a good deal to help these poor people, but I do complain of a want of firmness in their representations to the Turkish Government; they are a great deal too feeble; they are too considerate to the feelings of those scoundrels in Constantinople who connive at these outrages. They have not used language that will make an impression on the Porte, not the language that gave Lord Stratford de Redcliffe such an influence in Turkish affairs. Everybody knows that the Turkish Government are only amenable to the strongest representations, amounting almost to threats. Let me read to the Committee a line or two from Lord Salisbury's despatch to Rustem Pasha, written, be it remembered, after the receipt of Mr. Riley's Report on the atrocious outrages committed by the Kurds on the Nestorians, to which I have alluded, and I ask, is it language sufficiently strong to make any impression upon the Porte. The concluding paragraph of Lord Salisbury's Despatch was thus:—"Under these circumstances I cannot help thinking that your Government has been misinformed"—remember Rustem Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador, had been instructed to deny the ill-treatment and the dangerous, undoubted facts corroborated by undoubted witnesses—

"I shall be happy—continues Lord Salisbury—to obtain a further Report from our Consul Officers in the neighbourhood of the spot, but I do not feel that I should be justified, in the present state of my information, in further pressing upon the Archbishop of Canterbury the wish of the Porte, that Mr. Brown should withdraw from Kochoannes."

Well, I hardly think Lord Salisbury could press the withdrawal of the man whose presence alone prevented the consummation of an atrocious massacre, that I think is the least Lord Salisbury could do. But surely this is feeble to a degree and not the sort of language to make any impression upon the Porte; something much more decided is required to secure the fulfilment of the duties the Turkish Government undertook towards their Christian subjects? This country, above all others, has undertaken engagements towards the Christian population of Turkey. It is in the recollection of the Committee that not many years ago this country gave a guarantee to Turkey for her Asiatic possessions against all foreign Powers on condition that she should carry out her engagements to protect her Christian subjects; most of us thought it was a wild obligation to undertake, but we did guarantee the Turkish possessions in Asia Minor on condition that certain specified reforms were carried out. Has Turkey carried out one of those promised reforms? Has she even begun to do so? He would be a bold man who would assert that she has, or that the Government of Asiatic Turkey is better now than it always has been—that is to say, the most abominable Government there can well be. One of the stipulations of the Treaty of Berlin was that the rights of these unfortunate people should be duly guarded. But the Powers of Europe have taken no pains whatever to enforce the observance of that portion of the Treaty. Surely it is the part of this country to take the lead. Turkey has been saved from extinction by this country; and we ought to call upon the Powers to undertake these solemn obligations. I hope the House will insist upon laying the case of this oppressed nationality before the Signatory Powers. We have to deal with a Government amenable to no moral influence or advice, nothing but threats, nothing but bringing home to them the sense of indignation aroused in this country will induce the Turkish Government to adopt a policy for carrying out the fulfilment of the solemn obligations they undertook towards their Christian subjects. Whatever view Her Majesty's Government take, nothing but good can come of the declaration in the face of the world that the British people cannot regard with indifference these atrocities recorded in this correspondence. Long has this House been the Court of Appeal for all oppressed nationalities, and when this House speaks in a decided tone its influence is felt all over the world. I trust we shall not be lukewarm in fulfilling the obligations we incurred in the Treaty of Berlin, and that we shall make our voice heard on behalf of these downtrodden Christians of Asiatic Turkey. Their sufferings appeal to the feelings of every human man; they are fellow Christians, they belong to one of the oldest Christian Churches that has stood firm through persecution and trial for seventeen centuries, and surely it is our duty as a powerful Christian people to use our influence on behalf of fellow Christians suffering terrible grinding oppression. I hope the Government will give assurances that stronger action shall be taken than has been taken hitherto.

*SIR ROBERT FOWLER: I hope that the eloquent speeches to which we have just listened will produce a good effect throughout the world. At the same time, let me point out that the proposition before the House is of a very unsatisfactory character. What good can be done by making a small reduction in the salary of our able and experienced Ambassador, Sir William White? It ought to be remembered that our position at Constantinople is not what it was in the days of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. In the earlier part of that distinguished man's tenure of office it was known that England was prepared to go to war on behalf of Turkey; and, in fact, we spared neither blood nor treasure in the Crimean War. Are we prepared to do that now? I have no right to speak for hon. Gentlemen opposite, but I very much doubt if any of them would advocate going to war if the Turkish Empire were threatened. The Turks have a feeling that we should do nothing of the sort. It is, therefore, impossible that the illustrious man who now represents this country at Constantinople should assume the rôle of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. I fully sympathise with the reprobation expressed by the hon. Gentleman opposite at the horrors which are being perpetrated against the Christian subjects of Turkey. But what can be done? Fault has been found with Lord Salisbury's despatch. For my part I think that despatch is a strong one; and it must not be forgotten that a despatch is widely different from a speech in Parliament by a private Member, or even by a Member of the Government. A Secretary of State in Downing Street must in writing a despatch to a friendly Power adopt measured language, and it seems to me there is no want of decision in this despatch couched as it is in a diplomatic tone. I wish to express my full sympathy with the views put forward by the hon. Members opposite. We must all join in reprobation of the horrors committed, and regret that these occurrences are not regarded at Constantinople as we view them. But what we have to ask ourselves is this—If this country is not prepared to go to war on behalf of Turkey, which seems to be the idea of the Turks, how can we hope to have such an influence at Constantinople as we had 40 years ago? As regards Sir William White, he is an eminent servant of the Queen and the country, and we must all feel it is of great advantage to have such a man in his position. Though I have sympathy with the principles enunciated by the two hon. Members opposite, I am unable to express it by voting for a reduction of the salary of this most distinguished man. Still, I hope that the burning words in which those hon. Members have expressed their sentiments as to these atrocities will have a good effect. The proceedings in this House are reported through the papers in different parts of Europe, and I hope this Debate will teach those who are responsible for the Government of Armenia that the feeling of the people of this country is strongly opposed to the barbarities which we have heard described.

Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): As I am one of the very few in the House who have read through the Blue Book, I feel I must say a word or two as to the remarks which have fallen from the two hon. Members opposite. They have depicted the quarrel between the Nestorians and the Kurds as if it were entirely the fault of the Kurdish population, and the Nestorians were not in any way to blame. Of course, our fullest sympathy must be extended to the Nestorians in the trouble they have suffered, but after reading the Blue Book very carefully, the impression left on my mind is that the country is a very wild one, that the whole state of civilisation in that part of the world is very backward, and that there seems to be a sort of vendetta existing between the Nestorians and the Kurds. The Nestorians, far from being the lambs the two hon. Gentlemen opposite have depicted them, seem to be rather a turbulent race. They refuse to pay any taxes, constantly engage in tribal warfare, and appear to be often plotting against the Government of Turkey. This view cannot but present itself to anybody who has studied the Blue Book carefully, including the report of Colonel Obermeyer. On page 71, Colonel Obermeyer says there is no doubt there has been a considerable amount of revolutionary work going on, and that there is a tendency to form secret societies. It is plain that the Nestorian population are constantly plotting against the Turkish Government—at all events, that is the idea the Turkish Government have derived from some of the proceedings which have become public, and I must say that the Turkish Government seem to have treated the Armenians with very much less severity than would have been meted out to them by the Russian Government. I must protest against one sentence used by the hon. Member for Flintshire, in which he said that these proceedings in Armenia were contrived at by the Turkish Government. I do not find in the Blue Book one syllable to support that contention. I would guard myself by saying that I deplore the terrible sufferings which these people have gone through; but it is only fair to point out that they themselves are not altogether blameless.

Mr. LABOUCHERE: I am not quite able to support my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire. I have no doubt that a great many atrocities are committed—I dare say there are atrocities committed on both sides, and that the Armenians get the worst of it. I will even assume, for the purpose of argument, that the atrocities are committed by the Turks upon the Armenians, and that the Ar-by the hon. Members for Flintshire and Northamptonshire; but I would point out that in the reference made by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire to a speech of the Prime Minister, the hon. Member reported Lord Salisbury to have given absolute denials to certain statements concerning the ill-treatment of Armenians, whereas Lord Salisbury distinctly quoted the Turkish Ambassador as his authority, and in no way gave the denials on his own responsibility. Again, even in the despatch which the hon. Member for Flintshire quoted, and in which, as he said, the Prime Minister used words very inadequate to the occasion, Lord Salisbury declined, as then informed, to accept absolutely the disclaimers of the Turkish Ambassador as to some of the painful events alleged to have occurred. As has been said, diplomatic language is necessarily somewhat more guarded than that which hon. Members think themselves justified in using in the House; and it is manifest that if the language of those who are not charged with the affairs of the country were employed in diplomacy the influence of Great Britain with Foreign Powers and Ministers would be greatly diminished. Undoubtedly, as the Member for the City has said, the influence of Great Britain at Constantinople is not such as it was in the days of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. It is not to be wondered at that when this country has stood by without helping Turkey in the time of her greatest need, in 1877 and 1878, her influence should be somewhat weaker in Constantinople than it was immediately after the Crimean War. In making this remark I do not, of course, intend to comment unfavourably on the Government of 1878; but it cannot surprise any one that we do not possess that commanding influence in Turkey which we possessed in the days of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. But, nevertheless, I utterly deny that Her Majesty's Government and its Representatives at Constantinople have not done all they could to bring to the notice of the Turkish Authorities the occurrences which have given so much pain to humane people all over the world; and that they have not used the language which is best calculated to give effect to this country's influence. Of course, those who take an extreme view of the matter think that British influence ought to be used in a very strong and startling manner, and the hon. Member for Northamptonshire has declared that the whole Armenian population in one district would have been massacred but for the resolute attitude of a British clergyman. All honour to him.

*MR. CHANNING: No; I spoke of Consul Abbott.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I thought it was the Reverend Mr. Browne. I am glad the Consul's conduct has the approbation of the hon. Member; but I think it is perhaps too much to say that the efforts of any Englishman, however firm and resolute he may have been, can have preserved a whole district from massacre. The fact is that hon. Members are apt to make two great mistakes in considering this subject. They are apt to view these Eastern countries, peopled by different races, holding different religions, and bearing hereditary hostilities and hatreds, in the same light as they do their own country, or those Eastern countries which Great Britain has long administered. And, again, they think that Great Britain has only to express her wishes to have them obeyed. These are two extreme errors. Any one acquainted with the conditions obtaining in Eastern countries which are not under a thoroughly civilised Government must know that there is a great absence of that settled law and order which enables persons of different religions and races to live together in peace and harmony. Hon. Members forget that the majority is apt to oppress the minority in these countries. When the Government of a country is irresolute, factions break out and occurrences take place which are deplored by all who compassionate the sufferings of others. In Armenia the Mussulmans are the stronger, but in Crete it is the other way, and the late disturbances certainly commenced by the Christians quarrelling among themselves and then turning their attentions to the

Mr. Labouchere

Mussulmans. The feebleness of the Government of Turkey is not altogether her fault. She has had jealous neighbours, and she has been placed by external differences in a position little calculated to enable her to exercise control over her troublesome subjects. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire has said that I have stated that the Porte was sending more vigorous and capable officers to administer her Provinces. Raoul Pasha, the late Vali of Jerusalem, has, I believe, been sent to Bitlis, and he is an officer known to be honest, firm, and capable. And that, like the appointment in Crete, justifies the statement I made to the House that the Government of Turkey are endeavouring to send capable officers to establish greater confidence and to put down the disgraceful scenes that have occurred—which have occurred as much from the weakness of the central Power as from the hereditary hatreds of some portion of the population. I do not believe that the Government of the Sultan looks on these occurrences with indifference, and when it is said that the person who is regarded as most guilty—namely, Moussa Bey—has been received with every honour at Constantinople, hon. Members must not take for granted all they see in the newspapers. Moussa Bey went voluntarily to Constantinople, and will submit his conduct to a competent tribunal, and all persons who have complaints to make against him will have every opportunity of stating their grievances. Moussa Bey lives in a very different region from ours, and his actions must be regarded in the light of his surroundings. At the same time, if he is guilty of the crimes of which he is accused, we hope he will be brought to condign punishment. The Ottoman Government has declared that all persons who have complaints to make against him shall be safely passed to and from Constantinople. I hope the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for the City of London, as well as the observations I have been able to make in the few minutes at my disposal, have shown the Committee that the Government has not been supine, but that, on the contrary, they have done that which, according to their judgment and responsibility, is most likely to afford relief to a suffering population and to protect them from cruelty. I trust the Committee will not agree to a reduction of the Vote.

DR. CLARK: I beg to move to report Progress, with a view to getting from the Government some idea of what they intend to do to-morrow (Saturday). Are we to take this Vote again to-morrow, or is it to be postponed for 10 days till after the Irish and the other Estimates? It seems to me a good method of wasting time to jump about from one set of Estimates to another. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House should take the Votes in their order on the Paper, instead of taking them in this higgledy-piggledy fashion. The right hon. Gentleman should not give way to every hon. Member who urges him to postpone business, but should go on with the business as it is set down on the Paper. I hope we shall be able to finish this Vote to-morrow. I should prefer that we should go on with Class V.; but the right hon. Gentleman was pressed at 5 o'clock this evening not to do that, and he consented to postpone the Class, so that, now, goodness knows when it will come on.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the hon. Member will not move to report Progress. He is as well aware as other hon. Gentlemen that I am under an engagement with the House not to take Class V. to-morrow. I would venture to suggest that the present Vote might be taken after the three hours' discussion we have had. I trust the hon. Gentleman will allow the Vote to be taken. Any question that hon. Members may desire to raise in connection with it can be taken on Report.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: There are some most important questions still to be raised on the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! There is a Motion before the Committee, which must be withdrawn, before discussion can take place upon other questions.

*MR. CHANNING: I withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I hope the Government will consent to report Progress now. I move it. The Government is pledged not to go on with Class V.; but it seems to me it would lead to much greater difficulty to take Classes for which hon. Members are not prepared.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Before the Motion is put I desire to appeal to the Committee as to whether it is not better to take the Vote and then to discuss any question that may arise on Report?

DR. CLARK again rose to speak.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Resolutions [15th August] reported.

CLASS IV.

First four Resolutions (see pages 1362, 1382, and 1385), agreed to.

Fifth Resolution (see page 1400) read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. SEXTON: A discussion arose upon this Vote in Committee, and it was arranged that the hon. Baronet the Member for Cambridge University (Sir G. Stokes), who is a Trustee of the Museum, and others should make inquiry upon certain points raised, and that information should be given to the House at this stage. The House is aware that the files of certain newspapers, the property of the British Museum, were transferred from the Museum to the Royal Courts of Justice, and remained there for a considerable part of the year in the custody of the solicitor for the Times under circumstances inconvenient, and, we think, unfair to the other parties in the case. We have asked to whom the subpoena was addressed; and upon whom was it served, and what documents were specified in the subpoena to be produced in Court. Another important question raised in Committee concerned the conditions of employment of certain gentlemen in the office of the British Museum. We understand that Mr. Birch was one of the gentlemen who accepted employment from the Times; we are informed there was another, and we desire to know his name. We want to know whether these gentlemen are bound to devote their time to the service of the British Museum, or whether they are at liberty to accept engagements from other persons, engagements for which they receive considerable remuneration, engagements which involve large demands upon their time; are they at liberty to accept such engagements, and receive such remuneration without any deduction from their salaries? It must be obvious that in this case these gentlemen, having pledged themselves to a certain view of certain letters, and having undertaken to give evidence, were bound to appear in Court, and to submit themselves to considerable examination, and to very prolonged cross-examination. This would have involved their absence during office hours. We should like the hon. Baronet's view upon such a set of circumstances. There is one other observation I wish to make. The Solicitor General for England stated last night that these gentlemen acted in no partisan spirit; but since yesterday I have had an opportunity of conferring with my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), who informs me that before Mr. Birch received any retainer from the Times' application was made to him on behalf of the hon. Member for Cork, but he declined the proposed engagement, and subsequently accepted that of the Times. That does not look like acting with impartiality. I am obliged to say, and I say it with some regret, that we Irish Members have, in this keen ordeal, this bitter and unmerited trial, which has been forced upon us by our political enemies, experienced from these officials the same spirit of partisanship, hostile to ourselves and our country, which we have had to encounter all through because of the social forces of the past.

conspiracy against us; that spirit of partisanship has been experienced from quarters where, at least, a decent show of impartiality might have been expected.

MR. JACKSON: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer some of the questions about which I undertook, when the Vote was before the Committee last night, to get some information. I will not go into the matters which the hon. Member has now raised, because I am not prepared with the information that will be necessary to give an answer. I understand the hon. Member to say that an application was made to the British Museum officials for their services on behalf of the hon. Member for Cork. I thought that the hon. Gentleman objected to this work being done at all by the officials of the British Museum. However, I will endeavour to answer the questions which were put to me last night. Perhaps I ought to say in the first place that there has been some misapprehension and unnecessary alarm as to what has taken place with reference to the files of newspapers used at the Commission. This morning a very full and careful inquiry has been made, and from information which has been supplied to me I think I shall be able to show that there has not only not been anything irregular, but that every step which has been taken has been taken on the direct order of the Commission, and I understand it is the duty of everybody to obey such an order. I understand that in the earlier stages of the proceedings subpoenas were served for particular files of newspapers. [Mr. SEXTON: On whom?] On the librarian. [Mr. SEXTON: What is his name?] I will give the name if the hon. Gentleman will let me tell my story. These particular files were taken down, but some inconvenience was felt because sometimes all the information required was not contained in the particular paper which was sent for. Therefore, an order of the Court was made, dated the 6th of November, 1888, and it was in these terms:—

“Whereas the Trustees of the British Museum are in possession of certain files of the newspapers called United Ireland, the Freeman's Journal, and such other papers as may be required from time to time, and whereas certain of the said files are now in the Royal Courts of Justice, we, the Commissioners appointed under the above-named Act, do order that the said files be delivered over to the custody of our secretary and his receipt taken for the same, the said files to be returned as soon as we have finished using them.”

This order was signed by the Commissioners and was addressed to the Trustees of the British Museum, and it bore the signature of the Secretary of the Commission, Mr. Cunynghame. The subpoena was made out in the name of Mr. Graves, the officer charged with the custody of the papers. I was asked whether I would state the name of the second gentleman engaged in connection with the letters. The name of Mr. Birch has already been given, and I understand that the other gentleman was Mr. Ellis. The question was asked whether the photographic apparatus of the Museum has been used. I am told that there is no photographic apparatus in the Museum, therefore, it was not used. I ought to have stated that the order of the Commissioners, dated the 6th of November, was reported to the Trustees by Mr. Bullen on the 8th; and, on the 10th November, the Trustees held a meeting of the standing committee, at which they passed a minute to the effect that they agreed to the delivery of the files. The House will thus see that every step taken was taken simply in obedience to the order of the Commissioners. I understand that when the papers were taken to the Law Courts the intention was to place them in a room—the only room apparently available—at the top of the building; that the papers were never out of the custody of the officer of the Museum; that it was found that the room in question was exceedingly inconvenient for those who wished to consult the papers; that in accordance with an arrangement made Mr. Soames placed at the disposal of the Court a room in which certain people were seen, and that every night when the files were left there the room was not only locked, but also sealed. This arrangement continued up to the time the files were taken back to the Museum. I am told that the papers were perfectly available for everybody who asked to see them, and that there was not the slightest intention to favour one side or the other.

MR. SEXTON: Will the hon. Gentleman say what amount was paid to the officials for their services?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir, I cannot; I am not able to do so, because these the hon. Gentleman was proof against that. But it is not long since objection was taken to introducing the electric light into the Museum, and the electric light is not there.

MR. JACKSON: I omitted to state that these two gentlemen did the work during the leave they were entitled to take.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then we have got rid of the official hours argument. I was previously pledged to Mr. Soames. Possibly so. Let us argue it from that basis. I will follow the stream whichever way it flows. We are told that the application of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork to the scientists was subsequent to that of Mr. Soames. Very well. They had already declared their willingness to perjure themselves to Mr. Soames for a consideration. ["No."] They had pledged their willingness to declare on the four Evangelists that Pigott was a virtuous person. I will take it any way you like. Then we come to the point when they are approached by the accused, and I have always considered, in British jurisprudence, that the person entitled to consideration is the accused; but these gentlemen, having pocketed the money of the Times, declined to consider the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork. It does seem to me a very extraordinary thing that these gentlemen, having bound themselves to Mr. Soames, should declare their unwillingness to a Member of this House to hear what he had to say. As scientists, having no view as between parties, they might have heard what my hon. Friend had to say. But no, they shut their minds to that. They said, "We will not hear you; we will not see you or your signature. We have from Mr. Soames a series of documents and are prepared to swear they bear the signature of C. S. Parnell." These gentlemen might have said, "We have a retainer from Mr. Soames, but we are not in the position of advocates." I can appreciate the position of the Attorney General, and should have nothing to say against it if he were not Attorney General paid by the taxpayers. It is the business of an advocate, speaking generally, to urge what can be said on behalf of the client for whom he is retained, and to put his view of the law, in uncertain science, before the Court. But these gentlemen are not advocates; they are gentlemen who are paid by the country as scientists. Yet when they were approached by the hon. Member for Cork, they said, "We have already taken up the side of the opposition." Now, it does seem to me an invidious thing for people in this position to declare themselves on one side or the other. My hon. Friend had recourse to them in his desperation; not unnaturally he wished to have the best guidance. Driven from post to pillar he made every effort to defend himself against unjust accusations. These scientific gentlemen recklessly took the side of his accusers, and knowing what we now know the very name of expert has become odious.

MR. SEXTON: I desire a word in the nature of a personal explanation. The Secretary to the Treasury interposed in the speech of my hon. Friend with the remark that the offer on the part of the hon. Member for Cork to Mr. Birch came after the offer of engagement from the Times. I am informed by my hon. Friend that when the offer was made Mr. Birch made no such representation, and that my hon. Friend is satisfied that the engagement came after and not before his offer.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Looking at this from the taxpayers' point of view it seems to me we ought to hesitate before granting any salaries to these officials. It appears that they are always having leave; they have an exceptional amount of leave; and it appears that they are also very stupid. Before the sittings of the Commission there was the O'Donnell trial, and I presume these experts were consulted in reference to that trial, for the Attorney General declared that he had the best information that could be got in respect to the letters. So I suppose they then did their work on leave. In winter it is almost impossible for the officials of the Museum to examine documents except in office hours, for it is absolutely necessary to do the work by daylight. The Solicitor General has told us that these gentlemen are frequently employed in litigious cases. That being so I am inclined to ask, "When are they not on leave?" It does not seem that they devote much time to the business of the Museum, but in any case they ought not to be paid, because they are so thoroughly stupid as to be utterly unreliable. They did not examine these letters with the microscope as any sensible expert would. I did, and if these experts had taken the trouble they would have seen a white line down the middle of the writing indicating where the ink did not flow over the pencil tracing. It did not require much acuteness to detect these signs of clumsy forgery, but these experts who are paid large sums of money could not see this. The photographs, we are told, were not taken at the Museum, and it is a somewhat surprising fact that an establishment which has to use photography largely does not possess photographic apparatus, but when photographs are required by the Museum somebody outside has to be employed. These photographs were taken by the person usually employed by the Museum authorities, and under the supervision of Mr. Birch and Mr. Ellis. Now, I do not suppose these men were absolute rogues; I do not say that for a moment, but I can only justify them from that imputation by considering them utter fools. When the copies of the photographs supplied to the defendants came to be examined, they were found to be secondary, not primary photographs. It might fairly be supposed that all the photographs would be supplied from the one negative, but that was not so. Photographs were taken from the first photographs and given to the defendants. Hon. Members will see how this increased the difficulty of discovering traces of forgery, because, of course, the secondary photographs reproduced all the imperfections on the paper of the primary photograph, and when they came to be magnified under the limelight it was exceedingly difficult to establish the forgery. Apart from these evidences of folly, it was a great abuse of the position of these officials that they should have gone over to the side of the Times; they should have reserved themselves for an order from the Court. Of course the Times must have gone to them first, for the Times had the letters and the hon. Member for Cork had not, and when the hon. Member did get them he found that the Times had engaged every expert they could put their hands on. It was an obvious injustice. Messrs. Birch and Ellis should have had a true sense of their position as public officials; they should have refused to serve the Times, knowing how their opinion might bias the public mind; they should have reserved their skill, such as it was, for the order of the Court. Under the circumstances, I think my hon. Friends have made out a good case, and I move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

COMPANY (CONTRACT).

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That the Contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, dated the 15th day of July, 1889, for the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails, troops, and stores between Halifax or Quebec and Hong Kong, and for the hire and purchase of vessels as cruises or transports, printed in Parliamentary Paper, No. 263, of Session 1889, be approved."—(Mr. Jackson).

*MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I regret that the House should be called upon at this time of the night, and at this period of the Session, to consider this important contract. The House itself is thin, and Members are exhausted. Of course Government can at such a time invariably command a majority, consequently a contract of this nature never receives adequate consideration. It is brought up in accordance with the Standing Order which requires that the approval of this House should be given to these contracts. I am not making complaint particularly against this Government, because ever since this Standing Order was passed, all Governments have acted in precisely the same way. Now this contract is for a fortnightly service between Canada, China, and Japan.

and it is to cost us £60,000 a year. Perhaps, taking it altogether, there is more to be said in its favour and less against it than could have been said of any other contract which has been before the House in recent years. Two years ago there was a contract approved by this House which gave the P. & O. Company a sum of £265,000 a year, for ten years, for carrying the mails to India and China—the service to be a weekly one to India and a fortnightly one to China. Now, dividing this subsidy in proportion to mileage, this would give a cost of £129,000 for the Indian Service, and of £136,000 for the China Service. I pointed out at that time that £136,000 was an excessive sum to pay for carrying the mails to Hong Kong, because a much better and cheaper service could be had by way of Calcutta. I also drew the attention of the House to the fact that this very mail service, the contract for which is now before us, could be conducted much more rapidly for correspondence to China and Japan than by the P. and O. route. The House may remember that the P. & O. Company are only paid to carry the mails to Hong Kong, nevertheless a large quantity of correspondence has to go through to Shanghai and the Northern parts of China, as well as to Japan. Now, I should like to refer to some information which the Secretary to the Treasury in reply to a question last night gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy in reference to the time occupied by these various routes. He said that the mails to Hong Kong, if sent by the P. & O. Company, over what is called the Eastern route, occupied a period in the sending, ranging from 32½ days to 37½ days, or an average of 35 days, while by the Western route the fastest time would be 34 days and the longest 36 days, which also gives an average of 35 days. But to Shanghai, the Eastern route occupies 37½ days at the shortest, and 42½ at the longest; whereas by the Western route the shortest time was 30½ days and the longest 32½ days, thereby giving a saving of from seven to ten days by this route as compared with the P. & O. Company's route. In reference to Yokohama, the saving was even greater, for it amounted to from 15 to 18 days in favour of the Western route. The

P. & O. Company are only paid for carrying correspondence to Hong Kong, but of course a large correspondence is carried which goes on to Shanghai and Yokohama, and for which the Post Office is paid, notwithstanding which there is a heavy loss to our Post Office in connection with this service, because the amount received for postage is nothing like the sum which the Post Office has to pay for the service. When this proposed new contract comes into force, the loss will be very much increased, because a great deal of the correspondence which now goes by the Eastern route will be transferred to the Pacific route. This will be especially the case with correspondence to Shanghai and to Japan. Indeed, a great deal of the work, which the Peninsular and Oriental Company are now receiving $136,000 a year to perform, will be transferred to the new route, for which we are to pay a sum of £45,000 per annum. I have felt it my duty to draw the attention of the House to this matter. I have made no statement of facts about which there can be no dispute. I have merely quoted the reply of the Secretary to the Treasury given last night to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy. I know that in these days there is a tendency to meet statements of this kind by mere contradictions; because as these contracts are not considered in Committee, there is no opportunity for after restatement and proof; but I venture to say that it is impossible for the Government to contradict the statements which I have made. I do not intend to divide the House on this question, and will content myself by giving notice that I intend next Session to place a Motion on the Paper with reference to contracts of this kind, with a view of having them referred to a Select Committee before they are finally accepted by the Treasury, and thus we may relieve the House of the responsibility which now falls upon it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I entirely disapprove of this contract. I think it is most extravagant and unnecessary. You have already a perfectly good service, and I do not think we want any fresh arrangement. It seems to me that this contract is the

No. 13.] SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [AUGUST 26.

and for the purposes of the management and maintenance of highways, and the administration of the laws relating to public health, the following persons shall be deemed to be County Councillors; that is to say, one representative from a Parochial Board of each parish comprised or partly comprised within the county, and one representative of each burgh within the meaning of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, where the management and maintenance of the highways within the burgh have, under the provisions of the last-mentioned Act, been transferred to the county; and the provisions of the immediately preceding Sub-section shall apply to those representatives."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

• MR. CALDWELL: This Amendment makes provision for the powers of District Committees in counties which are not subdivided; in which case the representatives of the Parochial Board are to be deemed County Councillors for the purposes of the Act, with all the powers of County Councillors. Now I gather that, under this Bill, women may be members of District Committees of the County Council. There is this disqualification, that no woman shall be elected a County Councillor; but there is a proviso that, in regard to the formation of District Committees, the Parochial Boards and certain burghs are to appoint representatives. There is no restriction whatever as to the character of these representatives and no disqualification in the case of women. The effect of the clause introduced by the Lords is that, where there is no subdivision of a county, the persons elected by the Parochial Boards shall be deemed to be County Councillors; and, therefore, the disqualification of women will come in; and the rights of the Parochial Boards in sending representatives to the District Committees will necessarily be curtailed, instead of having extended to them the full rights and privileges of County Councillors in the case of counties not subdivided. I think the better reading of the Amendment would be "that such persons shall be held to possess the power and privileges of County Councillors," because the disqualification does not apply to the original appointment; and the words "shall be deemed to be County Councillors" must be read in regard to the performance of the duties, without involving a restriction that women shall not be appointed. I have felt it incumbent upon me to call attention to this Amendment, but I do not propose to move that the House shall disagree with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, in page 72, line 17, at end of Clause 119, to add as a new Sub-section:—

"(9) For the purposes of this Section, county road clerks and district road clerks shall be deemed to be existing Officers."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I strongly object to the Amendment, and I beg to move that this House do disagree with it. It seems to me to be exceedingly like a job. It will be remembered that the Compensation Clauses of this Bill were regarded in this House with very great suspicion. In my opinion they are far too liberal already; but, according to this Amendment, a new class of officers are to be entitled to compensation. These county road clerks and district road clerks either come under the general designation of officers entitled to compensation, or they do not. If they do, they are entitled under Clause 118 to compensation; but if not, I do not see why we should accept an Amendment which will give them the title.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman object to this Amendment?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes, Sir.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): This is a mere drafting Amendment. There is no doubt of the fact that these officers are in substance "existing officers," and the Amendment has only been inserted to make the matter clear.

MR. CALDWELL: What the Lord Advocate has stated is quite true; but it is equally true that the object of this Amendment is to give these officers a right to compensation; whereas under the Act by which they were appointed they have no right to compensation. In the section which immediately precedes this, it is declared that certain officers, whose offices are likely to be abolished, shall not be entitled to compensation unless they are otherwise entitled to compensation, and this is an alteration which was slipped in from the other side of the House, and accepted by the Lord Advocate. We were taken by surprise, and allowed it to be accepted. I shall certainly support the Motion of my hon. Friend to disagree with this Amendment.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS [REDEMPTION OF ANNUITIES.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved—

"That it is expedient to authorise the repayment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Naval services, and, if and so far as those moneys are insufficient, to charge on the Consolidated Fund any sums advanced by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to the Admiralty for the redemption of annuities to certain Railway Companies under any Act of the present Session to grant money for the purpose of certain local loans, and for other purposes relating to local loans."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS VI.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £260,472, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890, for Superannuation, Retired, and Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities under sundry Statutes, and for Compassionate Allowances and Gratuities awarded by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury."

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy) : I think we have great reason to complain that so very important a Vote, involving serious considerations, which received much discussion in previous Sessions, should be sprung upon us in this irregular way. I have no doubt that the First Lord of the Treasury is anxious to make progress with the Estimates, but he gave a distinct pledge some time ago, which I think must have escaped his memory, that, excepting the Irish Votes, the Estimates should be taken in their regular order. It is particularly unfortunate that this Estimate should have been selected for consideration to-day out of the ordinary course, seeing that the Treasury Minute in relation to the Civil Service, which I believe has been laid upon the Table, has not yet been distributed to Members.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : That Minute has no reference to this Vote.

SIR G. CAMPBELL : It refers to the medical certificates or to the terms upon which superannuation is to be allowed.

*MR. JACKSON : It will be dealt with on the Superannuation Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL : I think we ought to know what the Government intend to do before these Superannuation Allowances are voted. What I want to know is, whether this Estimate contains all the Superannuation Allowances we shall be asked to vote this year? Last year a Supplementary Estimate was presented, and, although we allowed it to pass, it certainly contained items which were open to criticism, and which ought to have been disallowed. In the present case I wish to know if there are Superannuation Allowances, of which we have no knowledge, which will have to be paid out of this Vote? Before we go into particulars, I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will be able to tell us whether it is a fact, or not, that a good many Annuities and Superannuation Allowances have been granted, the nominal list of which does not appear in the papers attached to this Vote.

*MR. JACKSON : When this Vote was before the Committee last year I was asked whether the list attached to the Estimate contained a complete list of all the Superannuations granted and which were paid at that particular time. I explained that the list attached to the Estimate contained particulars of all the Superannuations added up to the November previous. I also explained that it had been the custom hitherto to publish once every three years a complete list of all the Superannuation Allowances, and I was asked whether in future I would not have a complete list published every year. I replied that next year was the year for publishing a complete list, and that if it was the wish of the Committee that a complete list should be published every year I would see whether the wish could be gratified. The list attached to the present Estimate does not contain every Superannuation Allowance; for instance, the allowances granted since the 30th of November do not appear in the list. They will appear next year. As I have said, a complete list will be published next year. I think there is no reason beyond the labour and the cost of preparing it why the list should not be given every year in a complete form.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think it is necessary we should have a complete list of Superannuation Allowances presented along with the Estimate. At present we only know what Superannuations are granted; we do not know whether they are rightly or wrongly granted. We are asked to vote some Superannuations now, and not to know anything about them until next year, when it will be too late. The whole object of the lists attached to the Estimates is defeated, because they are out of date. I certainly understood that the result of the discussion last year would be that we should have a complete list presented with the Estimate.

*MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I observe there is a Superannuation Allowance of £236 5s. to Mr. Clifford Lloyd. Mr. Clifford Lloyd's age is given as 41. He served only 11 years, and received a salary of close upon £1,000. But the Committee know that this gentleman has been employed in the Public Service since this Superannuation Allowance appeared in the Estimate. If I mistake not, Mr. Clifford Lloyd was employed in Egypt since he was supposed to have retired from the Public Service on account of ill-health. Besides, he has been employed in the Mauritius, fomenting, as far as he could, disturbances of a most trying character between certain of the colonists and the Governor, Sir John Pope Hennessy. In the Mauritius he was, both physically and mentally, most active, and how the name of the gentleman can appear in the Estimate as having been retired from the Public Service on account of ill-health I cannot understand. If the gentleman's name appeared amongst the Compassionate Allowance we might probably understand it. I hope it will not appear in next year's Estimate, because if it does, we shall have to inquire why we find Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the Public Service.

*MR. JACKSON: I explained this item to the Committee last year. It is true that this gentleman retired through ill-health. It is true that after he was awarded this Superannuation Allowance his health apparently improved, and he was given fresh employment, but during the time he was employed the pension was suspended. His health broke down again, and, of course, his pension came into force again. I am afraid there can be no doubt that his health is seriously impaired.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: This case proves what I said.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The case was debated and explained last year.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: That is what I was going to say. The pension was granted last year, and yet it appears in the roll of this year. The case makes abundantly clear the gross abuse made of medical certificates. I have no doubt Mr. Clifford Lloyd's health was, for very good reasons, endangered in Ireland, but after he had served in Egypt and the Mauritius, he was allowed to go back on the old medical certificate.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): Is the right hon. Gentleman quite confident this Superannuation was passed last year?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have another case to mention. I do not know whether this was passed last year. It is the case of the Hon. Sir W. Stuart. He has served only 14 years, and he is to get an annuity of £1,300. The cause is represented by a blank. It is not stated to be ill-health: no cause whatever is given. I should like to receive some explanation of this grant.

MR. JACKSON: This Superannuation Allowance was awarded to this gentleman under an Act which governs diplomatic pensions, and the allowance does not exceed the amount he is entitled to.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is that really so? Is there an Act governing diplomatic pensions and allowing a man £1,300 a year after 14 years' service? If so, why is that Act not stated in the proper column? I beg to move the reduction of the Vote by £1,300.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to make an inquiry concerning two pensions which caused a great deal of interest in Ireland—one is the pension allowed to Mr. Cornwall.

THE CHAIRMAN: A Resolution has been moved to reduce the Vote in respect of a particular pension.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £259,172, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Shall I have an opportunity of moving other reductions?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: There are two very large pensions allowed on account of abolition of office in the Patent Office. My impression is that there was some discussion on this question last year, but I do not know whether the pensions were voted last year or not. I should like some explanation of this abolition of office under which two gentlemen in the prime of life receive, one a pension of £520, and the other a pension of £300 6s. 8d.

MR. JACKSON: These gentlemen were retired following a very careful and full inquiry by a Committee, over which my hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir H. Maxwell) presided. The result of the inquiry and the result of the abolition of office has led to a very large saving in the Patent Office, and, I think, to a more efficient discharge of the duties of the Patent Office. I believe I explained the question last year.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think this question was more or less before the House last year, and I have in my hand a letter from one of the gentlemen whose office was abolished.

MR. JACKSON: He objected, no doubt.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes; he did not want to be abolished at all. It seems to me that this is a very heavy burden to put on the taxpayers, but I will not press it further. Now, let me point out that there is an extraordinary epidemic of ill-health in the prison establishments.

I find a long list of gentlemen who, having served only 10 years, are retired, not on account of reorganisation or any change made in prison management, but on account of ill-health. Take the case of the Rev. R. Bullock. He has served 10 years, he has retired on the ground of ill-health, and he has been awarded a pension of £98. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury will tell us how it happens there has been this extraordinary epidemic of ill-health amongst the prison officials of the United Kingdom?

MR. JACKSON: This matter I endeavoured to explain clearly the last time the Vote was before the Committee. The hon. Member will remember that under the Prisons Act the pensions to which the officers who served under the local authority and took service under Government were entitled, were to be apportioned, according to the service, partly on the local authority and partly on the Government. The gentleman whom the hon. Member has mentioned is 58 years of age, and the 10 years represent his services under Government.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I admit that explanation; but the hon. Gentleman has not attempted to explain the extraordinary epidemic of ill-health amongst prison officials.

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): Perhaps I can give the hon. Gentleman a satisfactory explanation. Every medical certificate comes before me before the pension is granted. In all these cases I make most particular inquiries; in fact, a pension is not granted until I am fully satisfied of the bona fides of the case.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have no doubt the hon. Baronet has done his duty, but still he is liable to be deceived. Were these gentlemen examined by a public medical officer?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, all of them.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any pension or allowance paid to G. C. Cornwall, formerly the Secretary to the Post Office in Ireland? He left the Service under circumstances of a most extraordinary character which—

MR. JACKSON: I understand the Post Office pensions do not appear in this Vote at all.

MR. SEXTON: Then in the case of Corrie Condon. He was in Dublin Castle, and left the Service under circumstances of a most unprecedented character.

MR. JACKSON: I am told he has been dead two years.

MR. SEXTON: What is the nature of the information the hon. Gentleman possesses?

MR. JACKSON: I have it on the best authority; but if the right hon. Gentleman wishes details, I will get them.

MR. SEXTON: Can the hon. Gentleman assure us that the payment of the pension has ceased?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I find there has been an immense number of pensions granted in the Courts of Justice. A clerk, 33 years of age, received a salary of £481. He served 11 years, and got a pension of £61. Another clerk, 36 years of age, received a pension of £185; another clerk, 46 years of age, was awarded a pension of £266; another clerk, 50 years of age, got £371; and all these pensions were granted on the ground of reorganisation of office. In the Board of Trade Department, I notice many pensions ranging from £200 to £400, and these, too, were granted on the ground of reorganisation of the Registry Office.

MR. JACKSON: The reorganisation of the Registry Office followed upon the Report of a Committee, and I believe the saving was from £10,000 to £12,000 a year. I believe there never was a better reorganisation of an Office. The work was transferred to another Department, with the result I have stated. Really, if I may venture to say so, unless the hon. Gentleman is willing to trust to the administration of the Department and their desire to carry out the work in an economic way, it will be absolutely impossible to make any arrangements at all or carry out any reorganisation for the benefit of the Public Service. The payments made in these instances are such as the recipients can fairly claim; they are not exceptional terms, large savings are effected, and I am quite sure the work of the Office is economically administered.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am not willing to trust Government officials in the matter, for I know what gross jobbery takes place in regard to reorganisation of Offices. Men are retired in the prime of life, others are promoted, and pensions are created. What is wholly lost sight of is the principle that when a man in the prime of life has his Office abolished he ought to be found employment in another office; he ought not to have a vested right to compensation. I am not prepared to say there is a case for the reduction of the Vote, but there is much in it that requires explanation, and this I hope another year it will receive.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Nearly all the men are 60 years of age, and I do not see how you can take these clerks and settle them in a new office.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: They are all ages, from 33 upwards.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. £7,000, to complete the sum for Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c.

3. £65,500, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I must say I think there is much unfairness in the manner in which Scotland is treated this year as compared with England. England in the current financial year has not only the probate duty but the licence duty, but in Scotland we have the old system of grants.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot raise the question on this particular Vote.

Vote agreed to.

4. £4,005, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Ireland.

*MR. FLYNN: I observe there is an increase of £4,545 in this Vote, and as indicating an increase in the number of pauper lunatics, this affords little consolation to the Irish people. But I call attention to the Vote for the purpose of expressing my opinion that the Treasury would not be called upon to make such a large contribution if asylums had more efficient local control. We have before complained of the want of local representation on the Board. Such quasi representation as there is, is by nomination of the Lords Lieutenant of the Counties.

THE CHAIRMAN: The only question before the Committee is the grant of four shillings per head in aid of the maintenance of pauper lunatics. It is not possible to enter into the question of administration or control.

*MR. FLYNN: The point I wished to raise was that the contribution would not be so heavy if there was more efficient control. However, I will call attention to the subject on another occasion; it is certainly a matter that deserves the consideration of the Treasury.

MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): Has anything been done in relation to the question which was raised last year or the year before as to the boarding-out of pauper lunatics? The hon. Gentleman will remember that strong recommendations were made in that direction.

MR. JACKSON: There have been some communications on the subject. I will ascertain and give the hon. Gentleman every information.

Vote agreed to.

5. £7,658; to complete the sum for Hospitals and Infirmarys, Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: As the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland are both absent it might be convenient for the hon. Member for Dover to give us some explanation of the intention of the Government in regard to this Vote. The hon. Gentleman confines himself too much to correspondence. We should be glad to have a "taste of his quality" in Debate. I consent to the Vote with reluctance, because the distribution of the grant is made upon a scheme settled 35 years ago, and which bears no relation to the needs of the City of Dublin and the relative value of the work done by the hospitals concerned. It will be found, on reference to the list of those who have local knowledge, that it is an antiquated settlement and does not meet the requirements of to-day. It is very well known that the Government have had a Bill on the stocks for some time for a capitalisation and redistribution of the grant, and we have waited anxiously for the effectuation of a settlement. Perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury can now make some decisive announcement? We pay £700 to a draftsman, and I think we may claim some work from him. I believe a Bill has been partly drawn up and that its provisions substantially carry out the recommendations of the Commission on the subject. If that is so I assume that the Bill would pass with general assent, certainly with the assent of Irish Members. I understand that the persons concerned have been given to understand there is an intention to present a Bill, and only this morning I had a letter from a gentleman interested, expressing how keenly the delay is felt. I am sure I may appeal to the compassionate nature of the Secretary to the Treasury, and I would press him to even now bring in the Bill, and I think I can assure him it would go through its various stages without difficulty. It will be a small concession at the end of a Session barren of results for Ireland.

MR. JACKSON: I may say that I had hoped to introduce the Bill earlier in the Session; it is drafted, and I believe just about ready. I will endeavour, after what the right hon. Gentleman has said, to introduce it, and try to pass it, this year. Of course that can only be done if the Bill receives practically the unanimous support of the House.

DR. CLARK: If there is anything that Ireland wants, it is at once given. If there is anything Scotland asks for, it is at once refused. Here is a proposal to grant money for Irish hospitals. What is the claim for Imperial money to be devoted to that purpose, while in Scotland and in England we have to depend on our local subscriptions?

MR. MOLLOY: I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will introduce the Bill. I am sure it will receive general assent. Do not let him be deterred by the fear of the opposition of my hon. Friend near me. I think I may undertake that he shall be taken away into the country.

MR. SEXTON: I am sure my hon. Friend will not take such an unjustifiable course as his words would seem to indicate. I am sure, looking back over a period of 10 years, he will find that by votes and voice Irish Members have always supported the just demands of Scotland,—and the demands of Scotland are always just. Never have we interfered to prevent the allocation of Imperial money to Scotch uses, and I hope my hon. Friend will not pursue a policy so much at variance to that we have pursued towards Scotland, and disturb the relations between Scotch and Irish Members which have been maintained result of pressure which has been brought to bear upon the Government with the view of securing additional traffic for this Canadian Pacific route. I think my hon. Friend was in error when he spoke of it as a fortnightly service. I find on reference to the contract that the sum of £60,000 is to be paid for a monthly mail service to China and Japan, and therefore I am induced to assert that it is the most extravagant contract which the Post Office has ever yet made. Regarding the time which will be occupied by the alternative routes, I think the Secretary to the Treasury must have considerably stretched the matter in favour of the Western route. If he will look at the date at which the Peninsular and Oriental Company have bound themselves to deliver the mail at Hong Kong and Shanghai, I think he will find that I am correct in this suggestion. I fancy, also, that he has only allowed five and a half days for the carriage of the mails across the Atlantic, and he has not taken into consideration the stoppages which are likely to occur there. In fact, to my mind, if this contract is to be carried out in the time he has suggested, it will involve the establishment of a regular service across the Atlantic in connection with it. No doubt the quicker service to Japan will be a considerable advantage, but, after all, it is a comparatively small service, and certainly not worth while our paying £45,000 a year for it. As regards China you have an alternative route for mails, and I do not think you will get them carried a bit quicker than you do now by the Peninsular and Oriental Company. I know we have been told that this new route will be of advantage to us for naval and military purposes, but I ask where does this advantage come in, unless, indeed, we propose to invade Japan, which I hope we shall never attempt? A suggestion has also been made that it affords an alternative route to India. I deny that there would be any advantage in that respect. I think that so long as we retain command of the seas we shall find that the route we possess around the Cape of Good Hope will perfectly well meet all our requirements, and it is utterly absurd and ridiculous to suppose that we should ever require to send our troops by this new Western route. I think the manner in which this contract has been pressed upon the acceptance of the Government constitutes a great abuse of the Forms of the House, and I think it is also an equal abuse that at this late hour of the night, when we have a rule which stops ordinary business at 12 o'clock, we should be enabled to vote away the money of the nation. We know it is quite impossible to fully discuss these matters at this period of the night, and I desire to enter my very strong protest against the course which has been taken by the Government. I hold this route to be totally unnecessary. We know it is not required for postal purposes; and for naval and military purposes I contend it would be utterly useless, unless we ever intend to invade China and Japan, and that I hope we never shall do.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved—

"That the Contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, dated the 15th day of July 1889, for the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails, Troops, and Stores between Halifax or Quebec and Hong Kong, and for the hire and purchase of Vessels as Cruisers or Transports, printed in Parliamentary Paper, No. 263, of Session 1889, be approved."—(Mr. Jackson.)

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS (REDEMPTION OF ANNUITIES.)

"Committee to consider of authorising the repayment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Naval Services, and, if so far as those moneys are insufficient, of charging on the Consolidated Fund any sums advanced by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to the Admiralty for the redemption of annuities to certain Railway Companies under any Act of the present Session to grant money for the purpose of certain local loans, and for other purposes relating to local loans (Queen's Recommendation signified), tomorrow.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after One o'clock.

sion which expires this year. There is the peculiar circumstance that while the Commission expires this year, important alterations will be made in the schemes they have passed, and it is desirable that the attention of the Commission should be called to the effect of the changes that will take place within the next few months in order that they may advise the Education Department before they cease to hold office. The Committee is aware of the changes effected by the granting of free education under the Local Government Act for Scotland, and very important changes will take place as regards a number of endowment schemes. The Act provides that where a scheme provides the payment of fees for elementary education, henceforth secondary education shall be provided in its place, but the point upon which the Local Government Act does not make provision, and to which it is necessary the Commissioners should have regard, is that under certain schemes passed by the Education Commission, there are certain secondary schools which have primary as well as secondary education. It is obvious that some change will be necessary, owing to the institution of free education. Every parent in Scotland is entitled to have his child educated free of fee up to Standard 5. But while this is the case there will be several schools in existence having primary departments, which will be giving primary education at the expense of endowments, performing work that ought to be done by the State. So there will be this position: that the richest man can have his child educated for nothing at a State-aided school, while a certain class of people, foundationers under educational endowment schemes, who are entitled to free education on elementary subjects in schools under State assistance, will be required to go before the Parochial Board for the purpose of getting education for their children in educational endowment schools. It cannot be said that the children of persons requiring assistance for the education of their families should have special privileges over the richer members of the community. To my mind there should be a primary school attached to each secondary school under educational endowment. There are reasons for this which only require to be stated to command universal acceptance. For instance, it is of great importance that the secondary schools should have a foresight of the primary education of those who afterwards come to them. Another reason is, that where the schools are separate, parents, as a rule, when the children leave the primary school, do not care to send them to the secondary school. When the primary school is done with, the chances are that the parent will take the child away altogether; whereas, if the secondary school is attached to the primary, the parent will not take the child away. [Cries of "Divide!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how the hon. Member connects his observations with the Vote.

MR. CALDWELL: These schemes are at present under the charge of the Education Endowment Commissioners. A change has taken place which they will have to consider in order to see what effect it will have on the schemes under their control, and—

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I wish to ask whether the hon. Member is in order in going into detail as to these schemes?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand he is asking for an explanation.

MR. CALDWELL: The Educational Endowment Commissioners have only three or four months longer to work. It is stated in a note here that they will have to advise the Department as to the adjustment of the schemes already submitted, and what I wanted to bring out was, that before the Commissioners quitted office they should have regard to the change in the Local Government Bill, and be prepared with what alterations they think it desirable to recommend. It is plain that the Commissioners are still in office—

MR. JACKSON: They are not paid.

MR. CALDWELL: No; but the work of this office comes under the present Vote. The question is, whether the matter I was referring to comes within the province of the Commissioners. Unless some change is effected before the Commissioners leave office, these schools may be injuriously affected.

Vote agreed to.

and for the purposes of the management and maintenance of highways, and the administration of the laws relating to public health, the following persons shall be deemed to be County Councillors; that is to say, one representative from a Parochial Board of each parish comprised or partly comprised within the county, and one representative of each burgh within the meaning of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, where the management and maintenance of the highways within the burgh have, under the provisions of the last-mentioned Act, been transferred to the county; and the provisions of the immediately preceding Sub-section shall apply to those representatives."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

• MR. CALDWELL: This Amendment makes provision for the powers of District Committees in counties which are not subdivided; in which case the representatives of the Parochial Board are to be deemed County Councillors for the purposes of the Act, with all the powers of County Councillors. Now I gather that, under this Bill, women may be members of District Committees of the County Council. There is this disqualification, that no woman shall be elected a County Councillor; but there is a proviso that, in regard to the formation of District Committees, the Parochial Boards and certain burghs are to appoint representatives. There is no restriction whatever as to the character of these representatives and no disqualification in the case of women. The effect of the clause introduced by the Lords is that, where there is no subdivision of a county, the persons elected by the Parochial Boards shall be deemed to be County Councillors; and, therefore, the disqualification of women will come in; and the rights of the Parochial Boards in sending representatives to the District Committees will necessarily be curtailed, instead of having extended to them the full rights and privileges of County Councillors in the case of counties not subdivided. I think the better reading of the Amendment would be "that such persons shall be held to possess the power and privileges of County Councillors," because the disqualification does not apply to the original appointment; and the words "shall be deemed to be County Councillors" must be read in regard to the performance of the duties, without involving a restriction that women shall not be appointed. I have felt it incumbent upon me to call attention to this Amendment, but I do not propose to move that the House shall disagree with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, in page 72, line 17, at end of Clause 119, to add as a new Sub-section:—

"(9) For the purposes of this Section, county road clerks and district road clerks shall be deemed to be existing Officers."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I strongly object to the Amendment, and I beg to move that this House do disagree with it. It seems to me to be exceedingly like a job. It will be remembered that the Compensation Clauses of this Bill were regarded in this House with very great suspicion. In my opinion they are far too liberal already; but, according to this Amendment, a new class of officers are to be entitled to compensation. These county road clerks and district road clerks either come under the general designation of officers entitled to compensation, or they do not. If they do, they are entitled under Clause 118 to compensation; but if not, I do not see why we should accept an Amendment which will give them the title.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman object to this Amendment?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Yes, Sir.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): This is a mere drafting Amendment. There is no doubt of the fact that these officers are in substance "existing officers," and the Amendment has only been inserted to make the matter clear.

MR. CALDWELL: What the Lord Advocate has stated is quite true; but it is equally true that the object of this Amendment is to give these officers a right to compensation; whereas under the Act by which they were appointed they have no right to compensation. In the section which immediately precedes this, it is declared that certain officers, whose offices are likely to be abolished, shall not be entitled to compensation unless they are otherwise entitled to compensation, and this is an alteration which

There was something suspicious in the fact that the fragment was not found until some days after the burglary. The Judge, unfortunately, stopped this evidence, saying that the button attached to the cloth did not correspond with the other buttons on the trousers. It now turns out that there was a tailor who could have proved that the piece of cloth came out of the prisoner's trousers, but he says it was not torn out but cut out. Either this evidence as to the piece of cloth was true or concocted, and the Judge should have gone into it. No doubt the Judge did his duty as he thought; the men were found guilty, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. They protested their innocence, but no one paid any attention to them, and the thing was forgotten for many years, until a young and rising lawyer took the case in hand. He seemed to have some reason to suppose that these men were innocent and that others were guilty. He put himself into communication with a clergyman named Perry, and I believe that that gentleman did excellent service, and did his best to get at the truth. Mr. Perry seems to have got a confession from two men, and I commend this gentleman for having obtained it, although I must say I think he was rather wanting in discretion in trying to make too much capital out of these men from a religious point of view. He not only got the confession for the sake of the release of the other men, but he paraded the men who confessed as Christian martyrs of the highest degree of virtue. They went about with petitions in favour of the two men in prison; they were petted and fêted, and high teas were given to them, and they were induced to make a formal confession. From subsequent proceedings it appears that these men asserted most positively that they were induced to make their confession on a promise that they would not be punished. It seems, therefore, from their own account, that these men are not such high-class Christian martyrs after all, their confession having, as they say, been made in the belief that they would not be punished. They are very much aggrieved that they have received punishment. They do not seem satisfied with immunity from punishment hereafter, but think they ought not to have five years' penal servitude in this world. These men having confessed, their confession involved the existence of a gross conspiracy on the part of the local police, and it seems to me that there ought to have been a thorough and complete inquiry into all the circumstances. It was within the power of the Judge who tried the case to have insisted that there should be a full inquiry notwithstanding the confession of these men. The Home Secretary only made a private inquiry, and upon the strength of that inquiry he awarded Brannaghan and Murphy £800 each. I consider that under any circumstances the compensation awarded is excessive, and especially so when it was given without the case having been probed to the bottom. A great many people believe that the confession was not a true confession, but the result of a conspiracy. The people in the locality assert that there is not much to choose between the first two men and the second two—that they are all notoriously bad characters—and that it is possible that the hope of getting a portion of the compensation money induced the confession. It is not true that the men who made it were told that if they only confessed they would escape all punishment. It would have been very much better if the Judge, instead of accepting the plea of guilty, had insisted on going into the evidence, and had not left the matter to the action of the Home Secretary in granting a private inquiry. [Subsequently, the Government's method of clearing up the matter was to charge the police with conspiracy and prosecute them on that charge. It is always a difficult matter some years afterwards to bring a case of this kind home to the guilty parties, and again, in regard to the conduct of the police in the matter, it appears to me that in connection with the trial of these policemen there has not been a real and a thorough inquiry. The two most important witnesses who could have thrown light upon the subject were not called—the lawyer who first obtained a clue to the confession, and the clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Perry, through whose means the confession was obtained. Mr. Perry was subpoenaed, but never examined, the prosecution apparently thinking that prejudice might be thrown upon the case in consequence of the religious element which had been introduced into it. I have no hesitation in saying that in the public interest Mr. Perry ought to have been examined, and the whole case gone into thoroughly. The Judge in his charge took a very strong view adverse to the case of the prosecution, and indicated his opinion that the allegations had not been made out. I certainly think a very great injustice was done to the Rev. Mr. Perry, who was not called, when the Judge most plainly cast upon him an extremely offensive aspersion, on the strength of what was said by one of the burglars who came forward to give evidence. The Judge suggested that it was a very great pity that a man in the position of the Rev. Mr. Perry should have tried to extort a confession by the suggestion that if the man confessed he would be relieved from a charge of murder which he was alleged to have committed some time previously. The result was that after the Judge's Charge at the trial, the police were not only acquitted, but were acquitted triumphantly, and actually had an address written on vellum voted to them by the Magistrates. My opinion is that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is probably right in believing that the police concocted the case, which was a very serious one; and it is to be regretted that there was not a thorough investigation by which the real facts could have been made apparent. I also think it is dangerous in a case like this to give a very large amount in the shape of compensation. The moral I draw from the case is that we are bound to entertain very considerable doubt as to the excellence or superiority of our police system and our method of police administration, and, in addition to this, I think we cannot but regret the want of a system of public prosecution such as prevails in other countries. There are certain legal saws which are accepted in England almost as if they came from Heaven, and one of them is that the police system of this country is almost perfect, and I am sorry to see that the amount of prejudice which pervades the English mind on this subject is spreading to our possessions in other parts of the world, and has already manifested itself in India. In former days, the police in India were a judicial police, such as we see in France; but now that system has been changed, and the English system substituted, and it often happens that in cases before the Courts the Judge is apt to reverse convictions obtained by the police. Under the circumstances I have stated, and because I believe the compensation in the case under discussion has been excessive, I now move the reduction of the Vote by £600.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,748, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in his Amendment, because, in my opinion, the whole case is surrounded with suspicion, not only in regard to the men who have been released, but with reference to those who are now in prison. There is a very strong feeling in the part of the country in which the occurrence took place that the boots were taken and pressed into the ground before the casts were made; and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether it would not be well to take into consideration the propriety of releasing the men who are now in prison. It is known that there is a strong feeling on the part of the police in regard to a comrade who was murdered a few months before; and there is a prevalent belief that to a great extent the evidence in the case against the men was concocted,—that, in point of fact, there was a conspiracy on the part of the police, and more particularly on the part of an Inspector, who is now dead. The whole thing is tinged with a suspicion of perjury as against those men who are supposed to have taken part in the murder of a few months before, and who are now in prison on their own confession. I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw the Amendment, and that Her Majesty's Government will take into their serious consideration the advisability of releasing those men before the expiration of their sentence of five years' penal servitude.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not want to press the case further, except as to one point. I do not think the Government are acting very decently in not saying a word on this question. The case is certainly an extraordinary one, and, as justice to the clergyman who has been referred to, I do ask Her Majesty's Government to say there is no justification for imputing to him the conduct which has been alleged against him. I believe there is ground for relieving him of the imputation.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Hallam, Sheffield): The Committee should understand that, at the trial of the policemen, the two men now in gaol (Egdell and Richardson) were themselves called and cross-examined, and they then voluntarily incriminated themselves as to their share in the transaction referred to. At that trial the evidence of the clergyman as to Egdell's and Richardson's confessions would not have been admissible, and accordingly he was not called; and consequently, anything that may have been suggested against him ought to be discounted by the recollection of that circumstance. I am glad that, upon the whole, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell) thinks that the balance of probability is in favour of the supposition that the right result was arrived at.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I only rise for the purpose of suggesting that inquiry should be made by the Home Office into the action of the Magistrates, and as to whether any conspiracy really existed. It is, the whole matter is in a very satisfactory position.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

3. £4,507, O'Reilly Dease Estate.

4. £1,885, Crofters' Colonisation Advances in Aid).

MR. CLARK: I think we ought to have an assurance that there shall be no more money spent in sending out crofters' cottages during the present year.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

15. £4,752,553, to complete the sum for Post Office.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I only heard this morning that the Post Office Vote would be submitted to-day, and I think we have some cause to complain that there should have been so little notice. I shall, however, endeavour to deal with those matters on which I think it necessary to comment, and, in the first place, will direct attention to home matters. Numerous complaints have been made to the Postmaster General with regard to the charge for halfpenny post-cards. These post-cards, instead of being sold at one halfpenny each, are now sold at three farthings. Four years ago, I directed attention to the matter, and the answer I then got was, that the post-cards could not be sold at less than three farthings, because of the expense of the Stationery Department and the large sum that had to be paid to Messrs. De la Rue & Co. Nevertheless, I set to work on the matter, and, after many evasions, managed to rouse public attention to the De la Rue contract, with the result that, not only was that contract determined, but a saving of £40,000 or £50,000 a year was effected. It might have been expected that we should get post-cards at their faced value. The Postmaster General now sells them at 10 for 6d., instead of 9 for 6d.; whereas, in every country on the Continent,—in France, Germany, and Austria, at least,—they can be purchased at their faced value. When I asked the Postmaster General why he did not introduce these cards at their faced value, he said there was a loss on the halfpenny postage, and he could not afford to take that course. Now, I assert that the halfpenny rate does pay, and there was evidence to that effect before the Committee which sat on the subject. It contributes to the three millions of profit that is made by the Post Office. The Postmaster General has admitted that the total cost of the delivery of a letter is one-eighth of a penny, or half a farthing. That estimate has been given again and again by previous Postmasters General; consequently, I say a halfpenny rate papers are now sold at a halfpenny each, and in some cases the proprietors make very large profits. They not only pay for and print the paper, but they are put to other and heavy costs in producing them, and in addressing and delivering them, notwithstanding which they make large profits. How, then, with the enormous sale of post cards that is taking place throughout the country, can the Postmaster General say they do not pay? The halfpenny postage pays in every other country in the world. In many countries the postage on circulars is considerably less than a halfpenny, and yet there is no complaint that it does not pay. The Postmaster General should not, therefore, say,—as he stated in the House quite recently,—that the halfpenny postage does not pay, without being prepared with evidence to prove his case. I asked him, a few weeks ago, what evidence he had to support his contention, and he failed to mention any. There is another complaint about these halfpenny post-cards. Some shopkeepers used to send a large number of cards to the Inland Revenue Office, and get the halfpenny stamps put upon them for 1s. 6d. per 1,000, and they used to charge the public 6½d. a dozen. The Inland Revenue, to stop the sale of post-cards, which had risen from 3,000,000 to 50,000,000, raised the charge for stamping from 1s. 6d. per 1,000 to 2s. 6d. per 1,000, though they had made a profit out of the 1s. 6d. This was an act of greediness on the part of the Inland Revenue authorities. Then, in addition to this matter in regard to the post-cards, I have another instance of the hampering regulations of the Post Office. In every other country in the world you are entitled to put a halfpenny stamp on a plain card, and send it through the post, provided it is of the proper size. The Postmaster General, at one time, led me to believe that he would meet the wishes of the public in this matter, but I sent him a card with a halfpenny stamp on it the other day, and asked him why the regulations would not permit such a card to go through the post, and the reply I received from him, though containing a large number of official words, was altogether unsatisfactory,—to the effect that he could not hold out any expectation that it would be possible to adopt the suggestion. He does not give any reason why the public should not be able to put a halfpenny stamp on a card of the regulation pattern. The Postmaster General does not hesitate to allow enormous circulars to go through the post, without wrappers, for a halfpenny, but he will not allow these plain cards to be dealt with in the same way, though clearly it would be easier for the letter-carriers to deliver small post-cards than huge circulars. Again, it is the practice on the Continent, and in America, to send small book-packets and circulars in unsealed envelopes at the halfpenny rate. This is a much more convenient system than that of cumbersome wrappers, the envelopes are handy and they expedite the work of the letter-carriers; moreover, these unsealed envelopes can be sent to this country and delivered here free of charge, and I know a case where one of our largest booksellers finds it cheaper to send his circulars to America and have them posted there in these envelopes, and delivered in England free of charge, than to make use of the wrappers supplied in this country. There is no argument against this proposal. The envelopes are more easily searched than are the packages covered with ordinary wrappers. I have appealed to the Postmaster General over and over again to allow this slight reform, and though he confesses himself in sympathy with me, he says that nothing can be done. In effect he declares "The permanent officials rule the Post Office, and I am helpless." Then as to re-addressed letters. Letters arriving in England from the Continent may be re-addressed and will be re-delivered free of charge, although the English Post Office receives nothing for the delivery of those letters. If, however, the letter is originally posted in England a charge is made for re-delivering, although the sender has paid something towards the expense of the Department. Another cause of grievance is associated with the illustrated papers. When these papers publish their large coloured plates each copy has to be stamped with the date of issue and the words "Supplement to," &c., to qualify it for the newspaper post. As these plates are in preparation for a long period, it is often very difficult to issue them on the date which has been stamped on them, as some unforeseen calamity may take place, such as the death of a German Emperor or one of the Queen's children, and render the publication inopportune. The effect may be that the Graphic, the Illustrated London News, the Pictorial World, and other illustrated periodicals are unable to publish the number with the coloured sketches, some of which may be of a comic character, the Postmaster General insisting that the supplement shall be issued on the day it is dated or not sent at all. The Postmaster General has told me that he knows nothing against an alteration of that regulation, but that when he consulted the officials he found himself helpless in the matter. These are small reforms which it seems to me a Postmaster General with any strength or force of character would not hesitate to carry out. And now I wish to draw attention to a matter which I trust will not be misconceived, as I do not wish to alarm the public or cause dissatisfaction in the public mind. However, I am bound to call attention to it in order that measures may be taken in time. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question put by me some time ago, said that no less than 335 letter-carriers were dismissed last year for irregularities, and that on an average three carriers a week are convicted of stealing letters. He tried to palliate that admission by stating that many thousands of persons are engaged in the Post Office, and that the percentage of dishonest carriers is small. But when we see that three carriers are imprisoned every week, some of them for long terms of imprisonment, and that 335 officials are dismissed in a year for irregularities, it is plain that there is something wrong which should be remedied by the Postmaster General. I have the greatest pleasure in testifying to the civility, sobriety, and courtesy of the majority of the officials of the Post Office, and I imagine that this large number of defaulters should be decreased. The Postmaster General ought to adopt more stringent regulations as to the admission of men to the Post Office. It may be said that the salaries are too small, and, considering the very arduous and responsible work of these think that not a moment should be lost by the Postmaster General in taking notice of this damaging admission that so large a number of Post Office officials are convicted of stealing letters, and so large a number are dismissed for irregularities. As to the Foreign and Colonial relations of the Post Office, the circumstances are so discreditable that I am sure the House will bear with me for a few moments while I deal with them. I have so often called attention to this matter that the House is familiar with the circumstances, and I will therefore merely read some correspondence which I have had on the subject. I may, in the first place, repeat what for years I have pointed out, namely, that the postage of letters from England to India is 5d., and the postage from France, Germany, Austria, and Russia to India is 2½d. The postage on newspapers from France to India is also considerably less than what it is from England. I think the House will agree with me that it is wise to encourage trade and social relations with our colonies and dependencies, and that, in order to do so, we must certainly not charge more for postage than other countries charge. In April last I addressed the following letter to Lord Cross, who was in full sympathy with me on this matter:—

“ 36, Eaton Square, S.W.

“ My Lord,—In the interests of all Her Majesty's subjects of whatever colour who live in India, and of all at home who have business or private relations with them, I have the honour to draw attention to the scandalous state of our postal arrangements with the Indian Empire.

“ The letter rate to British India from France, Germany, and Russia, is 2½d., from the United Kingdom, 5d. Considering the magnitude of our interests in India, it would hardly have been surprising if the difference had been the other way, and our rate had been half the Continental rates. Again, English newspapers for India and China are now regularly posted in France. One firm in Cornhill saves £1,300 a year by the operation—which is a dead loss to the revenue. In the case of Ceylon, the same British mail steamer which brings newspapers to Colombo for 1½d. each, is carrying newspapers to Sydney, 5,000 miles further, for one-third less, or 1d.

“ This state of affairs, which is on the face of it most discreditable to the organizing power of the English Post Office, has been in England, and especially by India and other merchants.

"I am myself prepared to prove that a letter may be carried from any point of the globe to any other for 1d. at a profit; and that universal penny postage is fast coming within range of practical politics. But without entering into the wider question on this occasion, I have the honour to inquire whether your lordship, in the interests of the entire Anglo-Indian community, does not see some way of insisting that facilities at least equal to those enjoyed by Continental nations shall be granted to Her Majesty's subjects?"

"On one occasion the Postmaster General argued that it was better that our newspapers for India should be posted in France, because, if they were posted at home, increased expenditure would be involved 'for sea conveyance from Brindisi to Bombay.' But under contract the Indian Mails are carried by the P. and O. Company for a fixed sum, irrespective of their bulk. Not only so, but in many cases the newspapers never leave French hands, are carried in French vessels, so that the English revenue receives nothing on the transaction. In the case of Ceylon, it was argued that Ceylon is in the Postal Union. But France also is in the Postal Union, and none the less charges 50 per cent. less for postage to this English Colony than we do. Lastly, the French, who charge 50 per cent. less on Eastern correspondence than we do, spend 50 per cent. more on subsidies to their packet services than we do. The amount voted by the French Government last year for mail steamship subsidies was 25,800,000*fr.*, or more than £1,020,000, as against £841,000 voted for mail packet services by Great Britain. Such facts speak for themselves.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord, your obedient servant,

J. HENNIKER HEATON.

"To the

Right Hon. Viscount Cross, G.C.B.,

Secretary of State for India."

Lord Cross replied, assuring me that he was very sensible of the anomalous state of things to which I drew attention, and that he would view with much satisfaction any reduction in the postal rates between England and India which could be effected without imposing any undue additional burdens upon the taxpayers of the latter country, whose interests he was especially bound to consider. He considered, however, that the matter was one in which the initiative should not be taken by him or by the Government of India. I then wrote to him as follows:—

"Mr LORD,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 16th,
Mr. Henniker Heaton

1889, on the subject of the existing high postal rates to India.

"I am much pleased to receive your assurance that you are sensible of the anomalous state of things to which I drew your attention, and that you would view with much satisfaction any reduction in the present rates. This expression of opinion will materially strengthen my hands.

"You, however, appear to consider that the initiative in remedying the evils of which I complain should not be taken by you, or by the Government of India, and therefore I infer you are of opinion that the first step should be taken by the British Government.

"Before addressing the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Postmaster General on the subject, I venture to take the liberty of placing before you one or two facts immediately affecting the Indian Government and its finances, which I humbly submit may fairly be placed before Mr. Goschen and Mr. Raikes in supporting the case.

"Up to 1858 the subsidy for the Indian packet service was properly charged to the Admiralty, the mail steamers being regarded as an auxiliary naval power. For some reason, however, this was entirely altered, and on the Post Office was placed the whole burden, although the following protest was made:—'The claim that the Post Office should be charged with the whole expense of this packet or ocean service must be considered as barred by the simple fact that few of the mail packets were established either by the Post Office or for merely postal purposes, their expense being far beyond what such requirements would justify. To assume that these packets were really established for Post Office purposes is to charge the Government with the most absurd extravagance. The West India packets, for instance, were established at a cost of £250,000 per annum, though the utmost return that was expected from letters was £40,000, leaving the £200,000 a clear deficit.' (Post Office Report, 1863.) Subsequently a Select Committee of the House of Commons recommended that 'a fair proportion of the expense should be charged to the Admiralty, and that the Post Office should only be charged for the actual transmission of mails.' This recommendation has been ignored.

"When last year a fresh contract with the P. and O. Company was made, a saving of £107,000 a year was effected, making a total of over one million sterling in the ten years' contract. I would ask whether the Indian Government profited by, or was credited with, any proportion of this saving by the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I may say at once that I have failed to discover in any Parliamentary document any record of such credit to the Indian Government, which is still called upon as in former years to pay into the British purse, as its contribution to the mail service, the same amount as was paid before the saving was made, viz., about £63,000 per annum. I maintain that this saving of £107,000 a year would enable the Post Office to reduce the rates for letters to India to the level of the French tariff.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord, your obedient servant,

J. HENNIKER HEATON.

"To the

Right Hon. Viscount Cross, G.C.B.,

Secretary of State for India."

I was then driven to address the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who told me he had sent on my letter to the Postmaster General. The letter was as follows:—

"36, Eaton Square, W.

28th May, 1889.

"To the Right Hon. G. J. Goschen, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer.

"SIR,—I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of the correspondence on the subject of the charges for postage to India and the British Possessions in the East, which has recently passed between the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for India and myself. You will gather from the tone of Lord Cross' letter of 16 April, that whilst he is fully sensible of the importance of the subject, he thinks that as it is one which primarily affects the British taxpayer, the initiation of any reform should not be taken by the Indian Government.

"I therefore venture to address you, as keeper of the Public Purse, and to emphasise the facts which I have so often quoted, showing how unfairly the English Community is treated as compared with Foreign Nations in respect to the charge for postage to India and the East.

"It will scarcely be denied that the freer and cheaper the means of communication between Countries the better it is for trade and commerce, and a fortiori every restriction upon intercourse must operate in a contrary direction. It is surely opposed to all the tenets of Free Trade, that a Manchester or Liverpool merchant should be handicapped to the extent of 50 per cent. in the matter of postage to India in favour of a merchant of Marseilles. Why should we in England have to pay 5d. for a ½-ounce letter to India or China, whilst from France or Germany the postage is 2½d.? It cannot be said that it is done for the sake of Revenue, because the whole amount of the receipts for postage to India amounts to no more than £63,000 per annum.

"But what is the effect of the present state of things? Letters and newspapers are now sent by thousands weekly to France, to be there posted at the lower rate, thus enabling the senders to pocket a considerable sum to the detriment of the English Post Office Revenue, for if the rates for England were reduced to the level of those for France, all these letters and papers would go direct through our post office, and the postage thereon would represent so much clear profit, as the mail steamers being subsidised, it matters not whether they carry ten tons of mails or ten pounds. Therefore, I contend, that from the point of view of revenue alone, the correct policy would be to lower the rates. I maintain, and I am fortified by the experience of the past, that so far from the effect of the postal rates being to decrease the revenue, the result will be a very large augmentation of the receipts owing to the increase of correspondence which will naturally follow.

"I contend also, that every saving effected in the Ocean Postal Service (and the economies of late owing to increased competition have been very great) should be in some measure at least devoted to the cheapening of rates.—Now on the last contract with the P. and O. Company to India and the East, there is a saving of £107,000 per annum, as compared with the previous one, or a total of over a million sterling in the ten years during which the contract has to run; yet I cannot find that India has profited to the extent of a single rupee by this arrangement, though the saving would allow of rates being lowered 50 per cent. and still leave a handsome surplus.

"The Post Office is most unfairly saddled with the whole cost of subsidies to Steam Companies, whereas the Admiralty should pay the greater part of this large charge, the subsidised steamers being in reality an auxiliary naval power for use in an emergency, and they have been actually so used.

"It is only within the last 30 years that this absurdity has been perpetrated, and though a select Committee of the House of Commons in 1888 reported strongly against it, the system still continues, and the Admiralty does not pay anything like its fair proportion.

"Were the proportions payable by the Post Office and the Admiralty equitably adjusted, as they should be, the profits of the Post Office would show a very large increase, and you would, I feel sure, be justified in consenting to a reduction of rates all round, which would satisfy the growing public demand for cheaper postage.

"I would call your special attention to the fact that the French Government pay in subsidies £400,000 a year more than we do for mail packet services, although their colonial possessions and their foreign trade is insignificant as compared with those of this country. For the maintenance of British Commercial Supremacy, it pays us to subsidise our splendid mail steamers.

"The surplus revenue derived from the Post Office now amounts to over £3,000,000 per annum, and whilst I do not propose that any of this should be touched, I think that the public should participate in any profit beyond this by the lessening of the postal rates which are admittedly excessive as compared with those of other countries.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. HENNIKER HEATON."

Now, Sir, I think this correspondence will show that the Post Office is not alive to the importance of keeping up communication with various parts of the Empire, and that it needs to be impressed with the 10. £4,463, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: This includes the Supplementary Vote, I suppose?

MR. JACKSON: No, it does not.

DR. CLARK: I would ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the sum actually spent, after bearing in mind the receipts, on this flummery,—medals, &c.?

MR. JACKSON: The sum actually spent is nil. Last year's accounts, which I have gone into very carefully, show that there is an actual surplus.

Vote agreed to.

11. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,348, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund of certain Miscellaneous Advances."

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I desire to move the reduction of this Vote by £600 on the ground that the compensation of £1,600 paid to Michael Brannaghan and Peter Murphy, the two men wrongfully imprisoned in connection with the Edlingham burglary, is excessive, and that the case demands further investigation. Considerable attention has been paid to this case in the country, and I am sure that if this Vote had been brought forward at any other season of the year it would have had great interest for many Members of the House of Commons. As it is, we are asked to pass the Vote at a time when it is impossible to discuss the matter satisfactorily. I have continually dunned the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on this subject, but have been unable to ascertain why this Estimate has not been put before us until the middle of the month of August. I can well understand that the right hon. Gentleman has been in no hurry to lay it before the House. The Estimate relates to a case not only important in itself, but raising a grave and serious question as regards our police administration and administration of justice. My experience of similar cases has not been small, and I say that my impression is that the matter was not originally one of extreme difficulty if it had been thoroughly investigated. It has never been thoroughly investigated; there have been half a dozen piecemeal and partial investigations, which have only led to the matter being left in greater obscurity than ever. It was one of those cases in which the evidence, if true, was entirely overwhelming. The men who were convicted of the burglary were undoubtedly guilty if the evidence was true. It appears to me there was no middle course—either they were guilty, or the police were guilty of a most foul and abominable conspiracy, and the case is one of the most deplorable that ever came before the House. The Home Secretary, after a one-sided inquiry, came to the conclusion that the conviction some years ago was an erroneous one, and that the men were entitled to compensation. My own impression is that the Home Secretary, seeing how careful he always is to weigh the facts in cases of this kind, is probably right; but, at the same time, I must say that the case has never been cleared up, and there is this extraordinary peculiarity about it, that, whilst the House of Commons is asked to vote this sum in compensation to the men wrongfully convicted, the local Magistrates—including a very distinguished Member who usually sits opposite—seem to share with many others the opinion that these men were guilty, that the Home Secretary has been drawn into a trap, and that the compensation is improperly granted. Whilst the Home Secretary is asking us to grant a Vote because these men were falsely convicted, the local Magistrates have gone so far as to present the police with an address on vellum for their conduct in this case. I do maintain that there is something wrong in our system which renders such a scandal as this possible. The men, Brannaghan and Murphy, were accused of burglary and shooting at and wounding a man and his daughter. There were boot-marks which were identified as those of the accused, and there was an overwhelming piece of evidence, as I think, which the Judge unfortunately rejected. It appears that, some time after the burglary, a piece of cloth was found under the window where the burglary was effected, and that it exactly fitted the place from which a piece of cloth was torn out of the trousers of one of the prisoners.

There was something suspicious in the fact that the fragment was not found until some days after the burglary. The Judge, unfortunately, stopped this evidence, saying that the button attached to the cloth did not correspond with the other buttons on the trousers. It now turns out that there was a tailor who could have proved that the piece of cloth came out of the prisoner's trousers, but he says it was not torn out but cut out. Either this evidence as to the piece of cloth was true or concocted, and the Judge should have gone into it. No doubt the Judge did his duty as he thought; the men were found guilty, and sentenced to penal servitude for life. They protested their innocence, but no one paid any attention to them, and the thing was forgotten for many years, until a young and rising lawyer took the case in hand. He seemed to have some reason to suppose that these men were innocent and that others were guilty. He put himself into communication with a clergyman named Perry, and I believe that that gentleman did excellent service, and did his best to get at the truth. Mr. Perry seems to have got a confession from two men, and I commend this gentleman for having obtained it, although I must say I think he was rather wanting in discretion in trying to make so much capital out of these men from a religious point of view. He not only got a confession for the sake of the release of other men, but he paraded the men who confessed as Christian martyrs of the highest degree of virtue. They went about with petitions in favour of the two men in prison; they were petted and flattered, and high teas were given them, and they were induced to make a formal confession. From subsequent proceedings it appears that these men asserted most positively that they were induced to make their confession on a promise that they would not be punished. It seems, therefore, from their own account, that these men were not such high-class Christian martyrs after all, their confession having, they say, been made in the belief that they would not be punished. They are very much aggrieved that they have received punishment. They do not seem satisfied with immunity from punishment after, but think they ought not to have five years' penal servitude. These men make their confession in view of a gross conspiracy against local police, and it seems ought to have been a complete inquiry into all that. It was within the power of the man who tried the case to see that there should be a full and standing the confession. The Home Secretary refused a private inquiry, and in that inquiry he awarded £800 each under any circumstances so when it was given having been probed in great many people believe the confession was not a true result of a conspiracy. The locality assert that they choose between the first and second two—that they are bad characters—and that the hope of getting compensation money is the main inducement. It is not true that it were told that they confessed they would escape. It would have been the Judge, instead of the men, if guilty, had insisted on evidence, and had not taken the action of the Home Secretary as a private inquiry. The Government's method in this matter was to charge a conspiracy and prosecute it. It is always a difficult matter afterwards to bring a man home to the guilty party. In regard to the conduct of the matter, it appears to me that in connection with the trial there has not been a complete inquiry. The two men were men who could be relied upon the subject were a lawyer who first obtained a confession, and the clergyman Mr. Perry, through whose confession was obtained subpoenaed, but never prosecuted, and no apparent prejudice might be the result in consequence of the

which had been introduced into it. I have no hesitation in saying that in the public interest Mr. Perry ought to have been examined, and the whole case gone into thoroughly. The Judge in his charge took a very strong view adverse to the case of the prosecution, and indicated his opinion that the allegations had not been made out. I certainly think a very great injustice was done to the Rev. Mr. Perry, who was not called, when the Judge most plainly cast upon him an extremely offensive aspersion, on the strength of what was said by one of the burglars who came forward to give evidence. The Judge suggested that it was a very great pity that a man in the position of the Rev. Mr. Perry should have tried to extort a confession by the suggestion that if the man confessed he would be relieved from a charge of murder which he was alleged to have committed some time previously. The result was that after the Judge's Charge at the trial, the police were not only acquitted, but were acquitted triumphantly, and actually had an address written on vellum voted to them by the Magistrates. My opinion is that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is probably right in believing that the police concocted the case, which was a very serious one; and it is to be regretted that there was not a thorough investigation by which the real facts could have been made apparent. I also think it is dangerous in a case like this to give a very large amount in the shape of compensation. The moral I draw from the case is that we are bound to entertain very considerable doubt as to the excellence or superiority of our police system and our method of police administration, and, in addition to this, I think we cannot but regret the want of a system of public prosecution such as prevails in other countries. There are certain legal saws which are accepted in England almost as if they came from Heaven, and one of them is that the police system of this country is almost perfect, and I am sorry to see that the amount of prejudice which pervades the English mind on this subject is spreading to our possessions in other parts of the world, and has already manifested itself in India. In former days, the police in India were a judicial police, such as we see in France; but now that system has been changed, and the English system substituted, and it often happens that in cases before the Courts the Judge is apt to reverse convictions obtained by the police. Under the circumstances I have stated, and because I believe the compensation in the case under discussion has been excessive, I now move the reduction of the Vote by £600.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £1,748, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir George Campbell.)

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in his Amendment, because, in my opinion, the whole case is surrounded with suspicion, not only in regard to the men who have been released, but with reference to those who are now in prison. There is a very strong feeling in the part of the country in which the occurrence took place that the boots were taken and pressed into the ground before the casts were made; and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether it would not be well to take into consideration the propriety of releasing the men who are now in prison. It is known that there is a strong feeling on the part of the police in regard to a comrade who was murdered a few months before; and there is a prevalent belief that to a great extent the evidence in the case against the men was concocted,—that, in point of fact, there was a conspiracy on the part of the police, and more particularly on the part of an Inspector, who is now dead. The whole thing is tinged with a suspicion of perjury as against those men who are supposed to have taken part in the murder of a few months before, and who are now in prison on their own confession. I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw the Amendment, and that Her Majesty's Government will take into their serious consideration the advisability of releasing those men before the expiration of their sentence of five years' penal servitude.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not want to press the case further, except as to one point. I do not think the Government are acting very decently in not saying a word on this question. The case is certainly an extraordinary one, and, in justice to the clergyman who has been liberally treated, and all I ask is that, in the face of the increased subsidy, my constituents shall have the advantages they have hitherto enjoyed.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I am sorry to have to lengthen the discussion of the Vote on a Saturday sitting, but I am under the necessity of stating the facts in relation to a matter I brought under the notice of the Postmaster General the other day, namely, the opening in transit of a letter addressed to me by the Acting Secretary of State for the United States. If the right hon. Gentleman has any of the curiosity as to the contents that seems to have actuated some of his subordinates, I may say that the letter was sent to me, as head of the Dublin Corporation, acknowledging a resolution of sympathy and a subscription in aid of the sufferers by the Johnstown floods. I have submitted the envelope to the right hon. Gentleman, and he, more of an expert than myself, not only admitted that it had been opened, but pointed out that the operation was conducted in such a bungling way that traces of a different gum to that originally used were found on the outside. Apart from the annoyance to myself, I do think that the seal of the Department of State of a friendly Power should have received some respect from the Government official. The Home Secretary said the other day that there had been no official authority given for the opening of letters, but that is an answer that may mean little or much; it is a statement that may apply to-day, but not to yesterday or to-morrow. I wish to ask the nature of the authority under which letters are opened in the Post Office, and the conditions under which they are opened, both here and in Ireland. I am far from regarding the Postmaster General as the chief sinner in the case, and I am, indeed, doubtful if he is a sinner at all. He does not issue the warrants; the warrants are addressed to him by another Minister overbearing his authority in relation to that secrecy to which every man is entitled for his correspondence. But the right hon. Gentleman can answer me the questions, Who issues the warrants; whether the warrants are general or in definite terms; whether they are issued casually from time to time or for a definite period?

Letters have also been opened addressed to my hon. Friend the leader of the Irish Party. My hon. Friend has assured me that his private letters, including a letter from his mother, who is living in America, are constantly opened in the post. Now I can imagine, perhaps, there was some reason for that a few years ago, but after what has transpired before the Special Commission I think our correspondence might be left alone, and that our private affairs might have that protection to which the humblest man is entitled. It is time that this mean and dastardly method of insult should cease. Before the Special Commission my hon. Friend's correspondence for a series of years has been subjected to a searching examination, and I think there are few politicians in the world who could say that after such an examination they would occupy such a high position as my hon. Friend. Not one letter sent, or reply received, was worthy of notice or comment by the tribunal. Similarly in regard to my own letters no question arose. Is this system of insult ever to end? Is it to go on for ever? I should, perhaps, not insist so much but for one circumstance. Although none of these letters were made the subject of comment, still there was a letter not needed for the elucidation of anything relevant to the inquiry before the Court, a letter to my hon. Friend, which was not only opened in the post, but copied, and this copy was afterwards produced as evidence on the part of the Times. The other day I asked for an assurance that if this system was to continue we should be afforded some security against the opening up of false charges upon copies of letters pigeon-holed for years until the writer lost all memory of the circumstances and the original was destroyed. Will any one say it is just or fair or tolerable under constitutional laws, that after years such a copy should be given in evidence when the persons who wrote and received the letter are no longer in a condition to protect themselves by ascertaining if the copy is correct or not? I think I am not asking too much when I say that at least the person whose letter is subjected to this treatment should have the opportunity of verifying the accuracy of the copy and have notice that he may preserve the original. But surely, after the exhaustive examination to which our friendly relations have been subjected, the time has come when we may demand an assurance that this system of "Grahamising" shall be brought to an end. Passing from this, I am sorry to say that Post Office administration has created great dissatisfaction in Ireland. There is one point that may seem small, but it is important to the poor men whose interests are concerned. Town postmen after five years' service are entitled to a good-conduct stripe, which carries with it the payment of an additional shilling a week. But owing to the small number of these badges distributed there are men who have been ten and even twenty years in the service, and have not received the advantage to which, at the end of five years, they are eligible. And then I come to a graver question, and illustrate it by reference to a vacancy that occurred in the Belfast Post Office. These vacancies are filled up to a great extent by nominations by the Postmaster, and even when examinations are held,—and I believe they are often not held,—they are held not by responsible agents of the right hon. Gentleman, but by irresponsible persons attached to the Post Office itself. The examinations are not conducted under the conditions prescribed by the Civil Service Commissioners for the security of fair-play between the candidates. As Representative of Belfast I ask that appointments to the important Post Office there shall be filled up by the healthy system of free competitive examination held not by local persons, but by the Department or the Civil Service Commissioners, under conditions that will ensure fairness in the selection. I have also to complain that, notwithstanding repeated applications, vacancies are sometimes left for a long period unfilled, and I am sorry to add that, during the administration of the right hon. Gentleman, appointments to important and lucrative posts have been limited to one creed and to the supporters of one political Party. It is bad enough that Englishmen should be brought over to fill important posts in Ireland, while Irishmen do not receive promotion in England. The system has been carried so far now that persons who may be suspected of having any sympathy with the popular movement in Ireland are excluded from offices under the Government. I will mention one instance. A postmaster in Ireland, named Slack, died recently. He was not a Catholic, but a Methodist, and he was suspected of being a Home Ruler. He left a widow and two children. The inhabitants of the town sent to the Postmaster General a practically unanimous memorial soliciting the appointment of the widow as postmistress; she had previously been assisting her husband in the post-office. There were only two important persons who did not think it would be an advantage to give the place to the widow, and they were the landlord and the rector. I am informed that the right hon. Gentleman was at first of opinion that the widow was an eligible person, and that the office should be bestowed on her, but in deference to the landlord and the rector, he turned the widow and her two children out of the place, for no reason apparently, except that though the lady's late husband had not laboured under the disadvantage of being a Catholic, he was supposed to be in sympathy with the National movement. I consider this is scandalous, and if it is now too late to remedy what has been done, I hope the right hon. Gentleman may be able to consider the claims of this lady with regard to some future appointment.

Mr. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, East): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any possibility of a reduction next year in the charge for extra-duty Clerks and Inspectors in the Post Office Savings Bank Department? This year the charge is about £8,500 for Clerks, and, including the Inspectors, it amounts to £10,200. I gather from the answers he has given to questions put by me this year that there is no justification for this expenditure on extra duty. The charge has been steadily increasing, and I wish to know whether he cannot employ an adequate staff and so put a stop to such expenditure. I think the Government Departments should, as far as possible, set the example of having as little overtime as possible. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will say extra work is voluntary, but I should like to know how the officials in a Government Department would be treated if, when extra work was required of them, they put their backs up and went home without doing what they were asked.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I wish to draw attention to the treatment of sub-postmasters. These men in Ireland work the same hours and perform the same duties as those in England and Scotland, and yet they only receive salaries of £10 as against £17 paid in England and Scotland. No doubt when the post-offices were established in Ireland men could be obtained at very low salaries, but the cost of living has very greatly increased since that time. They are now being starved, and the right hon. Gentleman is proving himself to be the head sweater of the three kingdoms, inasmuch as he is getting more work out of his servants and giving less money than any shopkeeper in the three kingdoms. I speak not only for Ireland, but for England and Scotland also. Every one knows the attention, the courtesy, and the wonderful efficiency displayed by these persons, and I say that they ought not to be limited to the miserable salaries they now receive. To turn to another matter, I find that a very strict interpretation has been put by the right hon. Gentleman and his advisers upon the rules respecting circulars in Ireland. Circulars are treated as letters if they have the smallest amount of written matter in them. At the same time the orders sent to the Co-operative Stores in London are treated by the Post Office authorities as circulars, although they are nearly all written matter. This is a clear case of a distant part of the country not getting the same attention as London. I cannot think that the Co-operative Stores, which are by no means popular, deserve to be so favourably treated, and I do not think they would be so treated if some of the Post Office officials were not connected with them.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Although the discussion has covered a good deal of ground, I do not think the Department has any reason to complain of the general criticism that has been bestowed on it. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) brought against us several charges which, I think, in almost every instance, had been previously made in this House. I hope he will not think I am treating him hardly when I say I think he is a little ungrateful for what has been done with regard to the question of post-cards. I know that whenever you anticipate that anything you are going to do will be popular, you should be very guarded in formulating that anticipation. I must say, however, I did expect there would be a recognition of the great advantage which has been conferred on the public by the reduction which we have been able to make in the prices of post-cards. The price was 8d. a dozen. We have now reduced it to 6d. for 10, which is a very considerable diminution in cost. I had rather hoped that some encomiums might have been passed on the more convenient multiple that has thus been adopted. It appears to me that the division of the cards into packets of 10, which are sold at 6d. per packet, is a very great simplification of the system. No doubt we still make a charge for material. We are not in a position to present the public with the material of the cards, particularly as we believe that the halfpenny post is carried on at a loss to the revenue. The whole saving, and rather more than the whole saving, effected by the new contract has gone out of the Exchequer into the pocket of the public. The hon. Member for Canterbury still questions the allegation that the halfpenny post is carried on at a loss. That statement was, however, made by the Secretary of the Post Office, who is, I suppose, better qualified than anybody else to express an opinion on the question. I admit it is only an opinion, but I think I am entitled to balance it against that of the hon. Member for Canterbury.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of the Post Office for his evidence on the subject?

Mr. RAIKES: The statement was made in evidence. My hon. Friend was present, and I do not think he cross-examined on the point. I do not suppose my hon. Friend would wish me to follow him into all the details of his speech, and it will perhaps be sufficient if I deal with the larger questions he has raised. I have already replied to his complaint that the public are not allowed to obtain postcards without stamps. I have pointed out that it is necessary that the card should exactly conform to the regulations of the Department with regard to size and weight. Some hon. Member suggested that that objection might be got rid of if the Post Office would itself manufacture the cards, and supply them at a cheap rate. I do not myself see that any great advantage would be derived from that, because you might just as well go and buy stamped cards as buy unstamped cards and stamp them yourself. The hon. Member says we allow circular wrappers to have half-penny stamps affixed to them, quite irrespective of the shape or size of the wrapper. That is quite true, but in the case of circulars it is not a question of shape or size, but merely of weight. The hon. Member has also renewed the suggestion he has made more than once before, with regard to circulars in unsealed envelopes. I imagine that it is possible to carry out such a system in foreign countries in consequence of the lesser volume of their business. The servants of the Post Office in a French or German town are not so hard-pressed in the work of sorting as they are in our great industrial centres, and it is, perhaps, possible for them to give such envelopes the surveillance which they could not do in this country without a large increase of staff, and a consequent large increase of expense. That brought the hon. Gentleman back to the question as to the charges for re-direction which are imposed in this country, with regard to letters posted here, and not imposed with regard to letters coming from abroad. I think there should always be a charge for redirection. If the State is entitled to charge anything for sending a letter one journey it is entitled to charge for a second journey. We are unable to charge for re-direction in the case of foreign letters because we are not in a position to tax the foreigner. If we could, I should be extremely glad to put him in the same position in this matter as the British subject. We are, however, bound by the Convention not to impose on the foreigner any charge for a service which, under ordinary circumstances, I think we should be quite justified in charging for. Then the hon. Member raised the question of the coloured plates in the illustrated papers. I am always afraid of expressing any sympathy with the hon. Member's proposals because he makes so much of it when I do. I will say, however, that I shall be glad to look into the question of the coloured plates again. My hon. Friend laid more stress than I should have expected on the point respecting the 335 letter-sorters who have been dismissed during the year. I can assure him that, of all the duties which fall on me, perhaps the most painful is that of investigating charges against these humble servants of the public, and there is no part of my duty to which I devote more anxious care and attention than that of balancing the charges and the defences in cases of this description. I am always most anxious and ready to take the most lenient view I possibly can in matters of the kind, having regard to the interests of the Service. If the hon. Member were familiar with the archives of the Post Office, he would know that I have not erred on the side of severity. As the Postal Service consists at present of from 110,000 to 120,000 persons, the percentage of dismissals is not a large one. I am glad to say that our Service is distinguished by the best features which mark any Service. With regard to the heavy sentences which have been passed upon dishonest servants of the Post Office, I have lost no opportunity, where I could fittingly do so, of deprecating the passing of such sentences. I was rather surprised the other day to see that one of the Judges of the land had expressed the opinion in a case of this kind that he was not going to be dictated to by any Government Department as to the sentences he ought to pass. I entirely concur in that view, and so far from attempting to dictate to anybody on the subject, I have merely expressed an opinion in favour of a reduction of sentences. We come now to the question of the postal relations between England and India, and England and the Colonies. I do not propose to go into that question much to-day. It is a question for the taxpayer; it is for this House to decide whether the country is prepared to make a sacrifice of revenue and to incur the additional cost of carrying on unremunerative services. It is rather hard that the Post Office should be thought to be determined upon high rates, thereby fettering the action between Great Britain and her Dependencies, as if we had a mischievous pleasure in action of that description. On the contrary, we have endeavoured to do our duty by carrying out the policy expressed by Parliament, that the State cannot afford to make any sacrifices in this direction; and when the House of Commons, representing the taxpayers, comes to that conclusion, of course the Department must give effect to its decision. When the time comes, I think it will be possible to show that a very great number of considerations enter into this question, apart from the convenience of persons who write letters. I can only repeat what I have stated before, that whereas the conveyance of a newspaper to India is an absolute loss to the State, yet the Revenue actually gains, because the newspaper posted in France is carried at a small profit. For the newspaper that goes from England to India we have to pay a tourist rate between France and Brindisi, but we receive postage from France for the completion of the journey; and I think the Revenue does not lose, but rather gains by that fact. Then the hon. Member for Stoke called attention to the question of circulars. The hon. Member for North Donegal also addressed the Committee on the subject of circulars. I frankly admit that the present regulations are full of anomalies and inconsistencies in regard to circulars. There is one main principle which I think should always be kept in mind, that a circular should be general in its nature, and a letter particular. A letter is something which only concerns a particular person, which contains some information or something personal to the individual to whom it is addressed; but the circular is a matter which is common to more than one person, and practically general in its character. I think that is the basis upon which we are bound to proceed. I quite admit that it is extremely difficult to reconcile this doctrine to our treatment of Co-operative Store advices as circulars; but I will make this matter, which is a very considerable one, the subject of careful consideration during the Recess. It is one which greatly interests the Friendly and Church Societies in this country, who have with very great patience and kindness refrained from driving the Post Office into a corner, though they have made constant representations on the subject. Sir, I shall be glad if we can arrive, in concert with the Treasury, at any decision which will enable us to proceed on a plainer and fairer system than the present system, which has been modified from time to time to meet particular demands. The other point referred to by the hon. Member for Stoke has relation to the letters addressed to persons who are about to leave this country by steamer going to South America, or from Brindisi to India. The mails may overtake their steamers. I believe the explanation of the particular case to which the hon. Member has called attention is that the letter was not registered. I think it will be seen that there is a justification for the registration. It is quite true that letters posted in the ordinary course arrive by the same train at Queenstown as the registered letters do, but if the steamer starts within half or three-quarters of an hour of the train's arrival, it would be absolutely impossible to sort out particular letters and send them on board. The Post Office has, therefore, reasonably required that letters intended to overtake passengers on board steamers should be registered. These registered letters are placed in a separate and special van, and are sent on board the steamers, at a moment's notice. Well, then, the hon. Member for Sutherland has pressed me again on the subject of the Highland Railway. I have considered that question, and I am quite sure the hon. Member will see that the liberality to which he referred has been entirely involuntary on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I regret as much as anybody can do the very large additional sum which the Umpire awarded to the Highland Railway Company. We believe that instead of the original contract sum having been increased it ought to have been reduced. Still, I believe that the sum which the Umpire awarded was £30,000 a year less than the Company demand. The hon. Member for Sutherland may rest assured that we will do our very best to bring all the pressure we can to bear in order to bring about a restoration of those facilities on which he laid so much stress. As regards the Strome Ferry post, I have had it before me more than once. I agree with what has been said, that great inconvenience exists in respect of the land correspondence. But the suggestions which the hon. Member has made are of so expensive a nature that we should not be justified in undertaking them, considering the smallness of the post.

DR. CLARK: Do you mean Strome Ferry?

MR. RAIKES: I mean the connexion between Strome Ferry and the places to the east of it. I can only say that I do see the anomalies and the inconveniences caused by the present arrangements, and I will consider them. Then I come to the question which has been brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, namely, as to the opening of letters in the Irish Post Office. I reply, categorically, that no person has been authorised to open any letter in any Irish Post Office since I have been in office. If any letter has been opened, it has not only been without the assent of the Government, but in flagrant breach of the rules of the Department. The Home Secretary has pointed out that no letter can be opened in this country except under his warrant, and no letter can be opened without the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland. "The mean and rascally system,"—to use the right hon. Gentleman's words, which I do not think at all too strong if the practice existed,—I can assure him does not exist. If letters are opened in Ireland,—as they are sometimes opened in England and other countries,—they are certainly not opened by the Government or by anybody authorised by the Government; and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that, however susceptible he may have been to the impression that the Government have taken steps to interfere with his correspondence, there has been nothing done while the present Government have been in power which bears any relation whatever to, or any similarity whatever to, the process described by him as rascally. As to the letter which he handed to me, it undoubtedly appears to have been opened, and I will endeavour to discover where it may have been opened. But I will only remind the right hon. Gentleman that between his own countrymen and the Americans a good deal of interest would attach, as he rather admitted, to a letter passing between the President of the United States and the Lord Mayor of Dublin, and it is quite possible that some—one in America opened the letter—quite as likely as that someone in Ireland opened it. However that may be, I am not in a position to dogmatise at all upon the subject. As to the other letters to which he has referred, they also appear to have come from America, and it is just possible they may have been opened in America. I have nothing to add to the declaration I have now made, and I hope hon. Members will accept it as seriously and positively as I make it. The letters which have been brought to me certainly look as if they had been opened, and I will endeavour to make the best and fullest inquiries. If those inquiries are unsuccessful it will not be my fault nor the fault of those charged with the duty, and nobody will be better pleased than I should it be discovered that letters are being opened in the Post Office if the person opening them is brought to justice.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether the warrants are general or particular which are issued from time to time?

MR. RAIKES: They are certainly particular. That I know. The warrant issued relates to the correspondence of some particular person, and, I think, some particular office too. I have never had anything to do with the issuing of warrants, and I therefore speak with very partial knowledge on the subject; but I will ascertain what is the kind of warrant issued. Reference has been made to the distribution of stripes. I can only say that we award all the stripes at our disposal, and I only wish we had more to give. There is no delay in awarding stripes where they are merited, and the Post Office at least is not to blame if any disappointments are occasioned. As to the appointments in Belfast, the selection of candidates rests with the Postmaster. The examination papers are sent to him by the Civil Service Commissioners and are returned to them, and promotions are made by the Postmaster-General on the recommendation of the Secretary. The Postmaster at Belfast does not make the appointments himself. I will look into this matter in reference to the desirability of the examination being conducted by somebody more directly under the control of the Civil Service Commissioners, and if I conclude that the examination should be conducted in that way, I shall be glad to give effect to that conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman brought some charges, which I hope I shall be able to live down, as to appointments being limited to a particular Party in Ireland. Persons obtain promotion in the Post Office free of all Party considerations. I do not think, so far as I can remember, that I have been aware of any person who has been appointed to any important position for any such considerations. The right hon. Gentleman will be glad to know that the Postmaster to whom he referred was offered another Post office of equal value, which, however, he did not accept. I have no knowledge of creed or Party politics in these matters, and I do not think Party politics run high in the upper branches of the Civil Service. The hon. Member for North Donegal approves of the system of these appointments resting with the Postmaster-General instead of with the local Postmasters, but I think it would throw an With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for East Finsbury, I agree with enormous additional burden upon him. what he has suggested. Our position has been a very peculiar one. We have been awaiting the decision of the Treasury upon the Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, and the result has been that we have not been able to increase our staff. We thought it undesirable to create a greater number of appointments under the old conditions, and before the Government are in a position to bring forward a large and comprehensive scheme affecting the duties of their employés. Though it is a late period of the Session, I hope that hon. Members will now allow the Vote to pass; and I shall be happy to answer other questions at a later stage.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope hon. Members will meet the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman by allowing the Vote to pass. Questions to which hon. Members desire to draw attention may be raised on Report.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I have a Motion on the Paper to which a certain amount of interest attaches, and I should prefer to have it taken at a time when it can be fairly discussed. The Report stage is usually taken at a late hour, when time for discussion is limited. I should like an opportunity to raise, in the briefest possible form on my Motion, a discussion on the subject of Sunday postal labour.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I wish to say a few words on the reply of the right hon. Gentleman to the Lord Mayor of Dublin, in reference to the opening of letters addressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Cork. From my own personal knowledge, I can inform the right hon. Gentleman that letters belonging to the hon. Member for Cork have been opened repeatedly during the last two or three years, and opened in the most flagrant manner that it was possible to have opened them. The fact of the matter is, it was not thought necessary to seal them up again. That I can state as a matter within my own knowledge, and I do so now, deliberately, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. But, Mr. Courtney, the opening of letters has not stopped here, because it would not have suited the Government and the right hon. Gentleman that it should have done so. They have gone further. They have gone so far as to open letters addressed to humble individuals like myself. My own letters, since the commencement of the proceedings before the Commission, have been opened constantly and deliberately, and have been detained in the Post Office for two and three days at a time.

*MR. CHANNING : Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman will grant time for my Motion ?

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 14.] SEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [August 27.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 19th August, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

ELECTION OF GUARDIANS AT LOWESTOFT.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, having considered the Report of the Inspector sent to inquire into the alleged irregularities with regard to the election of Guardians at Lowestoft, on the 5th July, he is now able to state whether any action will be taken in the matter?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board have considered the Report of the Inspector on the inquiry with regard to the election of Guardians at Lowestoft, and have arrived at the conclusion that no valid election has taken place, and their decision to this effect has been communicated to the several persons interested.

THE SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT.

DR. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that a new rule of the Science and Art Department, to be found at page 56 of the Directory of Science and Art, 1889, to the effect—

"That no pupil or monitor in a school under the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland, who has not passed the second examination of the sixth class can be presented for examination or registered in subject xxiv. principles of agriculture," is likely to affect most injuriously the teaching of agriculture in national schools in Ireland; whether this rule is within the powers of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to withdraw or modify; and, whether, in view of the great importance of agricultural instruction in a country circumstanced as Ireland is, where agribulture is the chief industry, he will recommend the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to withdraw the rule referred to and revert to the former practice, whereby pupils who had passed into the fourth class were eligible for instruction in agriculture, making such other arrangements as they may consider necessary to avoid overlapping payments, to prevent which the new rule was introduced?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I find that the alteration in the rules referred to by the hon. Member was made by the Science and Art Department in consultation with the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, and the matter does not appear to be one which has been before the Treasury, or with which the Treasury should interfere.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Did not the Vice President of the Council promise some weeks ago in Supply to re-consider this question?

MR. JACKSON: I am quite aware of that; but no representations have been made to the Treasury, which cannot interfere with the business of another Department.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL AT FALKIRK.

MR. BROADHURST: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Procurator Fiscal at Falkirk is also the legal adviser to the Carron Steamship Company; and, whether Procurator Fiscals are allowed to undertake private practice in cases which may come into conflict with the discharge of their public duties?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am informed by the Messrs. Gair that while, on some occasions, they have acted professionally for the Carron Steamship Company, they are not its general legal advisers, and that in no instance do they undertake private practice in cases which may possibly come into conflict with the discharge of their public duties.

IRELAND — PROBATE REGISTRY CUSTOM HOUSE, BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that the strong room of the Probate Registry Custom House, Belfast, is not fireproof; and, if so, what steps the Board of Works propose taking to have it made so, as it contains upwards of 20,000 original wills and other documents of importance; if it is true that the Board has been informed of the state of the strong room, and that nothing has been done; if it is true that the caretaker's quarters in the building, in which two children have recently died through improper ventilation, have been condemned as unfit for human habitation by a medical certificate, and if the Board of Works has been repeatedly appealed to on the subject; what steps the Board intends to adopt to make the quarters fit to reside in, or if no such steps are taken promptly will the caretaker be provided with quarters outside the building until it is made habitable; and, whether Mr. Travers, the Assistant Registrar, condemned the building in a recent Report to the Board of Works?

MR. JACKSON: The strong room of the Probate Registry Custom House, Belfast, is not fireproof; but arrangements have been under consideration to remedy the defect, and the necessary work will be carried out at once. Complaints were made of the insufficient light and ventilation of the caretaker's quarters in the Probate Office, and works are now being carried out with the view of improving them in these respects.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF MR. THOMAS BARRY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland if it was with the sanction of the Government that Crown Prosecutor Rice attempted to induce the Magistrate who sentenced Mr. Thomas Barry, at Mallow, on 13th August, to three months' imprisonment, not to state a case on the legal question involved as to the application of the Act of Edward III.; and, will instructions be given to Crown Prosecutors not to attempt to throw obstacles in way of the raising of legal questions decided by Magistrates in the Superior Courts?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): Mr. Barry was not sentenced to imprisonment, but was directed to give sureties for good behaviour, and to be imprisoned in default. When his counsel asked to have a case stated, the Sessional Crown Solicitor referred the Court to some decided cases on the subject. While the Government do not wish that obstacles should be thrown in the way of cases being stated for review by the Superior Courts, they are desirous that the Magistrates should be in every proper manner assisted by reference to cases already decided in those Courts.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why should the desire to have a case stated be obstructed by the Crown Prosecutor?

*MR. MADDEN: I understand that a question of law arose as to whether in this particular case there was power to state a case. There was no obstruction on the part of the Crown Prosecutor.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What question of law could arise?

*MR. MADDEN: The question, as I understand it, was decided by the Magistrate in favour of the prisoner—namely, whether a case could be stated under the Act when the sentence was to find bail for good behaviour.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The statute provides that the Magistrate is to determine the case. What question of law could arise?

*MR. MADDEN: I have stated what the question of law was, and also that it has been decided in favour of the prisoner.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman circulate among the Resident Magistrates Mr. Baron Dowse's observations on a sentence of three months' imprisonment in default of giving security for good behaviour?

*MR. MADDEN: It is no part of the duty of the Government to circulate opinions of that kind, or to advise Resident Magistrates as to the mode in which they shall perform their judicial functions.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the duty of the Crown to communicate with the Crown Prosecutor?

[No answer.]

POST OFFICE AT ENNIS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a site has yet been determined on for the new Post Office in Ennis?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I have decided to seek the authority of the Treasury for acquiring the site referred to in my previous answer (27th of May last) for the proposed new Post Office at Ennis; but questions have arisen on one or two points—mainly in regard to the extent of the building—and the matter cannot be finally settled until these have been decided. The necessary inquiries are now being made, and will, I trust, soon be completed. The proposed site is in Bank Place, and is offered by Mr. Michael Rynne.

THE CLONGOREY ESTATE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that the Relieving Officer for the Clongorey district was on 6th August served with notices that five families on the Clongorey estate, against whom decrees for possession of their holdings were obtained at the Summer Assizes, are to be evicted; whether the evictions about to be enforced owe their origin to the non-payment of arrears of rent which accrued due before the fixing of judicial rents; whether Mr. Barrington, the valuer appointed by Judge Darling, the County Court Judge of County Kildare, reported recently that, in his opinion, the rents on the estate should be reduced by 29½ per cent; whether the original demand of the tenants was 30 per cent abatement, and the abatement offered by the landlord 10 per cent; whether Judge Darling, acting on this Report of his Court valuer, asked the agent in open Court at the last Quarter Sessions at Naas to consent to grant the reductions recommended and "wipe out the arrears altogether," and, on his refusing to do so, whether the Judge stayed the execution of the decrees until May 1891; and, whether having regard to these facts, he will permit the forces of the Crown to be employed in carrying out these evictions?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that the answers to the first five paragraphs are in the affirmative, though I presume there would have been no arrears on non-judicial rents had the tenants taken full advantage of the Act of 1881. The evictions could not take place if the executions of the decrees were stayed.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman going to use the forces of the Crown in carrying out these evictions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the support of the Crown will be given wherever it is found necessary to carry out the law.

BERNE LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. BROADHURST: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can inform the House of the date of the meeting of the proposed International Congress on the hours of labour?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Swiss Government have proposed that the meeting of this Conference shall be postponed until the spring of next year, but they have not yet specified the date when they propose that it shall assemble.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Will it be possible to lay on the Table of the House before we separate the Return ordered some time ago upon this question as to the regulation of hours of labour by law in European countries?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not know whether the correspondence is complete, but I will make inquiry. We have received a great many answers.

MR. CONYBEARE.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the doctor of Derry Gaol has reported that Mr. Conybeare is suffering from skin disease contracted in that prison; and, if so, whether he will take immediate steps for the amelioration of his condition?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the affection of which Mr. Conybeare has complained is in no sense serious, and that it has been promptly dealt with.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR: In consequence of the answer I have received I beg to give notice that at the close of the questions I shall ask leave to move the adjournment of the House.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC MAGISTRATE AT ANTRIM.

MR. TUITE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the name of the Roman Catholic Magistrate who attends at Antrim Petty Sessions; at what place and in what Petty Sessions district does he reside, and what distance is his residence from the town of Antrim; and whether he will state how many times during the last 12 months this Magistrate attended at Petty Sessions in the town of Antrim?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received no Report.

THE STATUTE OF EDWARD III.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he has seen the reports in the Cork papers of the 14th instant, from which it appears that two men named James Keane and John Moloney were summoned at the Fermoy Sessions on the 11th instant, under a Statute of Edward III., calling on them to show cause why they should not be bound to keep the peace; and if he can state why these summonses were not brought under the ordinary law?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the cases referred to in the question were heard on the 12th, not the 11th instant, and that the application was for sureties for good behaviour under the Statute referred to. The summonses were issued by the police under the Statute with the approval of the Divisional Commissioner, because, in his opinion, the acts of which the defendants were accused were of such a character as to come within the provisions of the Statute.

MR. FLYNN: Were these summonses issued with the approval of the Attorney General?

MR. MADDEN: I rather gather from the statement made to me that the matter was not brought before the Attorney General; but I will make inquiries, if necessary.

CONSTABLES BIDDING AT MARKETS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the reports of a trial at Fermoy Sessions on the 11th instant, under a Statute of Edward III., from which it appears that Police Sergeant Dallas stated in evidence that he was a detective cattle buyer, and that he was buying cattle in the discharge of his duty; is it compatible with Constabulary duty that policemen should buy or deal in cattle; and, whether such duties are imposed by the Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the case that the sergeant was employed as a cattle dealer with a view to detect persons engaged in an unlawful attempt to prevent the sale of cattle belonging to boycotted persons or raised on evicted farms. It is the duty of the Constabulary to take all proper and necessary steps for the detection of unlawful acts.

MR. FLYNN: In the event of a constable buying cattle, out of what public fund does the money come?

[No answer.]

MR. MACNEILL: Is it not one of the rules in the Constabulary that no Member of the Force shall engage in trade?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware whether it is a rule or not; but if it is it was not broken on this occasion.

REVISING BARRISTERS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the appointment of assistant barristers for revising the lists of Parliamentary voters in Ireland this year, whether he is aware that, in almost every instance, the Liberals who were appointed to the office in the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, were dispensed with last year, and supporters of the present Government appointed instead; and, whether, in making appointments for the coming revision, due consideration will be given to the

Mr. William M'Arthur

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to put the question on the Paper.

Mr. M'CARTAN asked the right hon. Gentleman if he was aware that MR. JACKSON: Yes. I believe it is very much to the convenience of the Department that that should be done.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he is aware that the Land Commission have recently made a new rule requiring certain appellants to state, within 14 days of the date of a notice served by the Commission on the appellant, the ground of appeal intended to be relied on, and intimating to the appellant that if the form sent by the Commission is not received within the period stated, or if the information supplied is not such as to satisfy the Commission, the appeal will be liable to be struck out of the list, and will not be listed again without a special order of the Court; whether this rule is intended to apply to all cases of appeal now entered for hearing; and, whether, considering that an appeal from the Sub-Commission or County Court is considered to be a rehearing of the case, the Land Commission is acting within its powers in enforcing such a rule?

MR. MADDEN: I have not yet received a Report, and must, therefore, ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until to-morrow.

THE TEMPLETON AND HOPE ESTATES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a large number of the tenantry on the Templeton and Hope estates in the Castleblaney Union, have had applications to have a fair rent fixed listed for hearing by the Land Sub-Commission for nearly two years, and which have not yet been heard; whether he is aware that the landlords of these estates are issuing ejectments against these tenants, with the purpose of depriving them of the right to have fair rents fixed; and whether he will cause the Land Commission to promptly afford facilities for hearing the cases of these tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there are 15 cases on the Hope estate and 207 cases on the Templeton estate remaining undisposed of, and which were received at their offices before January 1, 1888. A Sub-Commission sat in Castleblaney last May, and disposed of all the applications from that Union received up to October 29, 1887. A Sub-Commission has been sitting continuously in County Monaghan since last September, and will continue to sit after the vacation, taking up the cases in the Castleblaney district in their turn. The Commissioners anticipate that if the Judicial Rent (Ireland) Bill, recently introduced, become law this Session, the outstanding cases will be disposed of with much greater expedition than is now possible under the existing system, where a hearing in Court is requisite for numerous cases in which the only question to be decided is that of the value of the land, which could be best ascertained on the spot without the necessity of the parties attending the Court. I understand that no ejectments are being issued on these estates, and that no attempt has been made to deprive the tenants of their right to have fair rents fixed.

PORTUGUESE RIOTS AT DEMERARA.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, with reference to the Portuguese riots in May last, in Georgetown, Demerara, it is a fact that the commutation of the death sentence on a Portuguese, named Gonsalves, to penal servitude for life for the murder of his mistress, a woman of colour, was carried out by order of Her Majesty's Government at home, without reference to, or approval of, or concurrence with, the Government of the Colony, and without reference to the Judge who tried the case; and, if so, on what grounds was such an interference with the course of justice decided upon; and, whether, seeing that the serious riots which followed in consequence of such decision will cost the Colony about 100,000 dollars, this expense will be defrayed under the circumstances by Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): This sentence of death was commuted by the Acting Governor of British Guiana, on the recommendation of the jury, who not only accompanied the verdict with a recommendation to mercy, but petitioned the Acting Governor to commute the sentence. The Acting Governor was directed by the Secretary of State to give effect to the recommendation of the jury, and he has not expressed any dissent from it, though the Judge who tried the case did not concur in it. The commutation of the sentence appears to have caused dissatisfaction to the coloured inhabitants of Georgetown, and the riots which occurred some weeks afterwards, and which arose out of an assault committed by a Portuguese upon a coloured boy, may have been to some extent attributable to this feeling. The amount of the expense to the colony caused by the riots is not known, but it will not be defrayed by Her Majesty's Government.

THE BRITISH EMBASSY AT BERLIN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has observed a Reuter telegram, dated 16th August, in which it is stated that the day being the anniversary of the battle of Mars la Tour, in which battle the 1st Dragoon Regiment of the Prussian Guards distinguished themselves by a brilliant charge, the officers of this regiment gave a sumptuous breakfast, at which the staff of the British Embassy were present and took a prominent part in the toasts that were proposed; and whether, in view of the fact that Her Majesty's Government declined to be represented at the opening of the French Exhibition this year, on the ground that the Exhibition was designed to celebrate the Centenary of the opening of the French States General in 1789, and that a difference of opinion might exist amongst Frenchmen as to the advantages secured to their country by the said States General, he will give directions that henceforward the staff of the British Embassy at Berlin be prohibited from attending festivals given by Prussian regiments to celebrate the anniversaries of German victories over France?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have observed a report that Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires and the Military Attaché were present at a dinner given by the officers of the regiment of Prussian Dragoon Guards which has lately been distinguished by the name of the Queen. Their presence was a natural and graceful act, and the fact that the occasion was the annual celebration of the gallant part taken by the regiment at the battle of Mars la Tour gives it no political significance. The heroic conduct of the regiment on that occasion was a feat of arms of which all Germans are proud and which all nations may admire, irrespective of the history and results of the war during which it took place. The presence of the British officers does not appear to call for any special directions.

ENGLAND AND THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has seen in the Times of this morning an extract from the National Zeitung, stating—

"It is believed in the best-informed circles that an understanding was arrived at at Osborne assuring an identity of policy between the Powers forming the Triple Alliance and England in European questions, and making provision for all the consequences of this policy."

I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is anything justifying "the best-informed circles" in entertaining this view?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The article in question is manifestly founded on pure conjecture. Its character is shown by the statement that "the arrangements made with the Salisbury Government will be adhered to by their successors." The reply that I gave to the hon. Gentleman on the 19th ult. remains in force—namely, that the action of Her Majesty's Government in the event of war breaking out will be decided, like all other questions of policy, by the circumstances of that particular time and the interests of this country. Her Majesty's Government have entered into no engagements fettering their liberty in that respect.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that absolutely no communication took place on this matter during the time that the Emperor of Germany was in England?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not know what conversation took place during the visit of the German Emperor to Osborne. It is absurd to suppose that there was no communication.

VENEZUELA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have now received any information with reference to the vessel of a British subject named Philip, of Trinidad, being chased by a Venezuelan revenue cutter, who threatened to shoot him, and made off with his boat and cargo, leaving him in a destitute condition on the uninhabited Island of Patos; whether a Government official sent to the Bocas to inquire into the facts corroborated Philip's statement; whether Philip's boat and cargo have since been sold in Venezuela; and, whether the Venezuelan cutter in question has since boarded and overhauled another vessel while in British waters; and, if so, whether the Government now propose to take any action in the matter?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A despatch has been received to-day from the officer administering the Government of Trinidad which substantially corroborates the statements contained in the question as to the seizure of a boat belonging to one Philip Jacobin, of Trinidad. As the officer despatched to make inquiries had not, however, concluded his Report when the despatch left, it was not certain what had been done with the boat, and the evidence was in other respects not complete. A Venezuelan revenue cutter has also since boarded a Venezuelan vessel, according to the first accounts, within British waters; the master of the vessel is, however, reported to have since declared that she was beyond the three-mile limit when boarded. Her Majesty's Government must reserve any decision as to their future action till they are in complete possession of all the facts. It is understood that a further statement was sent from Trinidad by the mail of the 17th instant.

IRELAND—GOVERNORS OF LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it is the intention of the Irish Government to nominate Governors on the various Boards of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, in accordance with their circular issued last year seeking information for that object?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The scheme is practically complete, and it is proposed to publish the names shortly.

LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF TIMOTHY SHINE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the information of Timothy Shine, published in the Daily News, of the 17th instant, and sworn at Newmarket Petty Sessions on the 16th instant, which alleges that a conspiracy to get up outrage and to murder Shine had been entered into between Sergeant Connolly (who is in charge of a police hut on the farm from which Shine was evicted) and a man named Jeremiah D. Murphy, who supplies the police with provisions; whether a summons was granted at Newmarket Petty Sessions against Connolly and Murphy on the charge of conspiracy; whether Colonel Aldworth, J.P., had previously refused to grant a summons in this case; whether it is intended to have the alleged conspirators tried at ordinary Petty Sessions or under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and, whether, pending the trial, Sergeant Connolly will be suspended from discharging the duties of a police officer?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question was only put on the Paper on Saturday, and I have not yet been able to obtain satisfactory information with regard to it. I hope to be able to give an answer to-morrow.

THE SUCK DRAINAGE BILL.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, considering the fact that any delay in passing the Suck Drainage Bill will have the effect of keeping a large number of people out of employment, of throwing back, and probably rendering useless, some of the works already carried out, and of accumulating interest; and, also, taking into account that the Third Reading of the private Suck Drainage Bill was carried by a very large majority, including the majority of the Irish Members, he will take steps to press forward the Bill dealing with the proposed grant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The delay, perhaps the loss, of this and other Bills for improving the material prosperity of Ireland has not been due to any shortcomings on the part of the Government, but to the vehement and protracted opposition offered to them by a certain section of the House.

STAFF OFFICERS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Colonel Sir F. De Winton now holds the office of Assistant Quartermaster General; whether he is also a director of the Imperial East African Company, which is now advertised and seeks to obtain a capital of £2,000,000; whether the directorship of that company is a paid office; and, whether an officer on full pay, and holding an important State Office, is allowed to accept paid directorships of companies?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My answer to the first two questions is in the affirmative. This post is not inconsistent with Sir F. De Winton's work at the War Office, provided that it in no way interferes with his being able to devote all the time that is necessary for the efficient discharge of the duties of Assistant Quartermaster General. If it ever should so interfere he will be bound to give it up. Subject to this consideration, I should be reluctant to deprive the Imperial East African Company of the advice of one of the few men who are thoroughly acquainted with the district.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the third question—whether the directorship is a paid office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that I cannot answer it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE SCOTCH ESTIMATES.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great inconvenience caused to Scotch Members by the delay in taking some of the Scotch Estimates, the Government will endeavour to arrange that the Classes taken last this Session shall be taken first next Session, so as to allow an opportunity for adequate discussion upon them?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I exceedingly regret that any hon. Member should be subjected to inconvenience by the delay in the consideration of any part of the business. The hon. Member will see by a Return issued this morning that already 42 sittings have been given to Supply. When protracted discussion takes place, sometimes, I am afraid, out of proportion to the necessities of the subject, it is obviously impossible for the Government to make the arrangements which they would desire for the convenience of hon. Members. Under these circumstances I am afraid I am not able to come to any engagement for next Session.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Will the Scotch Estimates be taken immediately after the Irish Estimates are disposed of?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid that I cannot enter into any engagement. There are only four or five Scotch Votes remaining to be taken, and they will be taken in their order.

DESIGNS FOR MONEY ORDERS

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to specimens of money orders designed by Mr. Alexander Downs, Post Office, Monkstown, Dublin, entered at Stationers' Hall, and submitted to the Postmaster General in July 1858; whether any communication from Mr. Downs was received by the Postmaster General in 1880, when the question of postal notes was brought before Parliament; and, whether, in the event of other claimants appearing, Mr. Downs' claims to priority will receive due consideration?

*MR. RAIKES: Yes, Sir; my attention has been drawn to Mr. Downs' case. I find that, by direction of Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Downs was informed, in reply to the communication which he addressed to the Department in 1880, that—

“Previously to the receipt of his suggestion a similar suggestion had been submitted to the Post Office, and that in bringing forward the proposed measures for the adoption of postal notes, the Department did not in any way avail itself of his plan.”

To this I have only to add that I have myself seen letters addressed to the Department long before the year 1858, in which suggestions of the same kind have been made. It is not my intention to recommend any reward to any person for any invention in connection with postal orders.

FACTORY LABOUR IN INDIA.

Mr. JAMES MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India when the Government of India intends to propose legislation in order to give effect to the Secretary of State's instructions for the amendment of the law regulating factory labour in India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; I am afraid I can give no information upon this subject, because no communications have been received by the Government of India since the Secretary of States' instructions were forwarded.

THE INDIAN FOREST DEPARTMENT.

GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith), for Sir ROGER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the great importance of the public interests safeguarded by the Forest Department of the Central Provinces, the Government of India have taken any steps to strengthen the staff of that Department; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State has accorded his sanction to those steps?

SIR J. GORST: The reply to both of the questions of the hon. Member is in the affirmative.

THE ULSTER CANAL.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government, when handing over the Ulster Canal to the Lagan Navigation Company, took any, and what, guarantee (as suggested in Questions Nos. 737-740 in Proceedings of Committee on the Ulster Canal and Tyrone Navigation Bill), that the lock-keepers and labourers employed on the canal should be allowed either retiring allowance or pensions when incapacitated through old age or infirmity, to prevent them becoming chargeable on the poor rates; whether the Board of

Mr. Ravkes

Works have recently received a claim for allowance from a lock-keeper, named Isaiah M'Quay, who alleges that he has been dismissed without pension by the Lagan Navigation Company, after 29 years' service, on the grounds of old age; and whether he proposes to cause the Board of Works to make any, and what, provision for this old servant of the Government; and, if not, will he explain on what principle the late superintendent of the Ulster Canal was provided by Government with a retiring pension of £240 a year, while servants of humbler grade were left with the poorhouse as their only alternative when the Lagan Navigation Company think fit to dismiss them as too old for their service.

*MR. JACKSON: No such guarantee as that referred to in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is implied in the replies given by me to the questions adverted to in Committee on the Ulster Canal and Tyrone Navigation Bill. I am informed that the Board of Works did receive an application from Isaiah McQuay, dated 8th March, 1889, but that, not having been advised of his discharge, they have made no representation to the Treasury in his behalf. The remainder of the hon. Member's question is based on an entire misapprehension, the Superintendent referred to having died before the transfer of the Canal.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Did we not distinctly understand from the hon. Gentleman that before the Government made over the Canal they would see that the lock-keepers and other poor old men were not discharged?

*MR. JACKSON: I understand that the man to whom the question refers has not been discharged.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: He writes to say that he has been discharged.

*MR. JACKSON: That information differs from mine.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Did not the hon. Gentleman when the matter was before the Commissioners assure the Committee that any existing interests in respect of pensions should not be lost or injured by reason of the transfer of the Canal from the Government to the company?

*MR. JACKSON: I should not like to answer a question of that kind without referring to the particular words which were used; but as I have stated, according to the information supplied to me, this man has not been discharged, but has been offered a similar appointment. Therefore no question in regard to a pension can arise.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask if the Government, in handing over this undertaking to a private company in March last, took no steps to look after the interests of their employés?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member desires further information, will he be good enough to put a Question on the Paper.

IRELAND—CASE OF JAMES KEANE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the prosecution against Mr. James Keane, at Fermoy Petty Sessions, in the Cork Examiner of the 14th instant, from which it appears that the following evidence was given against Keane:—

“Sergeant John Dallas, R.I.C., deposed that at a fair at Upton he went to buy some cattle from a man named Kenealy. He saw the defendant Keane, who pulled back his head and winked, and that he understood the defendant to mean that he did not want him to buy the cattle, and called a policeman and had the defendant arrested;”

and to the following Judgment of Colonel Longbourne, R.M., on the case:—

“I consider it a very suspicious case, but there is not sufficient evidence to convict. People should be very careful how they wink in these days;”

and, whether the police concerned will be warned against instituting prosecutions of this kind?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the newspaper report referred to. The observations of the Presiding Magistrate are not correctly quoted. It is the duty of the police to institute proceedings in any case in which a person appears to have been unlawfully interfered with in pursuing a lawful calling.

MR. M. HEALY: In what respect is the report inaccurate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I know, the Magistrate, instead of making a general observation, as reported, made a reference to the particular case.

CASE OF MR. THOMAS BARRY.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the prosecution against Mr. Thomas Barry, at Mallow Petty Sessions, in the Cork Examiner, of the 14th instant, from which it appears that Mr. Rice, the Crown Solicitor, in stating the case, said that there was no charge against Mr. Barry of any offence, but that he had been “associating with persons who were strongly suspected” of boycotting; and that, on this charge, Mr. Barry was sent to gaol for three months, in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour; and, whether he can state what the effect of giving such bail by Mr. Barry would be, and what course of proceeding on Mr. Barry’s part would afterwards entitle the Crown to have the recognisance estreated?

MR. FLYNN: May I also ask whether this prosecution was sanctioned by the Irish Government; and, if so, is it their intention to persevere with prosecutions under this very old Statute?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware of the precise language used by the Sessional Crown Solicitor who conducted the prosecution of Mr. T. Barry at Mallow Petty Sessions. He was called upon to show cause why he should not be compelled to give sureties for good behaviour, under a branch of the law, no doubt ancient in its origin, but recognised and enforced by the most distinguished Judges of modern times. The Government did sanction this prosecution, and will, when necessary, enforce the branch of the law on which the prosecution was founded. The case is still pending, the Magistrates having decided to state a case for one of the Superior Courts.

MR. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second paragraph of my question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think the hon. Gentleman can expect me to express an opinion on a point of law.

CASE OF MICHAEL WALSH.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the report of the prosecution against Mr. Michael Walsh, at Fermoy Petty Sessions, in the Cork Examiner of the 14th instant, from which it appears that Constable Lane, R.I.C., while following a man named Maye, whom he had been told off to watch, met the defendant, who shouted out, "run on you ——." This was said in a jeering way, whereupon the constable caught him and asked his name, and that on cross-examination the constable said—

"If a man refused to give his name it might not be right to 'chuckle' him, but to use necessary violence;"

whether it is a fact that on this evidence the Magistrates sent the defendant to gaol for three months, in default of giving bail for good behaviour, and dismissed a cross charge of assault against the constable, Mr. Longbourne, R.M., in giving judgment, saying the constable was "perfectly justified" in anything he did; whether Mr. Longbourne is a Resident Magistrate of whose legal knowledge the Lord Lieutenant is satisfied; and whether it is the law in Ireland that if a person refuses to give his name to a

MR. M. HEALY: Is it not the fact that the constable admitted his violence to the man?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen any report to that effect. It is not consistent with the information given to me.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION (WALES) ACT.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will enable the Charity Commissioners to make inquiries into the endowments available for the purposes of the Intermediate and Technical Education (Wales) Act; and if so whether the work can be undertaken without delay?

*MR. JACKSON: The Treasury is awaiting a Report from the Charity Commissioners as to the actual advantages derived from the inquiry in one part of Wales which is now being held. Until that Report has been received the Treasury will not be in a position to decide whether the inquiry should be but I cannot undertake to make it the first Order.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Is it intended to proceed with the London County Council (Money) Bill to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the proceedings on the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill, if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order 'Sittings of the House.'"—
(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 41.—(Div. List, No. 318.)

MOTIONS.

CAITHNESS AND SUTHERLAND (EDUCATION GRANTS).

On Motion of the Lord Advocate, Bill to amend the Law in regard to Annual Parliamentary Grants in the Counties of Caithness and Sutherland, ordered to be brought in by the Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 384.]

SUPERANNUATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to amend the Acts relating to Pensions, Compensations, Allowances, and Gratuities to be made to persons in respect of having held office in the Public Service, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 385.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL (No. 378.)

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now considered."

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): I beg to move as an Amendment "That Standing Order 50 be suspended—that the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House." I regret the necessity of having to make this Motion at all, because it will be necessary to trouble the House with some of the Amendments which ought to have been decided in the Committee. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no fault to find with the Chairman of the Committee, although I do object to the manner in which he treated the Amendments. I would ask the House to examine the difference between the Bill as it now comes before the House and as it was introduced. It has been reduced from a Bill divided into two parts and 46 clauses into a Bill containing only one part and nine clauses. Those features of the Bill upon which the Chief Secretary laid the most stress in moving the Second Reading have disappeared altogether. In fact, the changes made are almost as great as those effected in the Tithes Bill. The Bill is, in truth, a new and distinct one. It looks as though measures may be smuggled through the House without discussion at all. As the Bill was originally framed it introduced a principle for the establishment of which in Ireland I would gladly make large sacrifices—namely, the right of popular control over the expenditure of public money. That principle has vanished from the Bill. Then, the House were assured that most of the money would be advanced to Railway Companies grant for the good of Ireland in compensation for the wrongs she has suffered in the past. But when I remember that of the 28 millions advanced to Ireland scarcely one-fourth has been productive of any real good to that country, I cannot but fear that the result will be most demoralising if this Bill passes in its present form. I think, therefore, that at this late period of the Session the Government will do well to withdraw the Bill and wait till another year. I protest against the course which has been taken, and beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now considered," in order to add the words "re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House,"—(Mr. Handel Cosham),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'now considered' stand part of the Question."

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): As a Member of the Grand Committee on Trade who considered this Bill, I rise to support the Amendment. My experience of that Committee has convinced me that the Bill ought not to have been referred to that Committee at all. I went into the Committee with no preconceived hostility to the measure; on the contrary, I viewed it with a certain amount of sympathy. But it did not take me long to discover that the Bill was distinctly political and of a highly contentious character. The House will be astounded at the amount of change which has been introduced into the Bill. As originally introduced the Bill consisted of two parts. Part I. gave direct aid to Railway Companies, and Part II. contained special protective clauses with respect to promoters. Part II. has altogether disappeared. If that alone had happened there would not have been much to complain of, but the promoter for whom Part II. was intended has not disappeared, but has simply been transferred from Part II. to Part I. And the kind of aid which was, in the first instance, intended only for the Railway Companies is now to be given to the promoter, without any of the securities and safeguards which were originally provided. Besides this, we complain that this change has been effected without any real discussion in the Grand Committee. Fully one-third of the Committee felt obliged in the middle of the discussion of Clause 4 to withdraw in consequence of the rules laid down by the Chairman as to what Amendments were admissible and what not. Thus 16 pages of Amendments were passed over. That would be a sufficient reason for the formal re-committal of the Bill. The Chairman laid down Rules of Procedure which made discussion absolutely impossible. The Chairman refused to entertain any Amendment which, in his opinion, was hostile to the principle of the Bill. On one occasion he refused an Amendment because, in his opinion, it was not a fair and reasonable one. Then the Chairman would not allow discussion of any of the clauses as a whole. I am, however, bound to admit that on other occasions the Chairman allowed a certain latitude. On one occasion he put an Amendment to the Committee which, if carried, would have left the Bill in this position—"That Clause 3 shall apply to railways only, but the Committee decline to consider the Light Railways Bill further." At all events, the remarkable line of ruling adopted by the Chairman had the effect of which we complain; it drove one-third of the Committee from the room; it brought about the excision, without discussion, of four-fifths of the Bill as it was sent to the Committee, and it has caused to be presented to the House a Bill entirely different in character and scope from that which the Committee was appointed to consider. Besides that, I have to complain of the surreptitious way in which the Government brought about this change in the structure and character of the measure. This immense revolution was effected in the most quiet and unobtrusive way by an apparently harmless Amendment, moved without remark and accepted without observation by the Members of the Committee who represented the Government. The new Bill contains on the face of it a monument of what I may call the duplicity of Her Majesty's Government with regard to this Bill. The Amendment to which I refer was an Amendment to introduce in Clause 3 promoters whose case was provided for in Part II. Constantly we asked the Representatives of the Government, "Do you intend Part II. to be cut out of the Bill;" but we could get no information from the Solicitor General for Ireland on the point. We continued the discussion as if Part II. was to remain an essential part of the Bill. The monument as to the character of the Government's proceeding is to be found in Clause 2, Subsection 2, which now says that—

"The Lord Lieutenant, by Order in Council, may from time to time declare . . . that the Provisions of Part I and II. of this Act shall be applicable to such Light Railways . . . but the provisions of Part I. and II. of this Act shall not apply except to the Light Railways specified in such Order in Council aforesaid."

The complaint I make is that we were allowed to discuss Clause 2 on the theory that Part II. was to remain an essential part of the Bill, and that now Part II. has disappeared altogether from the Bill. I make no imputation whatever upon the Chairman of the Grand Committee. I believe he intended to be fair, and to do what he thought was best in the interest of the House and of the Bill. We only complain of an enormous error of judgment on his part, which has resulted in the proceedings of the Committee having become entirely nugatory, and in a serious blow having been dealt at the Grand Committee system. We do not say there is an appeal from the Grand Committee to this House, and we do not ask the House to pass a resolution condemning the Committee as a whole, or the majority of the Committee, or the Chairman. But we say there has been committed a mistake which this House is bound in fairness and in justice to all parties to rectify. There is a great deal more than the fate of this Bill involved. It appears to me that to some extent the future of the Grand Committee system is involved. I have never been strongly in favour of the system, otherwise than as accompanied by the most stringent securities and guarantees. I believe those securities and guarantees have been evaded, and evaded by what has taken place in Committee on this Bill; and I believe that if the Chairmen of other Grand Committees followed the course adopted in this case the Grand Committee system would completely break down. It would be absolutely fatal to the system if, for instance, the theory became established that it is the duty of the Chairman of a Standing Committee to push through the Bill that is before the Committee. That unquestionably was the theory which was at work in respect to this Bill. The system in the United States makes the Chairman absolute master of the Bills in his Committee, but I do not think this House would stand any such assumption of authority on the part of the Chairman of a Grand Committee. I should like, in support of the position we have taken up, to allude to the opinions formerly expressed in the House on this subject by two Members, each of them of high personal besides official authority. The First Lord of the Treasury will remember that in 1883 he expressed a very guarded and reluctant assent to the establishment of the Grand Committee system, and I know, by reference to his speeches, that if there was one point more than another in which he asked and obtained a pledge from the Government of the Day, it was that only non-contentious business should be sent to Grand Committees. There never was a more contentious Bill submitted to the House than this. The other Gentleman to whom I refer is the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Whitbread), whose authority on matters of procedure is unequalled amongst the ordinary Members of the House. That hon. Member, who was a supporter of the Grand Committee system, laid down the principle that the system could never be expected or desired to succeed unless discussion in the Standing Committee was to be as absolutely free as it is in Committee of the Whole House. Can it be contended that the discussion on this Bill in Grand Committee was as free as it will be if the Motion of my hon. Friend is accepted? I have much pleasure in supporting the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill.

**Mr. BIGGAR (Oavan)*: I have not had much experience of the proceedings of Grand Committees, but from the little experience I have of them I am inclined to agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundee. I have had much experience of the workings of Committees of the Whole House, and I must say I never saw the slightest attempt to conduct a Bill in Committee of the Whole House as this Bill was conducted in Grand Committee. I have no doubt the Chairman of the Committee acted within his lights, but unfortunately, his lights were not very bright. A mad sheep is supposed to be as dangerous an animal as there is. I will make an appeal to the Government. I suppose they are desirous that this Bill shall be as efficient as possible. I suppose that, so far as the original Bill was concerned, they thought they had drawn a Bill which would not give rise to much complaint either on the one side or the other; but I must confess that the Bill which has come from the Grand Committee is of an entirely different nature. In introducing the Bill the Chief Secretary for Ireland said it was intended that no part of a barony should be taxed under the Bill unless it got substantial benefit from the outlay. But in the Bill as it now stands the baronies lose the advantage of that provision. The same remark applies to many other provisions. What has occurred is this: we have got now a Bill sent back to this House which not only takes away all these safeguards and restraints on the cupidity of promoters, but deals much more liberally with ordinary promoters than with railway companies, although railway companies in many instances in Ireland would be able to fulfil any contract they might enter into. The promoters have full authority to go ahead though they may not be substantial people. Notwithstanding that railway companies are able to pay dividends and can show a tolerably large surplus after paying working expenses you impose stringent regulations on them, whilst you give promoters who may be of a remarkably shady character an entirely free hand. Nothing could better serve the purpose of the opponents of the Bill than its passing in its present form, because the promoters will be sure to be disgraced. If the Bill were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, I cannot see that its passage into law would be longer deferred than if the Government insist on pressing it forward just as it is.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The question, as I understand it, now before the House is not so much the merits and principles of this Bill, as whether the House shall take the course suggested by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. Cossham). I think it will be at once admitted that the course suggested is a most unusual one. It is not going too far to say it is absolutely contrary to the intention of the House in appointing these Standing Committees. It is obvious that the intention of the House in appointing Standing Committees is that the Bills referred to them shall be dealt with as in Committee of the whole House, and that when the Bills have been reported to the House nothing more than the ordinary proceedings on Report stage should take place. I think even hon. Members opposite will admit that there must be exceptional circumstances to justify a Motion for the re-committal to a Committee of the Whole House of a Bill which has been dealt with by a Standing Committee. What are the special circumstances of this case? It has been argued that the Bill has been entirely changed and that it is practically now a new Bill; that in consequence of the alteration made on the Motion of the hon. Member for Dublin great opposition to the Bill originated in the Committee; and that, owing to certain rulings of the Chairman of the Committee, Amendments which arose from that opposition could not be moved and considered in the Standing Committee. What are the facts of the case? I will refer to the provisions of the Act of 1883, under which the Treasury was permitted to guarantee a dividend in connection with tramways or light railways. The Act of 1883 allowed the Treasury to guarantee a certain amount per annum, not exceeding half the amount guaranteed by the counties or baronies, and not exceeding 2 per cent, by way of repayment to the counties or baronies of part of the dividend guaranteed by them to the tramway company under the provisions of that Act.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): It was a provisional guarantee.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No doubt it was. It was purely a provisional guarantee; and what has been the result? I will venture to say that if Parliament, when the Act of 1883 was passed, could have anticipated to what extent that provision would have failed, something more would have been done at that time. It has obviously failed, because only a small proportion of the annual sum which the Act of 1883 allowed the Treasury to guarantee has been guaranteed, though the object of the Act was, of course, that the full guarantee should be utilised in extending to the more remote and to the poorer parts of Ireland the benefits of the communication which the Act was intended to establish. Therefore the Government had proposed, in the Bill now before the House, to alter the system under which these Treasury guarantees were given. Why did that system fail? Mainly because it was an indirect guarantee. It was not so good or so marketable a security as if the Treasury had been permitted to give the guarantee directly. What is the proposal now before the House? In the first part of the Bill the Treasury were empowered to grant assistance to an existing railway company towards the construction of light railways by way of a free grant, a loan, or an annual payment. That assistance was to be direct. What was the further proposal of the Bill? In Part II. it was proposed that promoters, in other words a public company promoting a light railway, should also have direct assistance.

MR. CHANCE: By way of annual guarantee.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, by way of an annual guarantee not exceeding 3 per cent, and the Standing Committee to which this Bill was referred have made this alteration in that proposal, that they have allowed the Treasury not merely to guarantee an annual sum not exceeding 3 per cent to a public company promoting such a railway under the provisions of the Act of 1883, but also to assist by way of free grants or by way of loans. What is this enormous change which has thus been made by the Standing Committee? Hon. Members should reflect that the Treasury can borrow money at less than 3 per cent, and that, therefore, in allowing the Treasury to give a guarantee of annual interest of 3 per cent, the Bill had originally proposed to do in reality more than was provided by the Standing Committee. Is it the fact that this change in the Bill originated the opposition by which the measure has been met? If hon. Members refer to the dry records of the proceedings of the Standing Committee they will see the way in which the Bill was met long before the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin was proposed,

Sir M. Hicks Beach

which enabled the Treasury to give aid to these undertakings by way of free grants and loans, as well as by way of guarantee. I will not dwell upon the number of Divisions which took place, though I think there were something like 25 on the first page of this Bill. I will not dwell on the number of Amendments standing in the names of some hon. Members, by which the Notice Paper was crowded, long before we came to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin, but I will remind the House of what happened on the first two clauses of this Bill. On the first clause, which merely recites that the Bill may be cited for all purposes as the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, a Debate was raised by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) on the principle of the Bill. They attempted to go into details, and they actually divided against that clause being inserted in the Bill. What happened on the first line of the second clause, which simply says, "This Act shall not extend to England and Scotland"? The hon. Member for Sunderland, as an opponent of the Bill, and an economist objecting to inroads upon the public purse, proposed that the Bill should not be confined to Ireland, but should be extended to England and Scotland as well. And then, in spite of the elaborate machinery of the Act of 1883, and in spite of the proposals in the Bill, and still remaining in it, which gave additional security to the taxpayers that their money should be properly expended, the hon. Member for Sunderland gravely proposed in Committee—or at least concealed his laughter—that no light railways should be undertaken under the Bill until the plans and estimates had been first submitted to Parliament and a Vote taken for the grant proposed to be made. These were the kind of Amendments by which this Bill was sought to be defeated in the Standing Committee. Who were the Members prominent in that work? The hon. Member for Cavan—the leader of the Party—who on one clause sought to occupy the time of the Committee with a recitation of the sections in the existing Acts of Parliament which apply to the construction of tramways in Ireland—much after the fashion in which, when I was Irish Secretary in 1875, he consumed four hours of the time of this House by reading through the sections of the Peace Preservation Act. The hon. Member was ably seconded in the Committee by his follower, the Member for Sunderland, and by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Craig). Speech after speech was made, and Amendment after Amendment, alike useless and unmeaning, was proposed. This Bill was met in a way which I can only fairly describe as a deliberate and avowed attempt to stop its progress, otherwise than by fair argument. The Chairman of the Committee, I think, is entitled to the gratitude of the House for the course he took with reference to these Amendments. I will venture to say that he acted on a principle which should be approved by every Member of this House who believes that our forms of procedure were intended to be used for the transaction of business and ought not to be abused in order to stop it. Her Majesty's Government believe that under the provisions of the Bill it will be perfectly competent for any Secretary to the Treasury to take ample means for safe guarding expenditure; we believe that the freedom given to the Treasury, greater, I admit, than it was in the original Bill, will be greatly to the benefit of the country, because it will ensure that each scheme shall be considered and dealt with on its merits as may seem best to the Government of the day; and if the Government do not have regard to the interests of the taxpayers as well as to those of the districts to be benefited by additional communication they will be subject properly to the censure of the House of Commons.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): The right hon. Gentleman has not conveyed much information to the House upon the points of contention raised by my hon. friends. He has favoured us with a lecture upon our course of conduct here and elsewhere. I may venture to tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he could adopt a more suave and agreeable manner, and not lecture and bully us, we might listen more respectfully to what he has to say. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee observed that this Bill had almost become a new Bill. To which the right hon. Gentleman replied that the only change was that whereas under the original Bill free grants might be given to railways, the only free grants or guarantees which can be given under the Bill as it stands are what the Treasury may decide to give.

*SIR M. H. BEACH: I did not say the only change. I said the main change, which had been made a grave subject of complaint.

MR. STOREY: I, of course, accept the right hon. Gentleman's statement, though it does not accord with the note I took at the time. I want to point out that this is a great, but by no means the only change that is complained of. What we complain of, and what we shall continue to complain of, is that, whereas under the Bill as it originally stood, the guarantee could only be given in cash to the promoters, and under safeguards for the British taxpayer and for the locality, the Bill as it now stands not only gives a guarantee, but the Treasury may, if it likes, pay cash down; and, with one exception, all the guarantees which the public and the locality have for the proper construction of the line, for its being carried on, and for the non-inflation of the capital, and all the other provisions which were in the original Bill, have all disappeared. We allege that this Bill has never been duly considered, and, therefore, we ask that it be considered by a Committee of the Whole House. There was no discussion on the First Reading; there was a statement by the right hon. Gentleman on the Second Reading; and then there was a discussion, not of a very severe or extended character, which took part of two nights; and from that day to this the House has had no cognisance of this Bill. In the ordinary course of things this Bill ought to have been presented to a Committee of the Whole House. ["No, no!"] I challenge hon. Gentlemen opposite to cite one instance in which a politically-contentious Bill has been sent to the Grand Committee. If the Chairman of the Committee had been here I should have been quite willing to have made him my witness as well as the other hon. and learned Gentleman who took the Chair in his absence, both staunch supporters of the Government. They would have said without hesitation that this was not a Bill which ought to have been sent to a Grand Committee in the month of August. When we got to the Grand Committee on Trade, the right hon.

Gentleman says we met the Bill with severe and prolonged opposition, taking no less than 25 Divisions on the first part of the Bill. I admit it. I opposed the Bill from the first, and I mean to oppose it to the last. The hon. Member for Dundee was not opposed to the Bill, and my hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire was warmly in its favour. But the conduct of the Chairman and Members of the Government in sustaining him was such that those hon. Members turned against them and for us who were opposing the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says these Divisions took place long before my hon. Friend the Member for Dublin's Amendment was put to the Committee. But was not that Amendment proposed to be accepted by the Solicitor General for Ireland before ever the Committee met? It was down on the Paper; it was not allowed; we saw what was going to happen, and it was therefore that we prolonged our opposition to this part of the Bill, because we knew very well that the second part would never be before us at all. May I press upon the Government this fact, that the bulk of this Bill was never discussed in Committee at all. How many Amendments were there in Committee after we left? They were all a happy family then. The Solicitor General for Ireland had but to lift his finger, and they willingly agreed to anything, but not more willingly than his ancient enemies, who, smitten on one cheek by the present Government, are now exhibiting the most meek and quiet spirit, and are content to receive from the hands of those who smote them and insulted what they have to give. The right hon. Gentleman rather reflected upon me, because he said I had taken a very exceptional course against this Bill. The Bill was a bad Bill in my judgment. I have never concealed that opinion. I will just make one quotation, as showing what it is we object to. The Freeman's Journal has an interesting paragraph which is well worthy the attention of the House:—

"The money properly employed would doubtless prove a boon, but as Ireland is now governed, we are certain that, as regards some of the projects in which a large share of money will be spent, it might as well be devoted to digging bog holes in the nearest bog and filling them up again. The gang of officers of the Board of Works and sharp company promoters —we could guess some of the names—would make a profit; some shopkeepers about the new works would benefit by the navvies; and the country at large would ultimately pay for all."

I would not call the officers of the Board of Works a gang, for it is not a very pleasing word, but the paragraph which I have read is undoubtedly true. Two reasons may be stated for re-committing the Bill. One is that, if public money is to be given at all, it ought to be given to existing railways about which something is known; and if we are to deal with promoters, the guarantee to be given them should be an annual payment for a limited number of years. In the second place, if Her Majesty's Government are determined to proceed with this measure, they ought at least to agree to incorporate into it those safeguards which the Royal Commission suggested. That Commission, in their Report, pointed out why the Act of 1883 was a failure, and suggested remedies which were adopted in the drafting of the original Bill. I desire to move Amendments and new clauses to carry out these objects; but the procedure adopted by the Government has put great obstacles in my way. I and my hon. Friends desired to insert safeguards against abuse. I am not going to take part in proposing frivolous Amendments. I heard what the President of the Board of Trade had to say about me, and I do not care that for what a Government officer has to say. I heard the charge, and dismiss it as it was spoken. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman may say, "Why not move Amendments as it is?" I will tell him why. Some of my Amendments are in the shape of new clauses. You cannot give notice of these new clauses. Care was taken that I should have no opportunity of giving notice, and now that the First Lord of the Treasury proposes to continue this discussion, I am prevented from giving notice of them for to-morrow. After that exhibition of his astuteness, it may now honestly be said that the Government, after doing all they could to defeat the Bill, are at last doing all they can to carry it. There are four or five guarantees for the public which I think the Solicitor General could even yet introduce into this Bill. There is nothing new in them. They were in the original Bill. He himself accepted them and must have thought them desirable.

MR. HALLEY STEWART: Perhaps the hon. Member does not attach the same meaning as I do to the term "wasted," but I am quite sure hon. Members below the Gangway know that a large sum of this money will find its way into the pockets of the worst and most vicious class of company promoters. Some of the Amendments proposed, and to which hon. Members on the opposite side of the House were distinctly favourable, were rejected because it was thought that the measure was being obstructed by other hon. Members. A spirit of absolute partisanship characterised the proceedings of the Committee. I shall certainly support the Motion that the Bill be re-committed.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): One of the inconveniences arising from the way in which this Bill has been treated in Committee upstairs is that Clause 6 is about as confused and unintelligible a clause as it would be possible to put on the Paper. For instance, in Sub-clause 1 it is most distinctly stated that, in addition to the £43,000 a year, the capital sum of £600,000 may be spent.

The House divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 39.—(Div. List, No. 319.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Amendments standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) are out of order, as they go beyond the scope of the Bill. The hon. Member proposes to alter the whole machinery of the Tramways Act of 1883.

A Clause (Application of existing enactments,)—(Mr. Chance,)—brought up, and read the first time and second time, amended, and added.

Another Clause (Appointment of receiver under 30 and 31 Vic. c. 127, 46 and 47 Vic. c. 43.)—(Mr. Craig,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*MR. MADDEN: I cannot assent to this proposal. As I stated in Committee, I consider some of the Amendments which have been placed on the Paper to be of very considerable value, but, owing to the shortness of the time at our disposal, it is impossible to take them. I think the best course would be to postpone them until next year, when I propose to introduce a Bill which I hope will be of a non-contentious character.

*MR. CHANCE: Under the old law if a railway company got into difficulties its creditors could seize its rolling stock. Of course that was a troublesome thing from a public point of view, and the five sections of the Railway Companies Act of 1867 were passed to provide that a Receiver might be appointed to collect the rates and tolls so as to prevent the seizure of the rolling stock and chattels. This new clause proposes to include the sections in the Bill. Unless it is adopted these small undertakings, which are sure to get into difficulties, will be liable to have their rolling stock seized every seven days. I hope the House will not consent to the rejection of the clause without hearing from some supporter of the measure an intelligible statement of the reason why the Government oppose it.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the Government will be well advised if they accept this Amendment, which appears to me to be essentially reasonable.

MR. BIGGAR: The contention of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland seems to be that they ought not to accept a reasonable Amendment, because it will occupy time. It seems to me that the measure could be quite as well settled this Session as partly postponed till next Session. I am told that the clause is similar to one proposed by the confidential adviser of the Solicitor General for Ireland.

The House divided:—Ayes 41; Noes 147.—(Div. List, No. 320.)

Another Clause (General rules,)—(Mr. Craig,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): This clause will require some verbal alterations, but before I explain them I should like to know what position the Government will take up in regard to it.

*MR. MADDEN: This clause is taken from the original Bill proposed by the Government, to Part II. of which it properly applied. But the clause is inapplicable to this Bill because there are no matters in the Bill to which it can refer. The difference between the two cases is this, that in the original measure the insertion of the power to make general rules was appropriate to, and in harmony with, the structure of the Bill, while these general rules are not required under this Bill.

*MR. CHANCE: The Solicitor General for Ireland falls—if I may be permitted to say so—into a complete error when he suggests that this proposed new clause would only give power to make rules as to matters prescribed in the Act. Do I understand him to allege that there are no matters directed to be done by this Act as to which these rules could apply? Surely there are a number of purposes in the Act which would come under this clause. There are the applications to the Grand Jury which it will in future be possible to make both at the Summer and the Autumn Assizes. Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman should bear in mind that the last clause of this Act incorporates the Acts of 1860, 1861, 1871, and 1883. Do the Government allege that the procedure under these Acts is in a satisfactory condition? I do not see how they can, in face of the statement of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland in the second part of the Report of 1888: "That the present procedure is unsatisfactory and involved," and in face, too, of their recommendation that it should be altered, that all these Acts should be consolidated and that a fresh Act should be brought in. If this proposed clause is carried the Lord Lieutenant in Council will have power to make rules for procedure under the Consolidated Acts, and I ask the Government to accept this proposal and enable new rules to be made with a view to improving the present irrational and involved method of procedure.

The House divided:—Ayes 37; Noes 149.—(Div. List, No. 321.)

MR. CRAIG: I think it will be my duty to press the next clause which stands in my name. This also has been taken from the Bill originally brought in by the Government, and I contend that it involves a very important principle, inasmuch as it provides for a popular vote.

Another Clause (Assent of occupiers in benefited district.)—(Mr. Craig.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*MR. MADDEN: There is, no doubt, truth in the statement that this clause is taken from Part II. of the original Bill, but in that Bill it was applicable to a totally different state of things. It is absolutely unnecessary in the present condition of affairs. I would remind the House that under the former Bill provision was made for a novel mode of constructing tramways with a Treasury guarantee, and as there was also provision for local guarantees the Government thought it advisable, in introducing this new system, that the inhabitants of the locality should have some voice in the matter, hence they introduced this clause in the second part of the Bill as introduced. Now, however, promoters must proceed under the Act of 1883. Now that Act enabled the Grand Jurors and the Privy Council to place on the localities concerned far greater burdens than can possibly be imposed under this Act, because not only was the baronial guarantee intended to cover the cost of maintaining the line, but it also covered the entire capital necessary for its construction. Under this Bill the Treasury take power to come to the aid of the locality, and relieve it of a considerable proportion of the burden, and surely there is now no necessity for the ratepayers to be consulted in a special manner. I may add that in Committee an overwhelming majority of the Members representing the class in whose interests this clause is said to be proposed, rejected it.

MR. STOREY: The argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman amounts to this. Inasmuch as under the Act of 1883, where a guarantee was given an appeal to local opinion was provided for, now that the locality is to be aided out of the public purse, there is no necessity for an appeal. Now, I submit that you are going to impose a new charge on the locality under this Bill, and there-

the point. We continued the discussion as if Part II. was to remain an essential part of the Bill. The monument as to the character of the Government's proceeding is to be found in Clause 2, Sub-section 2, which now says that—

"The Lord Lieutenant, by Order in Council, may from time to time declare . . . that the Provisions of Part I and II. of this Act shall be applicable to such Light Railways . . . but the provisions of Part I. and II. of this Act shall not apply except to the Light Railways specified in such Order in Council aforesaid."

The complaint I make is that we were allowed to discuss Clause 2 on the theory that Part II. was to remain an essential part of the Bill, and that now Part II. has disappeared altogether from the Bill. I make no imputation whatever upon the Chairman of the Grand Committee. I believe he intended to be fair, and to do what he thought was best in the interest of the House and of the Bill. We only complain of an enormous error of judgment on his part, which has resulted in the proceedings of the Committee having become entirely nugatory, and in a serious blow having been dealt at the Grand Committee system. We do not say there is an appeal from the Grand Committee to this House, and we do not ask the House to pass a resolution condemning the Committee as a whole, or the majority of the Committee, or the Chairman. But we say there has been committed a mistake which this House is bound in fairness and in justice to all parties to rectify. There is a great deal more than the fate of this Bill involved. It appears to me that to some extent the future of the Grand Committee system is involved. I have never been strongly in favour of the system, otherwise than as accompanied by the most stringent securities and guarantees. I believe those securities and guarantees have been evaded, and evaded by what has taken place in Committee on this Bill; and I believe that if the Chairmen of other Grand Committees followed the course adopted in this case the Grand Committee system would completely break down. It would be absolutely fatal to the system if, for instance, the theory became established that it is the duty of the Chairman of a Standing Committee to push through the Bill that is before the Committee. That unquestionably was the theory which was at work in respect to this Bill. The system in the United States makes the Chairman absolute master of the Bills in his Committee, but I do not think this House would stand any such assumption of authority on the part of the Chairman of a Grand Committee. I should like, in support of the position we have taken up, to allude to the opinions formerly expressed in the House on this subject by two Members, each of them of high personal besides official authority. The First Lord of the Treasury will remember that in 1883 he expressed a very guarded and reluctant assent to the establishment of the Grand Committee system, and I know, by reference to his speeches, that if there was one point more than another in which he asked and obtained a pledge from the Government of the Day, it was that only non-contentious business should be sent to Grand Committees. There never was a more contentious Bill submitted to the House than this. The other Gentleman to whom I refer is the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Whitbread), whose authority on matters of procedure is unequalled amongst the ordinary Members of the House. That hon. Member, who was a supporter of the Grand Committee system, laid down the principle that the system could never be expected or desired to succeed unless discussion in the Standing Committee was to be as absolutely free as it is in Committee of the Whole House. Can it be contended that the discussion on this Bill in Grand Committee was as free as it will be if the Motion of my hon. Friend is accepted? I have much pleasure in supporting the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill.

*MR. BIGGAR (Cavan): I have not had much experience of the proceedings of Grand Committees, but from the little experience I have of them I am inclined to agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundee. I have had much experience of the workings of Committees of the Whole House, and I must say I never saw the slightest attempt to conduct a Bill in Committee of the Whole House as this Bill was conducted in Grand Committee. I have no doubt the Chairman of the Committee acted within his lights, but unfortunately, his lights were not very bright. A mad sheep is supposed to

Inasmuch as under the Act of 1883, where a guarantee was given an appeal to local opinion was provided for, now that the locality is to be aided out of the public purse, there is no necessity for an appeal. Now, I submit that you are going to impose a new charge on the locality under this Bill, and there-tending to the more remote and to the poorer parts of Ireland the benefits of the communication which the Act was intended to establish. Therefore the Government had proposed, in the Bill now before the House, to alter the system under which these Treasury guarantees were given. Why did that system fail? Mainly because it was an indirect guarantee. It was not so good or so marketable a security as if the Treasury had been permitted to give the guarantee directly. What is the proposal now before the House? In the first part of the Bill the Treasury were empowered to grant assistance to an existing railway company towards the construction of light railways by way of a free grant, a loan, or an annual payment. That assistance was to be direct. What was the further proposal of the Bill? In Part II. it was proposed that promoters, in other words a public company promoting a light railway, should also have direct assistance.

MR. CHANCE: By way of annual guarantee.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, by way of an annual guarantee not exceeding 3 per cent, and the Standing Committee to which this Bill was referred have made this alteration in that proposal, that they have allowed the Treasury not merely to guarantee an annual sum not exceeding 3 per cent to a public company promoting such a railway under the provisions of the Act of 1883, but also to assist by way of free grants or by way of loans. What is this enormous change which has thus been made by the Standing Committee? Hon. Members should reflect that the Treasury can borrow money at less than 3 per cent, and that, therefore, in allowing the Treasury to give a guarantee of annual interest of 3 per cent, the Bill had originally proposed to do in reality more than was provided by the Standing Committee. Is it the fact that this change in the Bill originated the opposition by which the measure has been met? If hon. Members refer to the dry records of the proceedings of the Standing Committee they will see the way in which the Bill was met long before the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin was proposed,

which enabled the Treasury to give aid to these undertakings by way of free grants and loans, as well as by way of guarantee. I will not dwell upon the number of Divisions which took place, though I think there were something like 25 on the first page of this Bill. I will not dwell on the number of Amendments standing in the names of some hon. Members, by which the Notice Paper was crowded, long before we came to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin, but I will remind the House of what happened on the first two clauses of this Bill. On the first clause, which merely recites that the Bill may be cited for all purposes as the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, a Debate was raised by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) on the principle of the Bill. They attempted to go into details, and they actually divided against that clause being inserted in the Bill. What happened on the first line of the second clause, which simply says, "This Act shall not extend to England and Scotland"? The hon. Member for Sunderland, as an opponent of the Bill, and an economist objecting to inroads upon the public purse, proposed that the Bill should not be confined to Ireland, but should be extended to England and Scotland as well. And then, in spite of the elaborate machinery of the Act of 1883, and in spite of the proposals in the Bill, and still remaining in it, which gave additional security to the taxpayers that their money should be properly expended, the hon. Member for Sunderland gravely proposed in Committee—or at least concealed his laughter—that no light railways should be undertaken under the Bill until the plans and estimates had been first submitted to Parliament and a Vote taken for the grant proposed to be made. These were the kind of Amendments by which this Bill was sought to be defeated in the Standing Committee. Who were the Members prominent in that work? The hon. Member for Cavan—the leader of the Party—who on one clause sought to occupy the time of the Committee with a recitation of the sections in the existing Acts of Parliament which apply to the construction of tramways in Ireland—much after the fashion in which, when I was Irish Secretary in 1875, he of giving expression to the opinion of the cesspayers on any particular scheme before it is passed, there is undoubtedly a danger to be safeguarded. It may not be wise for the Government to schedule the district to which the Bill shall apply, but if you have not some check upon the Grand Jury you may have the engineering and financing ingenuity of promoters sanctioned, and expenditure wasted, upon work that should never have been undertaken. In the event of failure, if the line does not pay, then a certain portion of the loss falls upon the occupiers, and certainly they will have good reason to complain if they have no check or control over a scheme which, in its inception, they may have considered unjustifiable. Under the circumstances, I hope the principle of the Amendment will be accepted.

*MR. CHANCE: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Dublin that the Bill does not throw upon the ratepayers such a heavy burden as was imposed by the Act of 1883, and I admit also that in this direction a safeguard was introduced in Committee, and that whereas under the Act of 1883 promoters might ask the Grand Jury to guarantee the whole of the capital, undoubtedly under the Amendment of my hon. Friend this cannot be done; the promoters can only ask for a guarantee of a portion of the capital, and so far, of course, liability is lessened. Under the second part I admit there is no real liability. I confess I do not quite know what is to happen if the Railway Company fail to work the line, but I presume the draftsmen did not anticipate that such a thing could occur.

*MR. CHANCE: Well, that may be very valuable or not, but I admit that liability does not fall on the county. If a fresh company promote a line, undoubtedly they will be bound to make a working agreement, and in that case I suppose the Treasury will look into that agreement. But under the third branch of this proposal this is not so. The promoters may come to the Grand Jury and ask for a guarantee on a limited portion of the capital, and this will have to be met by additions to the county cess. I notice that the Commission on Public Works advise that there should be no addition to the county cess in respect to any guarantee above 6d. in the £1. Now, the Grand Jury are not a popular body, they do not pay the county cess; it falls upon the occupiers who are not represented on the Grand Jury; and, therefore, we have the position that one body imposes taxation without having to pay a penny in discharge of the liability, and the people who have to discharge the whole of the liability have no representation whatever on the body which imposes the taxation. Again, I have to refer to the Report of the Commission. The Commissioners reported that undoubtedly it was desirable and necessary that if a grant were to be made, due regard should be had to local responsibility, and the opinion of the county should be taken. I admit that the method pointed out by the Commissioners was defective. They proposed that the opinion of Presentment Sessions should be taken. Now that is a tribunal composed of an unlimited number of Magistrates and only six of the highest ratepayers of the district, and these, of course, would be always outvoted, so that would give no real representation of the ratepayers. As the Bill was originally drawn, I suppose upon a principle settled by the Solicitor General, I am bound to confess there was a complete representation of the ratepayers. If the ratepayers vote in favour of a scheme, then the ratepayers cannot object to the consequences. Further, I may point out that there was a limitation to 6d. in the £1. Now that clause is dropped out and the guarantee left unlimited, it seems to me only reasonable that the ratepayers should have a representative voice, and there would be no difficulty in revising the wording of this clause and securing that. In the Standing Committee this clause was rejected, I think, with 13 other Amendments upon one question put, and I think the reason that influenced many Members was that they regarded these Amendments as directed to the defeat of the Bill, and were determined that the Bill should pass. But that danger no longer exists. The Bill is pretty safe now. We have had a number of Divisions, and these have disclosed such large majorities that there is little doubt of the Bill passing to-night or to-morrow. The insertion

Amendment proposed to the proposed clause, to add at the end—

"Provided always that the clause shall not apply where an application for a guarantee has already been made before the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I object to that Amendment. I think it will spoil the sense altogether.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, be added to the Bill."

MR. O'DOHERTY: The Amendment which has been agreed to, in my opinion, entirely destroys the effect of the clause. I am not sure that my hon. Friend did not know this. I think it is a case, not of manslaughter, but of wilful murder. As the clause stands now it cannot apply to any conceivable case.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

MR. BIGGAR: I propose, in Clause 2, page 1, line 8, after "council," to insert—

"If petitioned to do so by a resolution of the Boards of Guardians of the district it is proposed to tax, said resolution to be come to on notice to the Guardians that such motion is to be proposed."

My object is the same as that of the former proposal, which was negatived. It is a matter of very substantial importance. I think the opinion of those who are best competent to judge of the need of constructing one of these lines, namely, the people of the district, should be consulted before any decision is come to. I admit that under the proposal which was negatived the process suggested was very expensive and cumbersome. The same thing cannot be said of the present proposal. Each member of the Board of Guardians would represent his own locality, and would be able to state, not only his own opinion, but what was likely to be the opinion of those whom he represented.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after the word "council," to insert the words—

"If petitioned to do so by a resolution of the Boards of Guardians of the district it is proposed to tax, said resolution to be come to on notice to the Guardians that such motion is to be proposed.—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHANCE: I am afraid that this Amendment will not be accepted in its present form, because one Board of Guardians out of many in a district might prevent a scheme being adopted. But I would put it to the Government whether it could not be accepted if it was modified, so as to provide for the assent of the majority of the Boards of Guardians. I admit that it would be a somewhat expensive and cumbersome process to submit these schemes to the vote of a whole district, but it would be neither to submit them to the Boards of Guardians. In mercy to those who desire these railways, I think it would be well that they should have the opportunity of discovering whether the county is against them or not. They would then at least be able to say that, when a line had been made, it had been the result of an expression of public feeling in favour of its construction. It would also enable the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council to discover pretty accurately what baronies were likely to object to join in the guarantee. I believe there was a certain amount of feeling on the opposite side of the House in favour of the previous Amendment, and I have no doubt it was only rejected because it was thought to be rather a cumbersome and heavy way of getting at the opinion of the locality.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): As the House is aware, I have very considerable sympathy with the general principles with regard to popular control which have been enumerated on the other side of the House; and, in the Bills respecting drainage, and in this Bill as it went to the Committee, I gave practical expression to the opinions which I hold upon the subject. At the same time, I do not think the method proposed by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), even as amended by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Chance), would prove convenient or effective. I do not think that the spectacle of Boards of Guardians meeting and quarrelling over any particular scheme of a light railway would be at all edifying, or be of much assistance to the Lord Lieutenant. Moreover, Boards of Guardians are not representative at all in the sense of the bodies I desired to call into existence. In the Bill as originally drafted I desired to obtain the opinion of the cesspayers, and the Boards of Guardians do not represent the cesspayers. Therefore, I do not think that the method proposed would give effective popular control.

MR. COSSHAM: I find that the practical proposal of the right hon. Gentleman in favour of giving popular control has now dwindled down to sympathy. If the right hon. Gentleman really desires to give some practical effect to his wish for popular control in this matter, let him devise some clause to do it. When the Bill was before the Committee I moved a clause for the purpose of giving the Guardians some control in connection with these railways. I did not consider they were the best body to choose, but they were the only body I could find in Ireland which at all represented popular opinion. I do ask the House to adopt the principle proposed by the hon. Member for Cavan, and I shall be glad myself to accept the limitation suggested by the hon. Member below me (Mr. Chance).

*MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I cannot for the life of me see how an Irishman like the hon. Member below me (Mr. Chance) can try and obstruct a Bill of this kind.

*MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member are not in order.

*MR. PINKERTON: I withdraw what I said. Owing to my experience of Boards of Guardians, I know the consequence will be such a confusion and diversity of opinion that it will be impossible to carry any line through a district at all. All these Amendments are brought forward by the enemies of the measure, none of the proposals come from those who are desirous of seeing the Bill pass. I think the Government would do well to draft a clause, giving some sort of control to local opinion, but they would not be well advised in handing that control over to Boards of Guardians. I agree with the Chief Secretary, we should have continual conflict between the ex officio and the elected Guardians, and moreover in the congested districts a large proportion of the population being under the £4 rental, have no representation on the Boards of Guardians. The very persons whose condition the Bill is designed to improve, would be excluded from representation in the matter. Many Guardians will be anxious to have a line through a district in which they are interested, and you would by this Amendment play into their hands to the exclusion of the poorer districts. We have seen how the Cavan Guardians have passed a Resolution in favour of a particular scheme. I do not suppose it is the intention of the Government that money should be spent in the richer districts. I give them the credit of honesty of intention in wishing to benefit the poorer districts, and this Amendment will simply put a difficulty in their way.

*MR. CHANCE: The people who are not represented on the Boards of Guardians do not either pay county cess.

*MR. PINKERTON: I am astonished to hear my hon. Friend say this, the poorest farmers in my district pay county cess. Though I am in favour of some form of popular representation I intend to support the Bill, even though it should have some defects. I shall vote with the Government on every Division against all opposition.

MR. STOREY: If nothing else results from these discussions they give us interesting revelations of the state of Ireland and what it will be when this Bill passes into law and the scramble commences among all sorts of persons for a share of this money. It is not our fault that this Amendment is not so good as others which have been rejected. There was an admirable Amendment proposed in Committee that included the representation of all occupiers, but we were not allowed to discuss it, and of course our proposals find life again in the House. In default of a better proposal, which was refused, we have this proposal that Boards of Guardians should be consulted. Knowing, as I do, that a large number of these Guardians are not elected, I agree it is a very questionable Court of Appeal, but it is better than nothing. ["No, no!"] I am sorry to hear an hon. Member deny that Irish Boards of Guardians are better than nothing. I say they are. They would be some kind of guarantee, though an insufficient one. I agree that it would defeat the purpose to have different Boards of Guardians sending counter resolutions, and I think the proposal should be confined to the Board of Guardians for the district.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I think that it is absolutely necessary that popular opinion should be tested to some extent, and, although I admit that the Board of Guardians is not the best test, still I maintain that their opinion is better than nothing. There is an objection that there will be more than one Board in the county; but that can be met by an alteration of phraseology. True, we have "scenes" at our Board meetings sometimes; but, on the whole, the business of the Guardians is well conducted. I think that a Board should discuss the proposal at a special meeting, else it might come on at the end of a long and tedious day's business. Let me say that, although I am in favour of the Bill generally, the House cannot be too cautious about all its provisions. I represent one of the Divisions of Waterford, and we have now to pay £14,000 a year in respect to a railway constructed through our county, and this and other considerations make me most anxious that safeguards against future burdens should be provided. The whole of the £14,000 I mention falls upon the occupiers, and I should like to have such burdens divisible between owners and occupiers. In default of any better way of testing public opinion, I shall support the Amendment.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): My hon. Friend the Member for Waterford is Chairman of a Board of Guardians—one of the few Members on this side who with myself hold that position. I should say this would not be a bad Amendment if amended so as to apply to the one Board of Guardians only. Thus amended, it might be worthy of consideration.

*SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: I hope the Amendment will not be accepted; it will simply be an element of discord introduced, and an obstruction in the operation of the Bill.

The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 106.—(Div. List, No. 323.)

MR. PHILIPPS: The ground on which I move the Amendment which stands in my name is because it seems to me it is reasonable that some time should be fixed—I am not wedded to the time named in my Amendment—within which the pecuniary benefit offered by this Bill should be either taken advantage of, or definitely refused. I think that within six months people ought to make up their minds whether they want the benefit of the Act, but if the Solicitor General for Ireland thinks 12 months would be better, I am quite prepared to amend my Amendment accordingly. The Treasury should know, as soon as possible, what claims will be made under the Bill; and it is also reasonable that the House should know what the claims are, because other schemes may be proposed in future Sessions. No doubt the Chief Secretary for Ireland has other schemes in his mind for the benefit of Ireland, schemes which may, in the opinion of the House, confer more benefit on Ireland than the present. It might influence the House in refusing to vote other schemes if there was some liability outstanding under this scheme. Therefore, in the interest of other schemes, it is well we should know within some reasonable time the extent to which this Act is to be put into operation. Circumstances may alter from time to time, and in two or three years we may feel we are not called upon to let the Irish people have this money as a free gift.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 8 and 9, to leave out the words "from time to time," and insert the words "at any time within six months from the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Philipps.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not insist upon pressing this Amendment to a Division. I think he will see that nothing is to be gained from the taxpayer's point of view by the introduction of the words he proposes. We may take it that when Parliament has said it is prepared to expend a capital sum of £600,000 on Irish Light Railways, the whole of that will be called up and will have to be paid. [Ironical cheers.] It is distinctly in that expectation, and I may say that hope, that the Government propose the Bill. I do not think, therefore, that it cut down the gift we propose to give to the less prosperous parts of Ireland, by a side wind, by fixing some limit of time within which demands may be made to the House, would be consonant with the general policy adopted.

*Mr. CHANCE: I admit the right hon. Gentleman is correct to a certain extent, but I put it to him that there is a very serious object to be served by having some limit of time. I do not say six months, for I candidly confess that would be too short. Let me remind the Chief Secretary that this only applies to the making of the Order, and that the Order may prescribe certain number of years within which the Light Railway is to be constructed. In the Report of the Commissioners upon Public Works in Ireland, which was published last year, it is stated that the Tramways and Light Railways Acts are in a very unsatisfactory condition. It is pointed out that many of the Acts require to be amended, that many of the provisions are obsolete, and that in some respects the advances made under the Acts are not very well safeguarded. The Commissioners recommend that the Acts should be consolidated and amended, and that some reasonable and clear practice should be laid down in the case of Tramways and Light Railways. If we grant this money without any limitation of time, the money will be absolutely dedicated, not one penny could be got back; it would be absolutely impossible for Parliament to revoke the gift. There is one safeguard I should like to see introduced—namely, some provision for the repayment of the advances from the Treasury to the ratepayers in the case of any schemes which proved fruitful. If such provision is to be made at all, it must be made before the money is advanced.

Mr. STOREY: There is one reason to be urged in favour of this Amendment, namely, that it brings out the history of the money advanced under the Act of 1883. The right hon. Gentleman knows that under the Act of 1883 there was power to spend a certain amount of money. Up to the present a large sum has been expended, and it stands to reason that those who come under the new Act and get cash down will never take the trouble to go under the old Act, under which they can only get a limited guarantee. I think 12 months might be more reasonable; if it were even two years I would not object. The right hon. Gentleman cannot object, because he tells us he fully expects this money, having been allocated by Parliament, will be all applied for. One hon. Gentleman told us he thought all the money would be applied for within 24 hours, and I believe it will be applied for 10 times over. We are very much in the same position in England as in Ireland. If a beneficent Government will offer any part of the United Kingdom cash down for anything to do with local works, why, of course, the probability is that the virtue of any part of the United Kingdom would be strained. I believe all the money will be applied for, and I believe the present Lord Lieutenant or the new one will be prepared to give any money to the people of Ireland if he can only keep them quiet. It seems to me we had better insert in the Bill words setting out that the application shall be made within the year. If my hon. Friend will assent, I will move to insert "12 months" for "six months."

Mr. PHILIPPS: I agree.

Mr. HANDEL COSSHAM: I beg to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend Mr. Philipps) as amended by the hon. Member for Sunderland. In the interest of the Chief Secretary and of the Government, some limit ought to be put on these grants. It is because I believe brute force and bribery will not work in Ireland that I support this Proposition.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 8 and 9, to leave out the words "from time to time," and insert the words "at any time within twelve months from the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Philipps.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 25.—(Div. List, No. 324.)

Mr. CHANCE: I beg to move the insertion of the words "upon an application in the prescribed manner" after the word "time" in line 9. I do not propose to press the Amendment if the Government object to it; but if they intend to provide any machinery by which popular opinion can be expressed on the schemes prior to their recognition by Order in Council, they will have no objection to the insertion of the words I suggest.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, after the word "time," to insert the words "upon an application in the prescribed manner."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid it is impossible to devise machinery that will satisfy the hon. Gentleman and his friends.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name: it is simply a verbal Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "certain," to insert the word "named."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'named' be there inserted."

*MR. MADDEN: I think this Amendment can hardly be taken apart from the other Amendments standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member, and he will admit those Amendments are other than verbal, that in fact they tend to introduce in the Bill a distinct principle, namely, the defining by the Bill of certain named districts. This is an Amendment leading up to subsequent Amendments which are objectionable from our point of view, but possibly necessary from the hon. and learned Member's point of view. We must object to the Amendment.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I did not propose this Amendment as leading up to others, but simply to make it clear that the place should be named in the Order. However, after what the hon. Gentleman has said, I will withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I now beg to move to insert, in line 10, "within the Counties of Donegal, Mayo, Galway, and Kerry." The object of this

Mr. Chance

Amendment is to limit in the Bill the local extent of the measure. It is quite clear it is not pretended that the whole of Ireland should have an interest in the Bill. The benefit is intended for certain localities, and I think the House in assenting to the measure should state what are the districts to which the measure is to apply. From the best information I have been able to obtain, the enumeration I have made exhausts the local necessities for the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "places," to insert the words "within the Counties of Donegal, Mayo, Galway, and Kerry."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman is probably not far wide of the mark in saying the counties named are those which will largely benefit by the passing of the Bill; but at the same time it would, I submit, be a very great error on the part of the House to lay down any hard and fast line which would absolutely preclude the Parliamentary grant being employed for districts in other parts of Ireland really requiring it. It is perfectly true that what are called the congested districts are largely situated in the counties named, but it is not true they are wholly situated in those counties.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman must admit there is something in the past transactions in Ireland which makes it very desirable that some such limitation as this should be inserted in the Bill. The Act of 1883, which was unlimited, was pressed through the House hastily for the purpose of benefitting congested districts of Ireland; and the Commissioners inform us, in their Report, that the Privy Council granted Orders for a short branch line to the Harbour of Carrickfergus, and for a suburban line from Dublin to Blessington, cases for which the Commissioners state "we should scarcely have thought an Imperial grant was desirable." [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman agrees that that was an improper use of the Act. I suppose that Act was badly used by a Liberal Government. That Act having been so used by a Liberal Government, the Chief Secretary cannot wonder that we wish to take precautions against the possibility of failure on the part of a Conservative Government. If we are going to spend the public money of Great Britain and Ireland upon portions of Ireland, it should be upon congested portions of Ireland only. I do not say my hon. and learned Friend's list of counties exhausts the list, and I sincerely hope hon. Members from Ireland will move additions; but however that may be, the hon. and learned Gentleman has hit the four worst counties, so far as our judgments go, and if he goes to a Division I shall support him.

COLONEL NOLAN: I represent the largest of the four counties named. Galway and the other counties named certainly require the assistance proposed by the Bill; but I must point out that the hon. and learned Gentleman throws by his Amendment an apple of discord amongst the Irish Members. I am afraid that if Donegal, Mayo, Galway, and Kerry are the only counties to be benefited, the Representatives of some other Irish counties will not continue their interest in the Bill. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Chance) has taken up a very extraordinary attitude as regards the Bill, and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) has taken up a line of action which we all acknowledge, but regret. We are sorry that a man of his attainments in other respects should entertain such a deep-seated objection to water communication. But the Irish Members have been tolerably unanimous in respect to the Bill. [Cries of "No, no!"] Well, in Committee three Irish Members supported and 16 opposed the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) in his opposition to the Bill, and I call that tolerable unanimity. I certainly think we ought to reject this Amendment as a somewhat insidious one.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not think the Government will thank the hon. and gallant Member for Galway for the support he has given them on this occasion. He has told the House with charming frankness that no Irish Member will vote for the Bill unless he is to get something out of it. Is it a fact that all the Irish Members want is money, and that all the Government where? I had hoped the Government would have accepted this or a similar Amendment. I had hoped they would have shown some good faith by restricting the operation of the Bill to congested districts. The Government will undoubtedly put themselves in a very false position unless they accept some such Amendment. I have been studying the Report of the Royal Commission. Nothing can be more miserable reading. The Commissioners give us a long list of schemes of railways that do not pay, that never will pay, and perhaps that never were intended to pay. They show how money that was intended for poor and congested districts has been spent in other parts of the country where it was not required. I have also studied a pamphlet on the subject of railways sent to me by a very sincere well-wisher of Ireland—Mr. Tute. He has prepared a map showing what railways there are in the congested districts of Ireland, and I find that along one part of the coast of Donegal, which is regarded as a congested district, railways reach the sea at no less than 15 points. I therefore cannot admit there is such necessity for these railways as we are led to suppose. It is absurd to say that the making of more railways there will really develop fishing. I have been to Donegal. No doubt it is a very poor county. The people do not catch much fish, and they cultivate the land with the spade; indeed, I am not sure they are in such a civilised state that they can support or benefit by railways. Galway is a county of rocks and stones, and Kerry is similarly situated. There are intermediate counties; but my belief is that the list of my hon. and learned Friend really exhausts the congested parts of Ireland. If the Government mean to show their good faith they will accept the Amendment; but if, following the lead of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway, they are determined to have a Bill which will captivate as many Irish Members as possible they will, no doubt, reject the Amendment.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I also have been in Donegal. I happen to be the Representative of one of the four Divisions, and all I can say is that if I wanted a specito Donegal. I can also give the hon. Gentleman a hint as to his utterances in this House, that if he desires Members to co-operate with him he should not make use of language foolishly and needlessly offensive—

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Sir, I apologise.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: With regard to this Amendment, I may say that whatever proposals are put forward for the extension of railway communication Donegal is one of the chosen counties. This seems to be recognised as a matter of course, and since the introduction of this Bill I have been inundated with letters from all quarters and from all sorts of people in reference to possible extensions of railway communication. I am bound to say that schemes and alternative schemes for Donegal seem to be already prepared, and not only for Donegal itself but for the large towns in adjoining counties, by people anxious to speculate with other people's money. For all that, I think limitation to specified counties, whether those should be four in number or more, would be a mistake, because if you limit the number of counties you also create a fixed idea that those counties should have an assured proportion in the sharing of public money, and it will be difficult for Dublin Castle to resist that idea. As to the four counties mentioned, in my judgment they do not include those counties where money would be most advantageously spent. I agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that Galway should be included, and for the last seven years he has striven to bring this about. But other counties have a reasonable claim to assistance besides those mentioned; and if you fix upon these four counties as the limit there are certain Irish Members, naturally enough—it is nothing to their discredit that it should be so—whose interest in the Bill will immediately diminish. I do not think we can reasonably expect the Government to accept this Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR: It is perfectly clear that the money will demoralise whoever gets it, and therefore I think it would be well to circumscribe the area of demoralisation, and then the counties outside that area will cease to beg for their share of the spoil.

Mr. A. O'Connor

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 131.—(Div. List, No. 325.)

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Perhaps I may be allowed to say, in reference to my Amendments standing next on the Paper, that I put them down in connection with a line of policy as to which I intended to raise a definite issue. But as the new clause I wished to propose was ruled out of order, I presume these Amendments having relation to that clause are equally out of order. But I think the Government might accept the Amendment to line 10, which is to leave out the words “for the development of fisheries or other industries.”

*MR. MADDEN: It is impossible for the Government to accept that Amendment. In the forefront of the Bill these objects are put forward as the essential reasons for the Bill, and as indicating the purpose the Government have in view. I quite understand the hon. Gentleman's Amendment as leading up to the policy he would advocate; but inasmuch as that has had to be abandoned, it is impossible to accept this Amendment.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I do not move that Amendment, but I move the next, but with a considerable modification. As it stands, the Amendment is directed to confining the application of the proposals in the Bill to railways that may be expected to pay 3 per cent; but I propose to modify that by limiting the Amendment to railways that will pay working expenses. The object of the Amendment is plain, and I do not think the Solicitor General ought to have any difficulty in accepting it. If he does not, then he declares on the face of the Bill that the Government are prepared to grant this money for the construction of railways that will not pay working expenses.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word “industries,” to insert the words “and that the earnings thereof may reasonably be expected to pay working expenses.”—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment, because it is inexpedient to lay down a hard-and-fast rule

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I will merely say, then, that I wish to oppose the Amendment.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I wish to point out to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundee that the practical effect of this Amendment, if carried, will be to exclude from the operation of the Bill the very portions of Ireland which really most require railway communication. I consider that would be a most unfortunate result; and I trust that the hon. and learned Gentleman, who has a logical mind, will not press an Amendment which will defeat the real purpose of the Bill.

*MR. CHANCE: I am afraid my hon. Friend hardly appreciates the force of the Amendment. He forgets one vital fact, and that is that the expense of working the various lines under the Bill will fall on the districts. These lines are to be constructed in the poorest districts, and the cost of working will fall upon the poorest and most wretched baronies. There is a wholly unlimited guarantee. It may be 5s., or 10s., or 20s. in the £1, and it will have to be given by the people who are supposed to be benefited. I do not myself believe that a railway which is first constructed for nothing and which then will not pay for working can be of any benefit. It seems to me to be an abuse of common sense to imagine that a railway which will not pay for its coal and oil is an advantage to any district; and if a district is so poor that it cannot afford traffic to pay for the coal and oil it ought to be guarded from the unqualified liability which will be imposed upon it in case of a break-down.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.): I should like to point out that the Royal Commission say in their Report they feel it their duty to recommend the State to undertake far larger responsibility in connection with these works in Ireland than would be desirable in other parts of the United Kingdom, and that unless the help of the State can be given it cannot be expected that the works they suggest can be executed.

MR. BIGGAR: It is all very well to talk about making lines in districts where there are nothing but stones and never will be any traffic. You may benefit a few beggarly shopkeepers; but I really think we ought not to be asked to tax the people for these schemes if the responsible authorities do not think they will pay expenses. The people who live in these districts are very badly off, but though the people are badly off you are not going to give them crops by making railways. I am not satisfied with the course that some Irish Members have taken as to this Bill, for they have actually said to me that unless certain provisions are inserted in the measure the ratepayers are going to be plundered, and yet, even though those provisions have not been inserted, they are supporting the Bill.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I do not know that I should feel much more satisfied with the Lord Lieutenant's estimate of the probable paying character of a projected railway than I am as to his satisfaction at the legal acquirements of the Resident Magistrates; but I should like to ask either the Chief Secretary or the Solicitor General a very practical question. In the east of Donegal there are two lines of railway, from one or other, and perhaps from both, of which there will be extensions into the north-west or south of Donegal. The question I wish to put is this: Suppose the contemplated extension should not pay its working expenses, will there be any further expense thrown upon my constituents, or will there not?

*MR. MADDEN: Any Company holding a working agreement with a Railway Company may apply for a guarantee from the Treasury, and, of course, the Treasury will have to satisfy themselves that the line will be worked. The guarantees under the Act of 1883 will apply to the lines which may be promoted under the Act of 1883, with the Treasury assistance derived from this Bill.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: What I ask is—[cries of "Order!" ]—will my constituents have to pay the working expenses?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

The House divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 148.—(Div. List, No. 326.)

MR. CHANCE: I beg to move an Amendment to provide that railways under this Act shall be constructed by existing companies or promoters having working arrangements in existing companies. I very much fear transactions of this character—that people starting a company will come and say, "We cannot get an existing company to take this up for us." and will then, having got some capital advanced, obtain a guarantee and sell to an existing company, which will have the advantage both of the capital advanced and also of the guarantee. The Commissioners in their Report of last year recommended that these operations should be confined to existing companies, and that if existing companies would not make the necessary railways power should be taken to compel them on fair terms. My Amendment only gives the Lord Lieutenant power to act; it is not compulsory.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, after the word "that," to insert the words "such of the provisions of this Act as may be set out in said Order."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. MADDEN: I hope the hon. Member will not persevere with this. The Order in Council is an Order merely declaring that for certain reasons it is desirable that lines under this Act should be permitted in certain places. At that stage of the proceedings it cannot be determined whether the line shall be made by an existing Railway Company or an independent company of promoters. And it should not be determined at that stage, because once you decide that a line should be constructed between certain points the greater the competition the better. One of the main objects is to get healthy competition between adjoining railways on the one hand, and persons interested in the locality on the other. The effect of the Amendment would be to strangle competition in its birth.

MR. CHANCE: I do not say this must be done, but that the Lord Lieutenant may have power to do it. I can conceive circumstances in which it would be desirable that this power should be exercised.

MR. PHILIPPS: I do not understand the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Where you are going to make railways that are not going to penses, and if you are to have a competing line of the same kind it will be worse than ever. If the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech does not mean that, I do not know what it does

HIVEMAN

MR. BIGGAR: I do not understand the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland, or that of the hon. Member who has just sat down. Does the Solicitor General mean that patronage should be extended to a class of promoters who intend when their line is constructed to sell it to some one else? I think we should only deal with bona fide parties. It would be a ridiculous thing for a company which has no means of carrying on a railway to come for power to construct one in the hope of being able to sell it to some one else. Such a thing should never be allowed. The Bill will extend patronage to a class of people with neither money nor character, but who are able to get at the right side of the Secretary to the Treasury or the Solicitor General for Ireland for the time being, and get power to make a line which they can either sell at a profit or allow to drop.

The House divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 147.—(Div. List, No. 327.)

Other Amendments made.

On Clause 3,

*MR. CHANCE: I have to move as an Amendment to this clause the insertion after the word "traffic" in line 21, page 1, of the words—

"and having for at least five years immediately preceding the passing of this Act paid a dividend of at least three per centum per annum upon all its stocks and shares."

Earlier in the Debate the learned Solicitor General for Ireland told us again and again that Her Majesty's Government would take proper securities from existing Railway Companies working under the Bill that no charge should fall on the baronies. I ask is it proper to give public money to any kind of line? When you once advance the capital to some impoverished or insolvent Railway Company can you get any sort of guarantee or security that it will be properly expended? For my dividends on ordinary stock, and it is unwise to hand over public money as a free gift to these insolvent or impoverished undertakings. It would be much wiser to give it to a new company starting with a clear book. If you advance the proposed sums to companies already up to their eyes in debt they will only try to pocket as much as they can out of it, putting on their lines all their old carriages, and worn out stock, or selling them to new companies at the price given 15 or 20 years before. I submit that, under such circumstances, you cannot expect to get anything like reasonable security. We have heard a good deal from the Government about security, and now we come to the bottom of it we find that the security referred to is to be that of Railway Companies that have not been able to pay a dividend for years. I trust my Amendment will be accepted.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 21, after the word "traffic," to insert the words—

"and having for at least five years immediately preceding the passing of this Act paid a dividend of at least three per centum per annum upon all its stocks and shares."—
(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. MADDEN: I am unable to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, who need not be under any fear that the guarantee of such companies as he has described will be accepted by the Treasury.

*MR. CHANCE: Exclude them, then.

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Gentleman says "exclude them," but he seeks to exclude them unfairly. What the Bill does is to exclude insolvent companies by investing discretion in the Treasury Authorities, who will be bound to satisfy themselves that the guarantees offered by the Railway Companies are satisfactory.

Treasury in the terms of the Amendment that they had paid a dividend of 3 per cent for five years on their ordinary stock. I trust, therefore, the hon. Gentleman will not persist in his attempt to lay down a hard and fast rule which would exclude companies able to offer good security.

MR. BIGGAR: I have sometimes asked the Secretary to the Treasury questions as to this and that local railway in the best parts of Ireland, and the answer I have universally got is that those companies are in arrear with their interest. Of course there are numbers of large companies whose security is first-rate, and who would carry out any contract they might enter into, because they could be forced to do so; but if the Treasury is going to treat with such companies as my hon. Friend describes, the guarantees they might give would not be worth the paper they were written on. Supposing these transactions are to be honest and substantial, we ought to pass some such provision as that contained in the Amendment, even if it were only to save the Secretary to the Treasury from being constantly badgered by applications from insolvent companies.

MR. HALLEY STEWART: I think the Amendment too extreme in its scope. In the Grand Committee I supported a proposition that the Railway Company giving the guarantee should at least have paid some dividend during two or three years. I do not know whether the Solicitor General is in a more conciliatory mood than when we were in Committee, but if he be, he might make it clear that the Railway Company should be to some extent solvent.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I desire to connect the refusal of the Government to accede to this Amendment with their refusal to accept the Amendment moved by me that the railway should pay its which borrow money and never mean to pay it back then, I say we ought not to lend them any more. I am strengthened in that conclusion by what I see in the second part of this clause, by which you are going to make these grants to the promoters of Light Railways. Just think what you are doing. You are going to deal with promoters who may be mere nobodies. These promoters may make a bargain with the Railway Company which may absolutely be in arrears with its payments of principal and interest to the Exchequer, and the hands of the Treasury will be tied under this clause, for they will be compelled to hand this money over to the promoters, although the prospects of getting it repaid will be very slight indeed. I do trust that the Government will accept some reasonable Amendment in this matter. I do not think that we on these Benches are open to the reproach which has been levelled against us, that we are obstructing this Bill. We have adopted a proper Parliamentary plan. We have stated our objections with brevity, and as clearly as possible, and then we have divided upon them. Some of our Irish Friends have dignified that conduct with the name of obstruction. I say it is not obstruction at all; it is an ancient Parliamentary practice adopted by minorities in this House. We have none of us spoken long, and we have only asked for a reasonable answer. Now I wish to ask this: Is it fair to take the public money belonging to the taxpayers of this

But that is not so. We do not propose to lend money to an already insolvent undertaking. That would be opposed to all common sense. What we propose to do is to give money for the construction of new Railways. So far, therefore, from having the effect of increasing the liabilities of over-burdened undertakings, I would suggest that the extension of lines might have the effect of making existing lines solvent, if they are not already solvent. But I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that if we propose to make loans to Companies which at present cannot pay their arrears of interest, it would be a foolish mercantile transaction; and I repeat that that is not our proposal.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman seems to have overlooked Sub section 3 of Section 4, which says that the Treasury may give or lend the money. The Bill proposes to enable the Treasury to do the very thing which the right hon. Gentleman admits to be unreasonable.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The loan in such a case would not be made on the security of a bankrupt concern. It would be made simply for the construction of a new line.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to make the sensible admission that to lend money to a Company which already is in arrears with its payments on previous loans would be an unreasonable thing to do. I now call his attention to Sub-section 3 of Section 4, and ask him if he will be this Amendment in the interests of the taxpayers, not only of England and Scotland, but also of Ireland, the unfortunate people of which will have their rates made heavier by the extraordinary investments the Government intend to plunge into.

MR. BIGGAR: On the question of security, I should like to point out that unless the existing railway is able to pay its working expenses and its interest on borrowed money, there will be no real security for any money to be advanced for the purposes of an extension of the line, and I do hold that the Government should not encourage schemes of that sort.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: It seems to me that the argument used by the hon. Member for Lanark was that a bad business could not possibly be made better. I entirely differ from that view. I believe all business men in this country know that it is often through an extension of credit that a man is enabled to retrieve his misfortunes and pull up his business. I, therefore, hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will persevere with his opposition to this Amendment.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I would suggest that this matter of the policy of lending or giving money to a Company already in debt might much better be raised on Sub-section 3 of Section 4.

MR. STOREY: I hope the Government will accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman to consider this point at a subsequent stage of the Bill. If they will do that, I will consent to withdraw my Amendment.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Jackson, Leeds, N.): I think the right hon. Gentleman, if he looks into the matter, will see that what he said ought to be qualified to this extent—that the loan is only to be in regard to new works.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: We now come to the really contentious part of the Bill. Hitherto we have had smooth water and plain sailing, but from this point forward I am afraid the conflict as to principle will be considerable. The House may not be aware that at the point we have reached the alteration was made which we contend entirely changed the character of the Bill, and what I propose to do in this Amendment is to strike out words which were improperly imported from Part II. and leave this portion of the Bill as it stood after the Second Reading. The Amendment, as I have put it on the Paper, is, perhaps, too wide; therefore, I propose to omit the words from "or (b)" down to "Company." The scheme of Light Railway construction sanctioned by the Second Reading was first that existing Railway Companies should have assistance given to them by way of free grant, or loan, or annual payment, subject to such security as is afforded by the scheme of the old Act. That was Part I. of the Bill. The second part of the scheme—in Part II. of the Bill—dealt with all other persons promoting these Light Railways. They were not to receive grants or loans or annual payments, but guarantees. There were two elaborate securities, one of which was intended to protect the localities through which the railways ran, and the other of which was intended to protect the Treasury. By a soft and silent side-wind this important Amendment was introduced in Committee, whereby non-descript proprietors were introduced to benefit in Part I. without any of the securities which were originally imposed in their regard in Part II. It was thought that Irish Railway Companies having railways open for traffic at all events had a stake in the country and were Corporations with which the Treasury could deal. It was thought that they could be trusted to carry out the powers of the Bill, but, of course, no one could say the same thing with regard to promoters other than Railway Companies. Promoters other than Railway Companies were in no way defined in the existing Bill, and they are in no way defined in this Bill except under a phrase subsequently introduced on my own Motion in Committee which required them to be members of public Companies. Except that they are persons who have made an agreement with a Railway Company, or who have made an application that a Grand Jury should guarantee a dividend on the paid-up capital of a Light Railway, the promoters themselves are not defined. They may be anybody. We have had by anticipation a graphic description from the hon. Member for Cavan—who knows the whole question as well as anyone in this House—of the character, credit, and responsibility of these promoters. No one can pronounce an opinion on that matter who does not know Ireland well. I do not know it well, but the hon. Member for Cavan does, and he has given us his view of the matter. The object of my Amendment is to remove from Part I. of the Bill these nondescript promoters, who ought to be dealt with in Part II. The immediate question raised is whether these promoters, who make contracts with existing Railway Companies, should be admitted to benefits originally intended by the Bill for such companies only. The security afforded by a contract with an existing Railway Company would be inferior to that afforded by a Railway Company itself. The Government would be more safe dealing with companies having railways open for traffic than they would be dealing with promoters who merely say that they will get companies to work their lines if they have facilities for making them. I ask the Government whether it is wise to allow this clause to stand as at present framed. I propose to restore the Bill to the condition in which it passed the Second Reading, and I appeal to the deliberate opinion of the House, as pronounced on the occasion of the Second Reading, to support me.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 21, to leave out after the word "traffic," to the end of Clause 3.—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'or (b) where the promoters have made an agreement approved of by the Treasury for the maintenance, management, and working of the Light Railway by such a Railway Company' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member seems to think that the alternative is as between the Bill as it now stands and as it was originally introduced, but as a matter of fact it is as between the Bill as originally introduced and as it has been amended by the hon. Member for Cavan. If the hon. Member were to cut out that part of the Bill we are now considering the effect would be to render it of no value whatever to the distressed parts of Ireland. The hon. Member talks as if the only qualification is to be that the promoters have made some offer to a Company or some application to a Grand Jury. He forgets that the promoters have, in the first place, to run the gauntlet of the Grand Jury before whom anybody can be heard against them, and that in the next place they have to run the gauntlet of the Privy Council, which has shown itself most critical in examining their claims. Then an examination of increased stringency has to be made by the Irish Board of Works, and, finally, the Treasury has to approve of the scheme. Under the circumstances, I do not think the hon. Member need be in the least alarmed that bogus promoters will have the working of these lines in their hands. I trust the House will not allow itself to be alarmed into accepting an Amendment which would destroy what we believe to be one of the most valuable provisions of the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR: I think that instead of especially encouraging this clause of the Bill we should especially discourage it. It originally only applied to promoters under contract with Railway Companies, the idea being that Railway Companies possessing rolling stock would form a good security. May I point out it will be possible for the promoter under the present arrangement to disappear when he has got the money and there will then be nothing for the Government to fall back upon? I venture to warn the Government that unless they adopt some such safeguards their scheme will bring them nothing but disgrace.

MR. STOREY: I should like to point out that now the promoters will not have to go to the Grand Jury at all. They will be in a position to make an agreement with an existing Railway Company, and the result will be this: "A" goes to the Government and gets a capital sum for the making of a railway. He tells the Government before he gets it that he has agreed with the Railway Company to maintain and work the line. It is evident that the Railway Company do not agree to maintain and work the line without getting something for it, and you may be sure the consideration handed over to the company will be included in the sum obtained from the Government, together with all the promotion money, and the costs and charges in connection with the formation of the company. "A" thereupon sets to work to make the line. There is no sufficient security that he will make the line properly, either as to ballasting, weight of the rails, the class of the rolling stock, or the permanence of the buildings. We have no sufficient guarantee in the Bill that these matters will be properly attended to. He makes the line, there is a sort of examination by a Board of Trade official, and "A" then gets the money, and is done with the whole transaction, for he has bargained with the Railway Company to work and maintain the line henceforth, and he walks out of the business altogether. Is it not apparent to the right hon. Gentleman that in such a transaction you may get a promoter whose one business it would be to make the capital sum as large as possible and to carry the works out in as cheap and inefficient a manner as possible, so as to get as much as he can out of the transaction for himself? Ought not the Government to take steps to prevent such a case arising? We say that it will be possible under the Government scheme for promoters to act in this way, and therefore we are offering strenuous opposition to the Bill; and I believe that if this Bill had been before the Grand Committee in June instead of in August, and if we had had adequate opportunities for discussion, these dangers would have been amply safeguarded against.

The House divided:—Ayes 147; Noes 32.—(Div. List, No. 329.)

MR. COSSHAM: I now beg to move the adjournment of the Debate, and I hope the Government will agree to that Motion. We have been engaged on this Bill for eight hours, we have given every attention to it and have done our utmost to facilitate its progress. I hope the Government will now agree to an adjournment.

*MR. SPEAKER: I consider it my duty not to put that Motion. The House has, by resolution, expressly exempted the Bill from the Twelve o'clock rule, and in the face of that Resolution it would be unreasonable to put a Motion for adjournment at a few minutes after twelve.

MR. CHANCE: The Amendment I have to propose has relation to the tolls, rates, and charges, to be levied by the proposed Companies. Of course I admit that I have got some distance in the direction I desire to go, by the adoption of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. Clauses. But under that Act there is only power to fix the scale of maximum charges, not of the working charges, and, of course, there are the arrangements against undue preference and in favour of equitable running powers which that Act secures. But the powers of the Act do not give the Railway Commissioners power to carry out the spirit of this Bill and to see that rates are settled for the encouragement of the special industry on behalf of which the railway is promoted. Suppose the Government give £100,000 for the development of a fishing industry by the construction of a line, it is only reasonable that the Government should be satisfied that the rates and tolls for the conveyance of fish should be such as to encourage the fishing industry of the district; that, in fact, fish should be conveyed at an exceptionally low rate. As yet there is no provision in the Bill that the Treasury shall have this control, and therefore I move my Amendment. ■

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 23, after the word "Company" to insert the words—

"And for the tolls, rates, and terminal charges to be levied by such Railway Company in respect of such Light Railway."—(Mr. Chance.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 144.—(Div. List, No. 330.)

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I have now to move the omission of the words after the word "company" to the end of the sub-section.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): On a point of order may I ask whether the form in which the Amendment is put will allow of additions being made to the end of the sub-section?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; certainly.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The form of this sub-section was discussed upstairs, and though I thought the expression was unusual, I was assured it was usual and sufficient. But the substance of my Amendment is to prevent the bringing into this Act promoters who have no qualification other than that they have gone before the Grand Jury and proposed that the Grand Jury shall give a guarantee. I believe the form of the sub-section is taken from the old Bill, with this difference—that in the present case all that the promoter has to do is to apply for a guarantee for a portion of the paid-up capital of his concern. I do not know how the paid-up capital is to be advanced.

Another Amendment proposed is more completely violated every sound principle of finance, and I am sure that the effect will be to give every encouragement to bogus companies.

*Mr. CHANCE: I want to point out that this part of the clause, in plain common sense, really does require some modification. The soundest course would be to omit it altogether. When there ought to be. The Government assume that the promoters will act fairly and honourably, but while no doubt the majority of promoters will be honourable men, some may not be. You may see London financial agents going over to Ireland like swarms of locusts, and getting guarantees right and left for what they can make out of them.

*MR. MADDEN: The two things the public want are the construction of these lines and their maintenance. We provide for the construction, and it will be absolutely impossible for a line to be constructed unless the Treasury are satisfied that there is sufficient guarantee for its maintenance.

The House divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 26.—(Div. List, No. 331.)

MR. BIGGAR: I would point out that the clause as it stands would apply to cases in which the promoters of a railway propose "that a barony or baronies in a county should guarantee the payment of dividends." I move, as an Amendment, to strike out the words "barony or baronies," and to insert in their stead—

"District, said district in no case to extend beyond four miles from a station on said proposed new line."

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "barony or baronies," and insert the words—

"District, said district in no case to extend beyond four miles from a station on said proposed new line."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That the words barony or baronies stand part of the Bill."

*MR. MADDEN: Under Part II. of the original Bill there was a provision under which the district benefited would have been marked out, the cost being apportioned on that district. When the change was made in the Bill the proceedings come under the Act of 1883. This Amendment would be inconsistent with the Act of 1883, and contrary to the decision we have already come to.

The House divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 24.—(Div. List, No. 332.)

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, at end of Clause 3, to insert the words—

"Provided always, that no guarantee under this section shall exceed the amount of a rate of sixpence in the pound upon the net annual value for the time being of the several hereditaments and tenements within the benefited district in the county."—(Mr. Handel Cossham.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. BIGGAR: I will now move the next Amendment which stands in my name. I do not see why the guarantees should continue if the promoters are not able to carry out their contract, and I hope the Government will see the advisability of accepting this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 29, at end of Clause 3, to insert the words—

"Provided always, that all guarantees of whatever kind shall cease and determine as soon as any guaranteed line ceases to be worked for traffic."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. MADDEN: There are no guarantees provided for here. All that is provided for is the advance of money by way of gift or loan, but there are no guarantees under this Bill. The House has been more than once reminded that the Treasury will exercise their discretion in seeing that there is sufficient security for the carrying out of the working arrangements.

MR. STOREY: The hon. and learned Gentleman is surely wrong in saying there is no guarantee. There is a distinct guarantee from the Treasury, which has to pay one-half. Is not that so?

*MR. MADDEN: Yes, under the Act of 1883.

MR. STOREY: Very well, then; that is a Treasury guarantee to all intents and purposes. This being so, can anything be more reasonable than that, if a line prove to be a failure and cease to work, the guarantee shall also cease? The Royal Commissioners recommended that any assistance to be given under the Act should be under some provision for its ultimate discontinuance, and this Amendment is only carrying out that recommendation. If the Government are disposed to accept any Amendment that is at all reasonable, they ought, although we are in a minority and cannot enforce it, to accept this.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government cannot accept an Amendment which, if it were inserted, would render the scheme financially unworkable. The money could not then be borrowed on reasonable terms.

*MR. CHANCE: Under this Bill the Treasury bargain to pay an annual sum, and although, technically, that is not a guarantee, it is so practically. We ask that this annual sum shall not be paid if the line ceases working. Supposing the line is abandoned and disappears, is it reasonable that the payment should continue?

The House divided: — Ayes 26; Noes 134.—(Div. List, No. 333.)

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 29, at end of Clause 3, to insert the words—

“Or where the promoters show that such a guarantee in respect of a portion of their capital has already been given by a barony or baronies by virtue of any Parliamentary authority.”—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 9, after the word “respects,” to insert the words—

“(Including terms and conditions as to rates, tolls, terminal charges, and train services, as having special regard to the interests of the industries requiring to be developed and the circumstances of the district.)”—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

*MR. CHANCE: The next Amendment I desire to press is one to strike out from Clause 5 the word “promotion,” and substitute therefor the word “construction.” I do not know whether there is any special charm in the word “promotion,” but it seems to me strange that it should be used in connection with the Privy Council when the word “construction” will serve the same purpose.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 31, to leave out the word “promotion,” and insert the word “construction.”—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘promotion’ stand part of the Bill.”

*MR. MADDEN: On technical grounds I think the word “promotion” should be retained, as it is necessary to give the Railway Companies statutory powers to promote.

MR. CHANCE: Very well. It is a mere technicality, and I will therefore withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 36, after the word “made,” to insert the words—

“(a.) The first regulation contained in Schedule (A) to the said Act, Part I., shall be read and construed as if after the words ‘purchase of lands’ there were added the words and figure following, that is to say:—

(b.) The several parishes, townlands, and baronies in every county constituting the district proposed as the benefited district and the nature of the guarantee which is to be applied for from such district.”—(Mr. Chance.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 20th August, 1889.

EAST INDIA, BOMBAY-BURMA TRADING CORPORATION.

Address for—

“Return of Contract between the Secretary of State for India and the Bombay-Burmah Trading Corporation referring to the Teak Forests of Upper Burma, and Correspondence relating thereto.”—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

POOR RATES, &c., SCOTLAND.

Order [18th May] for a Return relative to Poor Rates in Scotland read, and discharged.—(Mr. Donald Crawford.)

QUESTIONS.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. HUGH ELLIOT (Ayrshire, N.): I beg, Mr. Speaker, to ask you the following question on a point of order:—Whether, when a scheme under the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Act, 1882, is laid upon the Table of the House of Commons, and an Address to the Crown is moved against such scheme, it would be in order, upon such Motion being put, to move that the said scheme be referred to a Select Committee to examine into the merits of the scheme and report to the House within the statutory period required by the Act for the consideration of these schemes by Parliament? I ask the question because to know what the procedure of the House of Commons is with regard to these schemes before they are actually laid on the Table.

*MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that I do not think it would be in order, when a scheme comes before the House in the circumstances stated by the hon. Member, to move an Amendment that that particular scheme be referred to a Select Committee. The course is prescribed by Statute that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to dissent from or amend a particular scheme, but a Motion such as that suggested by the hon. Member to refer a particular scheme to a Select Committee, would be outside the machinery provided by the Statute, and would have to be made if the hon. Gentleman wished to make it as an independent Motion.

THE NATIONAL SCHOOL, COLSTERWORTH.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he is aware that on Monday, 29th July, some 34 children of the National School, Colsterworth, Lincolnshire, were absent from afternoon school to attend a picnic of the Band of Hope Total Abstinence Society, under Nonconformist management; that the Rector of Colsterworth, the Rev. J. Mirehouse, a Trustee and Manager of the School, the following week ordered several of the school children to act as his amanuenses, and to write letters to the parents of the absentees, which he

"To Mrs. Wilson,— Your child, Kate Wilson, was absent from school on the afternoon of Monday, July 29. J. Wilson was told by the schoolmaster, as well as by me, that a half-holiday could not be granted. Instead of paying 2d. a week, as heretofore, you must pay from this day 3d. a week.

"JOHN MINNHOUSE."

Whether the master has refused to take the usual school fee from these children, the majority of them being kept at home in consequence; whether the Rector is entitled to raise the children's fees for the reason assigned; and if so, whether the Education Department has sanctioned his doing so; and whether the Vice President will urge the Rector to show some consideration for the wishes of Nonconformist parents whose children are obliged to attend the National School, especially as their absence is enforced when the school is closed on the occasion of the Church Sunday School festivals, and when closed earlier before and opened later after the Primrose League meetings that are held there?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed that the Rector offered to hold the afternoon meeting of the school an hour earlier than usual in order to set the children free to attend the picnic in question, and only declined to give a half-holiday because the children were backward in their work, and the school had been recently closed for a week and would shortly break up for the summer holiday. The Rector states that the letters dictated to the children were intended to test their handwriting, but I cannot defend his action in this respect; and he has been told that the children must be received back at the ordinary fee, or the grant will be endangered.

SCHOOL FEES.

Mr. HALLEY STEWART: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the fees have been raised from 2d. to 4d. per week to scholars attending the St. Matthew's Denominational School, Podge Hole, Pinchbeck West, near Spalding, a school in receipt of a Government Grant, and that, in consequence, several of the children have ceased to attend school, some not having attended for a inability of the parents to pay the increased fee, the next nearest school being fully three miles distant; and whether he will endeavour so to arrange matters that the children shall not be deprived of the advantages of elementary education?

*Sir W. HART DYKE: The attendance at the school in question is in excess of the accommodation, and as the school was said to be sufficient for its own district, the fees were, I believe, raised in respect of children living outside the district in order to reduce the numbers. There is nothing in this action of the managers to call for adverse comment; but the Department is in correspondence with them on the subject with a view to arranging the difficulty that has arisen in the most satisfactory way possible.

CIVIL ENGINEERS IN INDIA.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can now state to the House what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to redeem the pledges made by him on behalf of the Government, in the Debate on the 31st May last, to inquire into, and, if possible, redress the grievances of the civil engineers of the Public Works Department?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GOSW, Chatham): The recommendations of the Public Works Commission are still the subject of consideration by the Secretary of State and the Government of India. Until the changes consequent on these recommendations are decided upon no separate action in the direction suggested by the hon. Member can be taken.

HARROW WEALD DRAINAGE SCHEME.

Mr. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether there is any special reason for the continued delay in arranging and carrying out the drainage scheme at Harrow Weald; and whether he will call the serious attention of the Hendon Rural Sanitary Authority to the subject, and urge upon them the importance of getting the plans settled and the drainage works proceeded with?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. ERROLD,

Local Government Board, on the 8th of June last, communicated with the Rural Sanitary Authority of the Hendon Union with regard to their proposal to borrow for the execution of sewerage works for Harrow Weald. In consequence of suggestions at the inquiry some revision of the original scheme was made, and the Board advised the adoption of these alterations. The Board informed the Sanitary Authority that they did not consider that they could authorise a loan for any works which would increase the amount of sewage delivered upon the existing sewage farm until they were satisfied that no nuisance would be created, and that the effluent would at all times be properly purified before its discharge into the Kenton Brook. The Board accordingly requested that steps might be taken for the acquisition of additional land, and stated that when this had been done they would be prepared to entertain an application for borrowing powers in respect of the revised scheme. The Board were not informed of the result of the consideration of this communication until the Sanitary Authority were again communicated with with reference to the question of the hon. Member. I am now informed that the delay which has taken place has arisen in consequence of the negotiations for the hiring or purchase of adjoining land for the purpose of the sewage farm. I will urge the authority to secure a settlement of these matters at as early a date as possible.

IRELAND—HARBOUR ACCOMMODATION AT NEWCASTLE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries for 1888, page 36, where it is stated that "the fishing at Newcastle (County Down) makes no improvement, owing to the want of harbour accommodation" there; and, whether, considering the representations which have been made to him, the circumstances in connection with the destruction of the harbour works, and the danger to which the poor fishermen of Newcastle are frequently exposed for want of harbour accommodation, he can now say if anything will be done in the matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The statement quoted by the hon. Member proceeds not, as his question might seem to imply, from the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, but from the Divisional Officer of Coastguard. To be effective, any scheme for the improvement of the Harbour at Newcastle would cost more than the Government would be justified in spending at that place, and an answer in that sense has been sent to the Memorialists.

HEAD CONSTABLE M'DONALD.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, with reference to the recent action for libel brought by Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, R.M., against the Freeman's Journal and the hon. Member for North Kildare, whether he is aware that Head Constable M'Donald, of Newbridge, swore at the trial at last County Antrim Assizes that he (M'Donald) had not been in the Constabulary Barrack at Naas on the 19th November, 1888; whether the diary kept in Naas Barrack shows that M'Donald was there on that day; whether he will have inquiry made into the matter; and whether he will give a copy of the entry made in the diary on that particular date with reference to Head Constable M'Donald's visit to Naas?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The Constabulary Authorities report that Head Constable M'Donald's evidence at the trial referred to was as stated in the first paragraph. The entry made in the Guard's Diary at Naas Barrack on 19th November, 1888, was that Head Constable M'Donald and Constable Whitton, Newbridge men, arrived there on duty. Both these policemen appear to have been in Naas on the date in question, and to have visited the County Inspector's house on duty. But the constable is equally certain that neither the Head Constable nor himself entered the barrack.

THE COUNTY COUNCILS AND LICENSE DUTIES.

BARON DIMSDALE (Herts, Hitchin) I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to a Report issued by the Local Taxation Committee with reference to the response made by the English County Councils to his remarks on the 29th November, 1888, and the 15th April, 1889, on the reinforcements of the local finances for the amount lost to the ratepayers by the withdrawal of certain licenses enumerated in the First Schedule of the Local Government Act, 1888; whether it appears from this Report that 35 out of the 41 County Councils which have expressed an opinion on the matter, have invited action by Her Majesty's Government with a view of supplying the deficiency in the county resources; and whether he is prepared to consider the propriety of granting relief in such form as he may deem expedient, in order to place the ratepayers in the position indicated on the introduction and passing of the Local Government Act, 1888?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My attention has been called to the Report; but I do not know that the Resolutions of the Councils help much to the solution of the question. A large number of Councils have declared in favour of a "reinforcement of local finances," which, of course, all bodies of ratepayers' representatives must desire, but without suggesting any means of attaining that desirable end. It is only a minority which declares specifically for the wheel tax. None of the Resolutions come from borough County Councils, and as it was from the boroughs that the opposition which prevented the Excise Duties Bill being passed last year came, this seems to me a fact of great significance. I have given a good deal of consideration to the matter; but I do not at present see my way to meeting the views of the Councils. A further surrender of Imperial revenue is out of the question, and as for new sources of local revenue, I still know of none fairer than a wheel tax for the special object of maintaining roads. But I am afraid that experience has taught me that the opposition which any new tax, however reasonable, encounters is out of all proportion to the gratitude felt for any relief, however great, which such taxation affords.

TYPHOID FEVER IN THE WEST-END OF LONDON.

THE MARQUESS OF GRANBY (Leicester, Melton): I beg to ask the

Born Dimdale

President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the recent severe outbreak of typhoid fever in the West End of London, especially in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square, and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter; whether he is aware that it is stated that the sanitary arrangements of the St. George's Vestry are very deficient, especially with regard to the proper and adequate flushing of the sewers and main drains of that parish; and whether it is in the power of the Local Government Board to institute any inquiry on this point?

*MR. RITCHIE: My attention has been called to the outbreak of typhoid fever in the West End of London, and especially in the parish of St. George, Hanover Square. I have communicated with the vestry of that parish, and I am assured that they have a constant staff of men flushing the sewers at a large cost, and that the London County Council also have a staff of flushers for the purpose of flushing their main sewer. I have also received a provisional report from Dr. Corfield, the Medical Officer of Health of the parish, from which it appears that the outbreak took place almost entirely in the Mayfair sub-district. There were 14 houses in the parish where there had been cases. The outbreak was limited to houses of the better class, including some of the largest houses in the parish, and from the uniformity in the date of the attacks, and the fact that the sanitary arrangements of most of the houses where the cases occurred have been carefully carried out, the Medical Officer of Health has come to the conclusion that the outbreak was not due to any defect of sanitary arrangements, but to some temporary cause which has apparently ceased to operate. I have determined to direct an inquiry by one of the Inspectors of the Board.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I wish to ask whether it is the owner or the tenant who is liable for the sanitary condition of his house? I happen to live opposite a house where a case of typhoid occurred [Cries of "Order!"]—it is a very serious matter—and before I resided there there were five open cesspools, and I had to cart away 500 loads of soil—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to make a statement.

MR. ISAACSON: Then may I be allowed to ask whether it is the owner or the tenant who is liable for the sanitary condition of the premises?

*MR. RITCHIE: The liability depends entirely upon the terms of the lease. Generally speaking, I should say the tenant is liable.

MR. ISAACSON: If that is the case ought not the Sanitary Inspector to be compelled to make annual visits to infected houses to see whether the owners or tenants keep them in a proper sanitary condition?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid that it is rather a large order to say that the Sanitary Authority should be bound to visit these premises annually or send Inspectors to see that they are in a proper sanitary condition.

IRELAND—DERRY GAOL.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether complaints have reached him that the sewerage system of Derry is a tide locked sewerage, and that the Corporation, although aware of the defects of this system, have deferred the question of the proper ventilation of the sewers indefinitely; also that the sewerage of the gaol runs into this defective sewerage of the City; and, whether, inasmuch as the gaol is situated at the very summit level of the city, and necessarily becomes the receptacle of the sewer gases, which must rise up to it and escape through the ordinary sewer traps into the gaol, he will take steps to remedy this danger to the health of prisoners in this gaol?

MR. MADDEN: No complaints have reached the Government on the subject of the Londonderry sewerage system. It appears that the sewer system opens into the tidal river Foyle; but that the outlets of the sewers are protected by automatic tidal flaps, which are in good working order. The Sanitary Officer states that the prison sewer is connected with one of the city sewers within 250 yards from the outlet of the latter into the river, that at the junction of the two sewers there is a ventilator and syphon trap which completely separates any gases which might possibly be in the main sewer from the prison sewer, and allows of their escape, and

THE SUB-LAND COMMISSION AT MOHILL.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether the Sub-Land Commission, whilst sitting at Mohill on the 22nd July, received instructions to adjourn, after hearing only half the cases listed for hearing; whether he is aware that many of the cases left unheard have been entered since 1887, and that the rents in some of these cases are 100 per cent over the Poor Law Valuation; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will take steps to have the Sub-Commission return to Mohill, and, by disposing of the remainder of the cases, prevent much hardship?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners Report that the Assistant Commissioners did not receive the instructions alleged in the first paragraph. They had general instructions to hear a sufficient number of cases to keep them fully occupied on inspection duty up to the 22nd August, on which date their vacation commences. The Commissioners will, in accordance with their usual practice, arrange the next Circuit Lists having regard to the claims of the several applicants.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the sanction of the Treasury has yet been given to the Scheme put forward by the Irish National Teachers' Organisation, and approved by the National Board, for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the Irish teachers?

MR. GOSCHEN: The sanction has not yet been given. The Treasury have lately been concerned in the investigation of more than one important fund, in which, owing to defects in actuarial calculations, or unsound initial organisation, or changes made in the direction of laxity, sometimes called generosity, the fund is now not in a position to meet its liabilities. Great care has therefore been necessary in the examination of the present scheme, though Government money is not involved, as the scheme is to be self-supporting. I have been in communication with the Chief Secretary on the subject, and hope to come to a final agreement with the Irish Government very shortly.

BAND IN THE PHOENIX PARK.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will sanction the erection by the Board of Works of a suitable band stand in the Phoenix Park, Dublin?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that any application of the kind has been made to the Board of Works; at any rate, no knowledge of it has come to me. The usual course would be for the application to be made to the Board of Works, who will consider it when the next Estimates are framed.

MR. MURPHY: Will the Treasury accede to it?

MR. JACKSON: I would rather see the application before making any pledge.

MR. SEXTON: As the Vote for the Board of Works is about to be taken, would it be convenient for the hon. Gentleman to say whether the Board of Works have determined finally to give or refuse leave for a band to play on Sunday evenings in St. Stephen's Green?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware that there has been any change in the opinion of the Board, which I indicated when I answered a question put to me by the right hon. Gentleman a few days ago. I believe they hold the opinion very strongly that in view of the comparative quietude of the place—[An IRISH MEMBER, "No, no!"] I used the word quietude. ["No, no!"] Perhaps the hon. Member prefers to answer the question himself. At any rate I believe that great objections are entertained to giving the permission asked for, but I have already promised the right hon. Gentleman that the matter shall be inquired into.

H.M.S. SULTAN.

MR. BALLANTINE (Coventry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty why a Court Martial was not held to inquire into the cause of the loss of H.M.S. Sultan, in accordance with Sections 91 and 92 of the Naval Discipline Act; why a Court of Inquiry was appointed to investigate the question of the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief for the loss of the vessel after she had stranded, whereas a Court Martial was held to try the captain of the vessel for stranding her; whether it is the fact that Naval Courts of Inquiry have no power either to examine witnesses upon oath, or to determine judicially the questions submitted to them, but solely the power of making a Report of the Admiralty; and, whether, in the case of the Sultan, the Report of the Court of Inquiry concludes the matter?

MR. COBB: May I ask whether the actual loss of the Sultan took place when the Duke of Edinburgh was in command, and whether the effect of what has been done by the Court of Inquiry has not been to screen the Duke from being tried by Court Martial?

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): Will the noble Lord lay on the Table of the House official Papers relating to the loss of the Sultan?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It is not intended to lay any Papers before Parliament. As I have stated before, all the Papers in connection both with the Court Martial and the Court of Inquiry were sent to the public Press, and they have for a long time been in possession of the public. The right hon. Gentleman opposite is wrong both in his facts and assumptions. It is not true that any attempt was made to screen the Commander-in-Chief, who could not have been tried for the loss of the Sultan. In reply to the question on the Paper, a Court Martial having been held on the captain of the Sultan for the stranding of his ship, it was determined that it was unnecessary to hold another Court Martial on him for the loss of the ship, such loss being consequent on the stranding. The Court of Inquiry was not appointed to investigate the question of the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief, but to ascertain if every possible endeavour was made to save the ship after she was stranded. The powers of Naval Courts of Inquiry are as stated in the question. In the present instance the Commander-in-Chief could not have been tried, for if a further Court Martial had been considered necessary it must have been held on the captain of the ship. The answer to the last question is in the affirmative.

MR. BALLANTINE: Is it not the fact that the Commander-in-Chief was in command after the stranding of the vessel?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No, Sir, certainly not. Captain Rice was in command. When a ship is lost, the only persons who, under Sections 91 and 92 of the Naval Discipline Act, can be made responsible are the captain and those on board the ship.

MR. BALLANTINE: The President, in giving judgment upon the case, remarked—

"The Court considers, according to the charge of stranding, it is our duty to investigate what occurred up to the time you were relieved by your senior officer, who took charge."

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to appreciate what that means. The Commander-in-Chief superintended the operations which were made to get the ship off the rocks on which she was stranded. But it would be absurd and altogether contrary to precedent to make one man responsible for the acts of another man. It has been the invariable practice of the Navy, whenever a vessel has been lost, that the persons in the first instance to be charged are the captain, officers, and crew of the vessel. That was the case when the Captain was swamped. The persons tried by Court Martial for that ship were the gunner, and the survivors of the crew.

In answer to a further question by Mr. COBB,

*LORD G. HAMILTON said: If the hon. Gentleman made himself acquainted with the customs of the Navy he would know that it is impossible for the Admiral to take command of a ship and to supersede the captain.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury with reference to the answer given by the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) whether he is aware that no discussion took place on the loss of the Sultan at the time that the Admiralty Vote was taken, because an inquiry was understood to be pending; whether he is aware that the reports in the daily papers referred to by the noble Lord have been of the most meagre description, amounting at most to a column, and frequently to half a column; and whether, not as a matter of right but as a matter of courtesy and accommodation to Members of the House, he will not consider the advisability and propriety of laying before the House, not now but next Session, a full Report of the proceedings in this very important inquiry?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Though the question has been addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury, my right hon. Friend is naturally not conversant with the facts. I can only repeat what I have already said, that in my anxiety to give full information of all that occurred not only at the Court Martial but at the Court of Inquiry, a full and detailed Report of all that occurred was sent to the public Press. But it has never been the practice to lay the evidence and Report of an inquiry on the Table of the House, and I am not disposed to create a new precedent which, I think, might be very disadvantageous to the Public Service. With that single exception, the public has been put in full possession of all the facts of the case for some weeks past.

MR. ROBERTSON: My question was asked as a matter of convenience to Members of the House, and not for the information of the public. I knew the attitude of the noble Lord, and therefore I asked the First Lord of the Treasury to take into his serious consideration the propriety of giving Members of the House full information as to the proceedings and transactions of this important inquiry.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. and learned Gentleman will hardly expect me to give an answer at variance with that given by my Colleague the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty. I am not prepared to pass beyond established precedent in matters of this kind, and no one will recognise more readily than the hon. and learned Gentleman the importance of adhering to precedent in these questions. No doubt the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman will receive consideration.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Was it not a departure from established precedent to communicate a Report to the Press, which was not taken by newspaper reporters in the ordinary way?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Press attended the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, and when the doors were closed for the deliberation of Members, I undertook that the Report should be sent to the Press, so that it should be as available for the public as the evidence had been.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is not that a departure from precedent?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No; I believe that whenever a Court of Inquiry has been held with open doors, and the evidence is in the possession of the public, it has been the practice to send the result of that Court of Inquiry to the Press.

PUBLICATION OF ACTS OF PARLIAMENT.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will be kind enough to make such arrangements with the Queen's Printers, that henceforth all Acts of Parliament relating to Scotland shall be published within four weeks of their receiving the Royal assent?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I will endeavour to make the arrangement suggested.

IRELAND—LAW AND JUSTICE—CASE OF MICHAEL WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland is it true that Mr. Michael Walsh, who, on uncorroborated testimony which was contradicted by three witnesses, was, on the 12th instant, sentenced at Fermoy by Colonel Longbourne, R.M., to three months' imprisonment, in default of bail to be of good behaviour, on a charge of saying "Run on you——" to a policeman, was, on arriving in Cork Gaol, stripped of his clothes and had his hair and moustache cut off contrary to the Law applicable to bail prisoners; can he state why this was done, and who is responsible for it; and will any compensation be made to Mr. Walsh?

MR. MADDEN: As stated in reply to a Question yesterday, the sentence in this case was to find bail for good behaviour, or three months' imprisonment in default of bail. The General Prison Board report that it is the case that with his own consent the prisoner's moustache was trimmed and his hair also trimmed. He consented to wear the clothes referred to till he had obtained a further supply of linen from his home, as he was told that he should change his linen every week. This is in accordance with a statement made by the man himself on the subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Have the Prison Authorities any power whatever to do what they did in this case—namely, to compel a bail prisoner to put on the prison dress and to cut off his hair and moustache? Was the man informed that he was not bound to wear the prison clothes, and that there was no power to cut off his hair and moustache? Is it left to the Governor to say what the rules are?

MR. MADDEN: I will make a full inquiry into the facts of the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I will put a further question.

MR. HANRATLY, J.P., CROSSMAGLEN.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he is aware that one of the local Justices of Crossmaglen, Mr. Hanratly, has lately evicted some of his tenants and taken off all the crops; and, whether he is aware that Mr. Hanratly's bailiff is also summons server for the district; and, if so, whether it is in accordance with the regulations that a summons server should act as bailiff to a landlord in the district? I also wish to know whether he is aware that Thomas Morris, a merchant, of Crossmaglen, was summoned for fishing in a lake last July; that the case was dismissed by the Magistrate acting at the time; and that Mr. Morris is again summoned for the same offence, to be tried next September; whether Mr. Hanratly will act as a Justice on the occasion, in view of the fact that he had a dispute with Morris lately; and, whether Mr. Morris can be twice tried for the alleged offence?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone these questions. I have not yet received the information that would enable me to answer them.

THE VACCINATION ACTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that J. H. Matthews appeared on Monday before the Enfield Magistrates to answer a complaint of not having vaccinated his child when the child was produced in Court, and Dr. Warren, the medical attendant of the child, was called by Matthews, and swore that the child was in an unfit state to be vaccinated, and would, in his opinion, be unfit to be so vaccinated for at least a year, and that the Magistrates thereupon adjourned the summons for two months, ordering the defendant to find surety to them appear, and committed the defendant to gaol in default of sureties; whether the said J. H. Matthews had been previously, and how often, prosecuted for offences under the Vaccination Acts; and, whether the Government will take any action in the matter?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no information respecting the case referred to, except a newspaper report of the proceedings before the Justices. I understand from that Report that the defendant, without his being bound over to appear on the date to which the proceedings were adjourned, was permitted to leave the Court, but was warned that if he did not appear upon the day named he would have to bear the consequences. The Board have no information as to the number of occasions on which J. Matthews has been prosecuted for offences under the Vaccination Acts, and time has not admitted of inquiry being made on the subject.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause inquiries to be made in reference to this extraordinary new departure in the shape of vaccination prosecutions?

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman's question ought to be put to the Home Secretary and not to me. I have no power to interfere.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that J. H. Matthews was, on 19th August, summoned before the Enfield Magistrates for not having had his child vaccinated; whether the defendant pleaded that the child was then unfit to be vaccinated, and producing the child in Court called the child's medical attendant, who swore that the child was then in an unfit state to be vaccinated; whether the Magistrates, determining that the child was then unfit to be vaccinated, adjourned the summons for two months, and requiring the defendant to give sureties to appear at the adjourned date, committed him to gaol on his refusing to give sureties; and, whether, the Magistrates having so determined as aforesaid, such committal is warranted in law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have no knowledge of the case, and it is somewhat difficult to gather the facts from the question of the hon. Member, but I apprehend that Matthews was summoned under Section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, and upon the Magistrates adjourning the case declined to give security for re-appearance, whereupon the Magistrates committed him to prison. I am of opinion that such committal was justified by Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which applies to proceedings under the Vaccination Acts.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I venture to ask the Home Secretary if he will make inquiry, and if the facts turn out to be as stated, will he take action in the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I would rather not commit myself until I have inquired into the facts.

IRELAND—THE STATE OF DERRY GAOL.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he is aware that a woman named Rose Trainer, residing near Draperstown, was sentenced lately to a month's imprisonment in Derry Gaol for attempting to take possession of a piece of land from which she had been evicted some time ago; that she was released from prison on the 1st instant, and came home ill; that the medical officer of the district was called in to see her immediately on her arrival, and has since pronounced her to be suffering from typhoid fever contracted in Derry Gaol; that she was removed on Saturday last to the fever hospital of the union workhouse, Magherafelt, where she now is; and, whether he will consider the propriety of closing this prison, having regard to the danger to the lives of those incarcerated within its walls in its present pestilential condition?

MR. M'CARTAN put a question to the same effect and asked whether, under the circumstances, the Government would lay upon the Table of the House the Confidential Report of the doctor to the Prisons Board?

Mr. Bradlaugh

*MR. MADDEN: Rose Trainer was committed to Londonderry Prison on July 6 on a charge of assault and trespass. The medical officer of the prison reports during the period of her imprisonment she never complained of any illness and was in good health when discharged on August 3. The Governor reports that she refused to proceed to her place of conviction (Draperstown) by rail on the date of her discharge, stating that she had some friends she wished to remain with in Londonderry City, but how long she actually remained there he is not aware. From a telegram received, it appears that yesterday she was still ill at her home with typhoid fever and that she was visited for the first time on the 16th instant by the local doctor, who recommended her removal to the union hospital.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman seen a certificate from a local doctor which states that at the time of the woman's release from prison she was suffering from typhoid fever?

*MR. MADDEN: No; I believe she was visited for the first time by a local doctor on the 16th.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have Dr. Haggerty's certificate to that effect in my pocket, and I will put a further question on Thursday.

MR. SEXTON: Had the germs of typhoid fever manifested themselves at the time of the woman's release from prison?

*MR. MADDEN: All the doctor to the gaol says is that there were no symptoms of any disease at the date of her release.

DR. TANNER.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland has the Governor, Colonel Gaol, kept back books intended for Dr. Tanner, in order that they might be approved by the chaplain; what chaplain's approval does he intend to obtain; is Dr. Tanner's religion registered as "Independent;" and what is the name of the chaplain of that denomination attached to Colonel Gaol?

*MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to postpone this question. I have not yet received information.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It would only require a sixpenny telegram to Colonel *MR. MADDEN: A telegram has been sent, but a reply has not yet been received.

PUBLIC ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the following subjects can be, and are, taught in public elementary schools under the Code of the Education Department:—Botany; mechanics, with apparatus and experiments; chemistry, in laboratories; French, and French correspondence, and précis writing; commercial geography; shorthand; and German; and what subjects are taught in any public elementary schools under the Science and Art Department?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: All the subjects, except shorthand, enumerated in the first part of the question are taught under the Code. If the hon. Member will refer to page 11 of the calendar of the Science and Art Department he will see the subjects, any of which may be taught to scholars who have passed the Sixth Standard in elementary schools; no Return has ever been made as to the subjects actually so taught, and it would be almost impossible to have one prepared owing to the difficulty of separating these scholars from the other students, for whose instruction the elementary schoolroom is also used.

TELEGRAMS FROM RAILWAY STATIONS.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Stafford, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether Her Majesty's Government will, during the Recess, consider the desirability of enforcing some equitable arrangement by which all railway stations in the United Kingdom will be available to the public for despatching telegrams during the usual hours—namely, between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m.; and during the night, by paying an additional fee of reasonable amount, more especially with a view to facilitate sending police messages during the night from country stations to the neighbouring cities?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I shall always be glad to communicate with Railway Companies with regard to any reasonable application for the transaction of telegraph business at additional railway stations, but I am not in a position to enforce the performance of such duties at all stations. At many stations the companies do not, I believe, possess the necessary facilities. I stated, in answer to previous questions, that nearly 1,600 railway stations are already open for the transaction of telegraph business on behalf of the Post Office, and that this number is constantly increasing. Arrangements already exist whereby, on payment of an additional fee, telegrams can be despatched from Telegraph Offices after the usual hours when the attention of the Transmitting Office can be gained, and I hope there is no reason to think that the Railway Companies do not afford every facility in this respect in cases of emergency.

IRELAND—THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he is aware that the Land Commission have recently made a new rule requiring certain appellants to state, within 14 days of the date of a notice served by the Commission on the appellant, the ground of appeal intended to be relied on, and intimating to the appellant that if the form sent by the Commission is not received within the period stated, or if the information supplied is not such as to satisfy the Commission, the appeal will be liable to be struck out of the list and will not be listed again without a special order of the Court; whether this rule is intended to apply to all cases of appeal now entered for hearing; and, whether, considering that an appeal from the Sub-Commission or County Court is considered to be a re-hearing of the case, the Land Commission is acting within its powers in enforcing such a rule?

*MR. MADDEN: I have examined the notice referred to by the hon. and learned Member, which is substantially as stated in the question, and refers apparently to all pending appeals. The Land Commission inform me that after careful consideration they came to the conclusion that it was necessary in the interests of the parties concerned in appeals and of the Public Service that they should adopt the course specified in the notice in question. In my opinion, the Land Commission are acting within their powers in settling the lists of appeals in accordance with such a notice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was this a notice or a rule?

*MR. MADDEN: It was not a rule, but a notice calling upon tenants to give certain information for the purpose of facilitating the settling of the lists of appeals, and informing the parties interested that if they did not do so their cases might be postponed.

MR. M'CARTAN: What right had the Land Commission to circulate this order?

*MR. MADDEN: The Commission had a right to circulate a notice made for the purpose of getting information, in order that the lists of cases might be settled in the best manner; their action did not go beyond that.

ALLEGED POLICE CONSPIRACY—CASE OF TIMOTHY SHINE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the information of Timothy Shine, published in the Daily News of the 17th instant, and sworn at Newmarket Petty Sessions on the 16th instant, which alleges that a conspiracy to get up outrage and to murder Shine had been entered into between Sergeant Connolly (who is in charge of a police hut on the farm from which Shine was evicted) and a man name Jeremiah D. Murphy, who supplies the police with provisions; whether a summons was granted at Newmarket Petty Sessions against Connolly and Murphy on the charge of conspiracy; whether Colonel Aldworth, J.P., had previously refused to grant a summons in this case; whether it is intended to have the alleged conspirators tried at ordinary Petty Sessions or under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and whether, pending the trial, Sergeant Connolly will be suspended from discharging the duties of a police officer?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that Shine was brought before Colonel Aldworth, a local Justice of the Peace, charged with an attempted assault on Sergeant Connolly. The accused was let out on bail until Petty Sessions, to be held on 16th instant. When before Colonel Aldworth the man applied for a summons against the sergeant; but the Magistrate, in the exercise of his discretion, directed Shine to make his complaint in Petty Sessions. The Magistrates in Petty Sessions granted summonses against the sergeant and Murphy, and the whole matter, including the charge against Shine, was adjourned to Petty Sessions on 13th September. The proceedings are not under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act. The charge formulated by Shine against the sergeant is not one of conspiracy to murder, but to injure him. The Inspector General sees no reason to suspend the sergeant.

CLASSIFICATION OF RAILWAY RATES.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has observed by the proceedings of the Irish Railway and Canal Rates Association, that strong objection is taken by the Irish traders principally concerned to the proposal of the Board to have the classification, general conditions, and schedule of maximum rates made uniform throughout the United Kingdom, upon the ground of the great difference between the commercial circumstance of Ireland and Great Britain; whether strong objection is also taken to the arrangement by which the Irish objectors are called upon to appear at Whitehall in October to discuss the objections to the proposed classifications; and whether the Board will re-consider the principle of uniformity between Great Britain and Ireland, and will appoint a representative or representatives of the Board to hold sittings in Dublin, so as to obviate the inconvenience of obliging Irish objectors and witnesses to attend in London, and remain in London for an indefinite time?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; I have been in communication with the Irish Railway and Canal Rates Association on the point referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. While I am of opinion that it is desirable that the classifications, general conditions, and schedule of maximum rates of the Railway Companies should be, as far as possible, uniform throughout the United Kingdom, I am not prepared to say that there are no considerations applicable to Ireland which may make variety in the general conditions and schedules of rates desirable in the public interest. With this view I propose to arrange in due course for the holding of public sittings in Dublin.

REVISED EDITION OF THE STATUTES.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue future volumes of the Revised Edition of the Statutes, now in course of publication, with all the needless and useless expressions and repetitions which are expunged in the two first volumes, and with the obsolete, spent, and virtually repealed Acts or parts of Acts proposed to be repealed by the Statute Law Revision Bill (No. 371), or whether steps will be taken to continue the repeal of this useless matter as to future volumes, in order that they may correspond with the volumes already published?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot give an engagement that Acts which have not actually been repealed shall not appear in the Revised Edition of the Statutes until they have been repealed; I have no authority to do so. The Statute Law Revision Bill will be re-introduced next Session in order that it may be considered by the House.

In reply to a Question by MR. BRADLAUGH as to whether certain obsolete Statutes to which attention has been drawn would be included,

MR. W. H. SMITH said: The assistance of the Law Officers of the Crown will certainly be asked in a matter of this kind.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Would it not be advisable to appoint a small and strong Select Committee to consider the subject?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I will consider the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member. The Government will communicate all the information possible to the House.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any, and what, School Boards have been consulted as to the provisions of the Technical Instruction

Bill; and, if not, whether he will postpone further consideration of the Bill till their opinion on it has been obtained?

MR. W. H. SMITH: My answer to the hon. Member is that no School Boards or voluntary schools have been actually consulted with reference to the Technical Instruction Bill, but their representatives in this House and in the Press have carefully considered the subject. One of the oldest representatives of the School Board system, the hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division of Birmingham, has pronounced in favour of the Bill with the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Gorton. I am, therefore, not prepared to accede to the request now made to me by the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to go on with the Bill to-night?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

WEST INDIA MAIL CONTRACT.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the Papers relating to the new West India Mail Contract will be laid upon the Table; and whether, considering the importance of the question to the different West Indian Colonies, and also to the mercantile and proprietary interests in the United Kingdom connected with the West Indies, the Governments of the Colonies, as well as these representative associations or committees, have been consulted as to the terms of the contracts for which tenders have been invited?

*MR. RAIKES: I am unable to inform the hon. Member when the Papers to which he refers will be laid before the House. My Report on the subject is now under the consideration of the Treasury. Representations have been received and continue to arrive from the West Indian Islands interested in the question; and due attention has been given by the Government to the commercial interests involved.

THE LOTT ESTATE.

MR. ATHERLEY JONES (Durham, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received a Petition from one Alfred Charles Lott relating to an estate situate at Harrow, in Middlesex, of the estimated value of Government ought to have shewn whether the larger number of Assistants show that sioners. There ought certainly in tail of increase in the number of a voluntary sioners, and greater need the whole of sittings of the Comptroller, acting present moment one of that solicitor; attempting to deal has been drawn to counties. This is opinion of eminent the tenants, who Equity Bar has been rent which they expect that the said deed The tenants consequently made in pur-Hunts (whereof could not be made greatly the Crown claiming by escheat lieve of an heir; whether the facts be the case have been submitted by the Treasury to the opinion of counsel; and, whether, in view of the fact that money is being raised from various poor persons by the above-named Alfred Lott on bond, purporting to show that in the event of the Crown obtaining possession by escheat of the said estate he would be entitled to a statutory payment as informer, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury will deem it right to have the facts submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown, whereby an authoritative opinion on the rights of the Crown may be obtained?

MR. JACKSON: This question of the Lott estate at Harrow has been frequently before the Treasury and its legal advisers, and it was decided, after the most careful consideration, that there was no ground for interference on the part of the Crown.

THE IRISH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps I may remind the First Lord of the Treasury that there are still 70 Votes to take in Supply, many of them highly contentious, and that the Irish Sunday Closing Act is included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. Under these circumstances, I would ask whether the Order for the Second Reading of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill is to be kept on the Paper, thereby keeping Members interested in the matter in attendance until Supply is disposed of, although there can be no possibility of completing legislation on the Bill this Session.

MR. R. POWER (Waterford): I have only risen to say that the Sunday Closing Bill will meet with the most strenuous opposition. There are 17 notices of Amendment to the Second Reading, and these may occupy 17 days in discussion.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrona, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the question I wish to ask him whether in the month of January last, after the Act had been 10 years on the Statute Book, and renewed every year, having been passed in 1878, and after it had been reported favourably on by a Select Committee, he did not give a pledge to a deputation which waited on him at Dublin Castle—that pledge being one of the Cabinet—that the day for argument was past and the Bill must now be passed.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It is perfectly true that in January last a deputation of gentlemen, I think representing all Parties in Ireland, waited upon me at the Castle, and I told them after consultation with my Colleagues that though we should not bring in the Bill as a Government measure, we would do our best to enable a discussion to be taken on it in this House and for the Bill to be passed if the House should so decide. The House is aware now of the situation of public business, and the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), as representing some hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, has informed us of the strenuous opposition which this measure is likely to receive. There are now 20 Notices of Amendment down to the Second Reading, and if that stage should be passed, there would, no doubt, be Amendments in Committee placed on the Paper proportionable to this number. Under these circumstances, I fear it would be absolutely useless—speaking as a practical man, who has to deal with Parliamentary forces as they are, and not as I should wish them to be—to hold out any expectation whatever that it will be possible to pass the Bill, even if the House desired it, at this time of the Session. That is the decision we have come to, but with the most profound reluctance. We have had to sacrifice, as the House knows, many Bills of our own in which we are deeply interested, and to which we were pledged quite as deeply as we were to the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. I am sorry that Bill has to share the fate of other measures; but I think my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. T. W. Russell) will yield to what is, after all, an absolute necessity in this case, and I can only say if he regrets the course we are driven to pursue, he does not regret it more sincerely than I do.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to give notice that in Committee on the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill I shall call attention to the conduct of the Government in connection with the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. I shall also ask the Government what steps they propose to take to redeem their honour, and I shall also call attention to how utterly impotent this House apparently is to legislate on behalf of the Irish people.

THE IRISH PRISONS VOTE.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): It is intended to take the Irish Prisons Vote to-night, and if not when?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I offered yesterday to take the Vote to-day, but receiving no request from hon. Members below the Gangway I have decided that the Votes should go on in the ordinary way, the Land Commission Vote being taken to-night, and the other Votes in their order. I am still willing to take the Prisons Vote out of its order if hon. Gentlemen so desire. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that I have Dr. O'Farrell's Report on the condition of Derry Gaol in manuscript. I am unwilling to give it to the printers, as it would necessarily take some days to get out. But I am willing to place the document in the Library for perusal by hon. Gentlemen interested in the matter.

MR. SEXTON: I am most desirous to see the Report on the earliest opportunity. There are two reasons why I do not wish the Prisons Vote to come on out of its turn—first, because I want time to consider Dr. O'Farrell's Report on the vital question of the sanitary condition of Derry Gaol; and, secondly, because two of my hon. Friends who have been imprisoned under the Crimes Act will be at liberty to-morrow.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will do all I can to bring the Report of Dr. O'Farrell under the notice of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION BILL.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: When will the Technical Instruction Bill be proceeded with?

MR. W. does not make him a good taken-to-nights. It really seems to me hon. Friend antiism and the fixing of present.

CLASS III.

1. £73,214, to complete the sum for Irish Land Commission.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): The first observation I have to make in regard to this Vote is that I notice a decrease in the amount for the present year under some of the heads. Although the total net decrease is only £5,000, it is a decrease of which I think we have a right to complain. As there is a decrease in the salaries of the Assistant Commissioners, both legal and non-legal, it shows that to some extent the Government are attenuating the Commission.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): May I be allowed to explain. The decrease is purely apparent, and it arises from the fact that the Land Commission is only continued until the end of the year. It will be included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, and the decrease in the amount included in the Estimate is really a matter of account.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The explanation upon that point is quite satisfactory, but I only mentioned the circumstance in order to lead up to another point—namely, that the Government only propose in the Bill which they have brought in to appoint two additional Sub-Commissioners. In view of the glut of cases awaiting decision, the Government ought to have appointed a larger number of Assistant Commissioners. There ought certainly to be an increase in the number of Sub-Commissioners, and greater regularity in the sittings of the Commission. At the present moment one Commissioner is attempting to deal with two whole counties. This is a great hardship on the tenants, who have to pay arrears on rent which they do not really owe at all. The tenants of the hon. Member for Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) are suffering greatly from this cause, although I believe that the hon. Member cannot fairly be described as a rack-renter. The hon. Member has issued writs against his tenants for the full rent, notwithstanding the fact that they claim very large reductions. If that be the action of a landlord like the hon. Member, who is not a rack-renter, what is likely to be the action of rack-renting landlords? In many instances rents have been reduced from £30 to £15, and yet the landlords are, by the process of the law, exacting the full rent. We are asked, why not have recourse to the Acts of 1881 and 1887. I protest against the broad assertion of the Chief Secretary, and the still broader assertions of the right hon. Gentleman's much less informed Secretary, with regard to the effect of these Acts. The only way to test any law is by its application, and it will be found that in all the cases in which a desire has been expressed to come under these Acts, the Courts have refused to put the law in force, and have given the landlords their remedy. It may be imagined how much injustice is thus done to the tenants of petty landlords. The "staying" section of the Act of 1887 has proved to be of very little value, and is inapplicable where the rent exceeds £30. Of course, the substantial tenants are all rented above £30, and the result is that a man whose farm is valued at £100 has actually no remedy at all under the Act. It is altogether a different story if an action for ejectment is brought against him, but he has no remedy in an action for the recovery of rent. As to Section 30 of the Act, it only enables you to have a "stay" put on in order to prevent the sale of the tenant's interest, but not to prevent you from having your stock and farming utensils sold up. A more abominable enactment than Section 30 of that Act was never passed, and no legal adviser, unless he were a criminal lunatic, would recommend a tenant to have recourse to it. A tenant who applies under that section has to pay by instalments, and if he makes default by a single day in one instalment all his efforts are made nugatory, and he loses the whole benefit of the Act. Then there is unconscionable delay in the hearing of applications under the Act of 1887, and one tenant of the hon. Member for Hunts had to wait for two years. He was one of the persons who waited upon the hon. Member as a deputation some time ago, and immediately afterwards he was served with a writ. I cannot understand why justice is to be delayed and defeated in the Land Court. The Four Courts and the Civil Law Courts are open to every landlord who wants an ejectment. Why, then, should there be any delay in having recourse to the remedial Courts of the realm? I cannot help feeling that it is a very strong order indeed for the Government to allow the Land Law to be obstructed, impeded, and defeated in this way, owing to the weakness of the staff of the Court. From this Vote I find that the salaries of the legal Sub-Commissioners who hold office under the Act have been reduced from £6,000 to £4,500; and I claim that the tenants of Ireland should be no more impeded in their action than the landlords. They have a remedy which has been given to them by Statute, and they should be able to avail themselves of it without a month's delay. If we are to have this delay, then the process of the landlord should be delayed also. In my opinion, it would only be reasonable to enact that the tender of rent to the full value should be a bar to an action for ejectment. We may fairly complain of the bias shown in these appointments. First of all, these men are employed as if they were day labourers. We have attacked the Removables in Courts in Ireland, and I myself asked the Chief Secretary some time ago a question which, I think, neatly explains the position of the Sub-Commissioners. I asked him to explain why Mr. Cecil Roche was willing to give up a salary of £1,000 a year as Land Commissioner to take a salary of £450 as Resident Magistrate? The answer of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be—to use a Mitchelstown phrase—of a ricochet nature. He laid it down that Sub-Commissioners are removable; that the position of a Sub-Commissioner is frailer than that of a Resident Magistrate. The idea that a man who has to fix rent between landlord and tenant should be paid as a labourer by the day—should be dismissable at a moment's notice—is most appalling. Mr. Wrench shuffles these men about as he would a pack of cards; they are in his hands but a set of ninepins. Take the case of Colonel Bailey, a gentleman of large experience. He is no friend of ours, as his name well denotes. He has held his appointment since 1881. He is an honest man, and he has been shunted about from pillar to post. I have never seen him, and I have had no communication with him; but I notice that when he goes with Mr. Doyle's Commission he very frequently dissents from the ruling of Mr. Doyle, on the ground that the rents are fixed too high. Mr. Doyle is the gentleman who described the Mitchelstown tenants as a pack of howling savages, and, in consequence, Mr. Doyle himself is known as the "howling savage." Colonel Bailey is a judge of land, and in Waterford he said, "I dissent from the decision of the Court on the ground that the rents are too high." For a legal Sub-Commissioner to vote down a lay Commissioner who is a good judge of land is a course which is not to be defended for a moment. I regret that Mr. Doyle is taking such a course. I think the proper course to pursue in a case when the two lay Commissioners disagree as to the fair rent is for the two to strike some average between them. It is not a good system; but you must come to a decision one way or the other. If the course I suggest were pursued, we should have something like an approximation to what Colonel Bailey thinks a fair rent. Now, there have been about 100 Sub-Commissioners appointed since the Land Act was passed. I am sure I am within the mark when I say that of the 100 there have not been six tenant farmers. Again, three-fourths of the people of Ireland are Catholics, but not 20 out of the 100

Articles it does not make him a good judge of turnips. It really seems to me that Protestantism and the fixing of rents go hand in hand. You go to the landlord and the agent class for your Sub-Commissioners. I protest against a gentleman like Mr. Wrench ringing the changes upon the Sub-Commissioners. Under the Act of 1881 you had the greatest chance you ever had of quietening the country as you call it, but instead of working that Act fairly and thoroughly and determinedly you appointed gentlemen to fix rents so high that in 1887 you had to pass an Act to enable the rents to be adjusted. You are doing the same thing now. The rents are being fixed abnormally high, because the men who are fixing them are men of the landlord class, and men with landlord sympathies. I wish we could see a schedule of the reductions of rent made in England without the operation of law. I am sure the Chief Secretary himself has given far greater reductions to his own tenants than the Irish Land Commissioners have given to the Irish tenants, and yet he has not been able to go about and talk about spoliation and so forth. I now come to the action of the head Commission. The Chief Secretary really ought to do something in regard to the question of appeal. Of all the farces that ever were invented the appeal to the head Commission is the greatest. I say that in the interest of both landlords and tenants. If anybody wants to see a curiosity let him go into the Land Commission Court when an appeal is being heard. Lawyers get their fees, but they take them with regret, because they can do absolutely nothing for their clients. Three gentlemen who have never seen the farms, and never will see them, proceed to reverse the decisions of three men who have visited the farms. The system of appeal is an absurdity. It is simply a method for harassing the tenants, because landlords often insist upon higher rents than those fixed, threatening if they do not receive them to appeal. If there is a question of law to decide the head Commission is a very good tribunal. I do not attack the tribunal as a legal tribunal, but it ought grounds. A man's rent may be £40; the Court below fixes it at £30; the head Commission fixes it, say at £31 7s. 6d., which is an absolutely grotesque proceeding. How gentlemen can take part, and take £3,000 a year for taking part, in a farce of that kind I cannot understand. But, of course, every human institution is infirm, and the head Land Commission is amongst the most infirm of all human institutions. Under a schedule of the Act of 1887, which was passed with the intention of enabling the Commission to grant abatements of rent, the Commission raise the rents en masse. The history of the Act of 1887 was certainly very curious. Between Devonshire House and Birmingham, and this House and lobbying, and Star Chambering, and what Lord Salisbury said in the House of Lords, which was swallowed in the House of Commons, the Act was one of the most remarkable pieces of steeple chasing legislation which was ever witnessed, but it got through. The original section was altered in this House, and I ventured a prophecy which I never believed would eventuate in a reality. I said the section was one to enable the Land Commission to raise the rents. I did not believe it would do it—I did not think it would have the cheek to do it—but it did raise the rents. It is a nice question whether it was legally competent for them to do it, or for two of them to do it without the agreement of the third. Mr. Justice O'Hagan dissented. In the Report made to Parliament on the question of what is called the adjustment of rent, it was stated—

“Mr. Justice O'Hagan felt himself unable to concur in signing the Order of the 18th December instant, or adopt the Schedule as sanctioned for the same reason assigned by him and reported to your Excellency in January, 1888—namely, that in his opinion the 29th section bestowed on the Commission larger power for determining what alteration should be made in judicial rents having regard to prices and yield.”

That was our argument at the time the section was passed. What do Mr. Litton and Mr. Wrench say as regards that section? and herein lies another of the frauds this House, no doubt unintentionally, committed against these tenants. They say—

“We are precluded by the Act of Parliament from taking into consideration the question of the yield of the various agricultural produce.”

Why does not the right hon. Gentleman bring in a clause to amend the provision in the Act of 1887, which sets up price as the only standard of rent? According to the view of Messrs. Litton and Wrench, if there is a dearth in the country and corn rises 100 percent in price those people who have not grown corn would have their rents raised with those who have grown corn. It does seem to me, therefore, that this Government, if it really were what it pretends to be—a paternal Government—would at once amend the law which declares that yield was not to be taken into account, but price only. How is it that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary is always boasting about his attempts to make law and order respected? How can law be respected when it is not respectable? It is not respected, and you cannot make it so by means of such men as Cecil Roche. I should have thought that, under the circumstances, we should have had an amending Bill. I would advise the right hon. Gentleman to take the Irish Members into his confidence; they would help him to put some clause into the Judicial Rents Bill which would not be too high for the stomach of the House of Lords, but which would very considerably mitigate the present state of things in Ireland. We know he will not do that. The only Bills which the right hon. Gentleman brings in are such as the Irish people do not want; and a Bill that would do any good to the country has to be thrust on the right hon. Gentleman by agrarian revolution, outrage, disorder, and distress. The ears of this Parliament are deaf, and it cannot hear unless addressed by the public through some intimidatory speaking trumpet. I have not the smallest doubt that if the people of Ireland refused to pay their rents, or something of that kind happened, we should have some alleviation of the present state of agrarian matters, but without momentum the Government and Parliament will not act. I think the Land Commission were very badly advised in acting contrary to the manifest intention of Parliament and raising the rents. This was a question of the construction to be put upon an Act of Parliament, and the legal head of the Commission, Mr.

Mr. T. M. Healy

Justice O'Hagan, gave it as his opinion that the Commission was entitled to take into account both yield and price, but Mr. Wrench, an English gentleman, a lawyer, no doubt, but appointed as a layman, sets up his legal opinion against that of Mr. Justice O'Hagan. Of course, the Commissioners adopted a strained interpretation of the Act, and we know why they did it. It was because their tenure is insecure, and they are exposed to the influence of the Kildare Street Club, which is, indeed, the most important factor in the Land Commission. The Kildare Street Club represents the landlords of Ireland. It is from there, rather than from the Castle, that Ireland is ruled; the Castle is, in fact, only the ante-chamber or Executive Chamber of the Kildare Street Club. The members of this Club meet and condemn "Those blackguards of the National Party." They say, "So-and-so has made a bad speech; he must be prosecuted;" "So-and-so must be made a Resident Magistrate;" "My rents have been cut down by that blackguard So-and-so, and he must be shifted." I say these Commissioners should have security of tenure in their appointments. It is a monstrous thing that the right hon. Gentleman can cease to employ them at any time. It has been stated in the newspapers that the Government have a Bill in the pigeon-holes of Dublin Castle by which Mr. Litton was to have been deprived of his appointment altogether. That may or may not be the fact, but it was so stated, and when a man is drawing £3,000 a year it is only natural that such a statement should affect his nerves. It would mine under similar circumstances when I had regard to my little family. These gentlemen may be above the ordinary laws which govern the apprehensions of mankind, but my own experience is that one man is very much the same as another, and that making him a Judge and putting him in horse-hair does not always endow him with the true attributes of a judicial position. I maintain that something should be done in the case of these gentlemen to give them a suitable tenure of office. If that is done, and they are relieved from the embarrassment consequent upon the present system of intimidation, so much the better will it be both for landlords and tenants. Landlords write to the Times and to Dublin Castle, and these men whether rightly or wrongly, know that the landlords wield enormous influence. Whether they do or not, they should be relieved of the reproach that can now be cast at them; and I do trust that, under the circumstances, the Government will take the course that will put the Land Commission in a sounder position for itself and for the litigants who come before it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, a good deal that has fallen from the hon. and learned Member has more direct relation to the failure of legislation passed by this House in previous years for the Irish tenants, and the particular view the hon. and learned Gentleman takes as to the course this legislation ought to have followed, than to the matters connected with this Vote. He began by reproaching the Government for not having done more in the way of increasing the Sub-Commissioners in order to deal with what the Government admit to be an unduly large amount of arrears. I would remind the hon. Member of two things. In the first place, the Government have attempted in the present Session, as well as in the last, to introduce legislation which would have had the effect of diminishing the amount of arrears, and which would not have been open to the objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman of depriving the tenant of the value of his improvements. Of course, if it had done that it would have stood condemned at once. We do not think it is open to that criticism. It was, therefore, with very great regret that the Government saw the determination of hon. Gentlemen opposite to oppose this legislation—which opposition, having regard to the period of the Session, they can, no doubt, bring to a successful issue. In addition to these Bills the Government have done much to increase the number of Sub-Commissioners. Before the Act of 1887 the number of Sub-Commissioners was 20, and the number of Sub-Commission Courts was four. Now, the number of Sub-Commissioners is 70, and the number of Courts in which they act is 10; and these Courts are far more expeditious in their working than the previous Courts, because the relative number of legal Sub-Commissioners has been diminished. Originally there were two lay Commissioners to each legal

Commissioner, and now the proportion is six to one. But this enormous increase of the staff has not been sufficient to reduce the arrears as much as could be desired. The Government may be driven to increase the number of Sub-Commissioners; but I would remind the Committee that it is not a light matter to make a great increase in the staff. The number of persons capable of undertaking the responsible functions of Sub-Commissioners is not unlimited; and it is a very great evil to be arbitrarily increasing and diminishing the number of the Sub-Commissioners according as the business increases or falls off. The hon. Member reminds us that these Sub-Commissioners are all removable, even more than the Resident Magistrates. How can it be otherwise if the policy recommended by the hon. Member is to be carried out, for his policy is to adapt the number of Sub-Commissioners to the number of cases to be dealt with. If that be done it is impossible to give fixity of tenure. There were 20 Sub-Commissioners a year or two ago; now there are 70; and the hon. Member would make the number 90 or 100. Are they all to have fixity of tenure at £1,000 a year, whether there is business for them to do or not? [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Appoint for a term.] Appointment for a term would not remove the objection that has been taken that the Sub-Commissioners are more or less servants of the Executive. Appointed for terms they would have to be re-appointed or dismissed, and their dependence would be as great as it is at present. The two parts of the hon. Gentleman's criticism of the Government destroy each other, and if he wishes to increase the number of Sub-Commissioners for the purpose of reducing arrears of business, he cannot expect the Government to give permanence of tenure. The Chief Commissioners, however, are in a different position. The hon. Member for Longford a few days ago criticised the continuance in office of the Chief Commissioners from year to year by an annual Bill. I hoped both last year and this year to pass a Bill to remedy what I recognise as a defect. In the ensuing Session we hope to pass a Bill which will give permanent tenure to these officials, who after all discharge high judicial functions. Attacks on the impartiality of all the Commissioners are to be expected, and I do not see how they could be avoided, but I regret that the hon. Gentleman should take part in them. It is inevitable that Commissioners charged by Act of Parliament with the duty of fixing rents should be accused of partiality by one side or the other. It was foreseen that this would be so; but I trust the Committee will abstain from attempting to review the decision of the Land Courts. In my opinion, the head Commissioner acts according to the direction of the Act of 1887 in having regard only to the alteration in prices. The complaint has been made that judicial rents fixed in 1883-84 were fixed when prices were high, and that it is wrong to maintain the rents so fixed when prices have fallen.

Mr. T. HEALY: It was contended at the time that the clause would enable the Commissioners to take yield as well as price into consideration.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I should be surprised if any declaration of that kind could be found in the speeches of any Member of the Government. At all events, the attack upon judicial rents was based upon prices and not upon yield; and the consideration of yield would have injured the tenants, because in nearly all agricultural crops the yield has been above the average this year and last, and the augmentation of rents would have exceeded the reduction of them. I have now noticed all the points that were strictly relevant to the Vote, and I trust that we may be allowed to pass on to other Votes and to make progress with the Estimates.

Mr. M. HEALY (Cork): Sir, the only satisfaction which I can derive from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is the promise which he has made to increase before long the number of Sub-Commissioners for the purpose of getting rid of the enormous arrears of land cases now pending in the Land Courts. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the present state of things in the Land Courts is most unsatisfactory. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say some three weeks ago that there were no less than 47,000 fair rent applications pending before the Commissioners, and that they were being disposed of at the rate of 2,700 a month, a rate which, existed ing holiday months, would occupy the next two years. The right hon. gentleman is aware that during that two years the tenant would be liable to pay full rent. I have had a great deal of experience in the Land Courts, and I can confirm in the strongest manner what my hon. Friend has said, that for the purpose of protecting tenants against evictions while the fair rent proceedings are pending, the equitable Sections of the Act of 1887 are not only useless, but are worse than useless; in fact, an absolute danger to any tenant who may unwisely endeavour to take advantage of them. The landlord can almost in every case, if he pleases, evade the provision of that Act, because all he has to do is to take proceedings in the County Court, and serve his writ upon the tenant for the debt due to him. I can promise to any landlord who does so that the provisions of the Act of 1887 will prove no obstacle to him. The cost of going to the superior Court would be too heavy for the unfortunate tenant. In the first place he would have to pay his own costs of the application, which would amount to £7 or £8, and he would have to pay the landlord's costs as well. I did succeed in getting an appeal in one case, but the costs which the tenant had to pay amounted to £50. It is nothing short of a scandal that the Government should make no practical attempt to expedite the fixing of fair rents. The right hon. Gentleman has compared the staff of Sub-Commissioners now at work with the staff in operation just before the Act of 1887. A more absurd comparison I never heard of. The staff which is now in existence was necessarily called into existence to deal with the mass of cases which turned into the Courts when the Act of 1887 was passed. He should have made comparison with the staff in operation in 1882 or 1883, and he would not have found that serve him very much. The Act of 1881 enabled the Land Commissioners to appoint as many Sub-Commissioners as might be necessary, after first obtaining the consent of the Treasury, who limit the number of Sub-Commissioners whom they have to pay. The Treasury have sanctioned a number at least four or five in excess of the number of Sub-Commissioners now actually at work; and the smallest effort of the Chief Secretary in that direction would induce his friends at the Treasury to appoint a much larger number. The Chief Secretary says he brought in a Bill last year to deal with the enormous mass of cases before the Land Commissioners at present, but there were objections to many of the clauses of that measure. My hon. Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) has said that the Bill involved confiscation of the tenant's improvements; but I am further convinced, even if that danger were not present, that the Bill of the Chief Secretary as it stood would be absolutely useless for any purpose whatsoever. The Land Commissioners, I would add, under the Act of 1881, have full and complete powers to do what the Bill proposed to do, under another name—namely, instead of getting the work done by Sub-Commissioners, to get it done by Court valuers; but I cannot see how a difference in name makes a difference in substance. It appears to me that all the Bill of the Chief Secretary proposes to do is to confer on Assistant or Land Commissioners the powers which are already possessed by the Court valuers, and which have been found absolutely useless for the purpose which the right hon. Gentleman has in view. I have only one word to say as to this Bill; it would necessitate the appointment of a large number of Assistant Commissioners for the purpose of working it, and if that is so, why on earth cannot he use the power which he undoubtedly possesses of appointing Sub-Commissioners to work the existing Act. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not permit the present state of things to continue, and that he will appoint additional Sub-Commissioners. My hon. Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy) says the Commissioners are removable, and are, therefore, open to influences of an improper kind, and to that the right hon. Gentleman replies that the additional appointments would involve the element of removability. But the complaint is that the present system combines the element of removability and insufficiency of staff. It does not, therefore, lie in the right hon. Gentleman's mouth to use that argument. When the Act of 1881 passed, the Commissioners were under the necessity of appointing Sub-Commissioners to deal with the exceptional pressure of work, but they divided them into two categories—those who were to be permanently employed and those who formed the removable staff. Why does the right hon. Gentleman not follow that example? I see nothing whatever in this argument of irremovability, and I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will carry out the promise he has made of increasing the number of Sub-Commissioners. So much for the general working of the Act. But I have a special complaint to make. I have practiced in nearly every union of the County of Cork, and I have to complain in the strongest manner of the way in which that county is treated in this matter. On the passing of the Act of 1887 the County Cork had a staff of Sub-Commissioners—three Commissioners and four Assistant Commissioners, subsequently receiving the addition of two Sub-Commissioners. That staff was adequate to the requirements of County Cork, but the County of Waterford in 1888 was deliberately added, and thus the time of the Commissioners devoted to the County Cork was reduced. Very inconvenient results have followed. At the present rate of progress the balance of work in the County Cork will take three years to dispose of. I find in other counties that the average number in unions within the jurisdiction of the Sub-Commissioners is 17; of the County Cork it is 25, which shows that the latter county is not being fairly treated. The present arrangement is most absurd and inconvenient. At present the two lay Commissioners are sent together to the County of Waterford. The other four are in the County Cork. The two legal Commissioners and the Registrar have to go backwards and forwards between Waterford and Cork. In March last the Commission sat at Bantry, in Cork, and from there the legal Commissioners and the Registrar had to travel 100 miles to a place in Waterford. Next week they travelled 100 miles back to Skibbereen, in Cork, which is only about 20 miles from Bantry, where they could have gone in the previous week in a couple of hours. From Skibbereen they journeyed 150 miles to Dungarvan, in Waterford, and from Dungarvan they journeyed back to another place in Cork. Hampered by these absurd conditions, it is impossible that the Commissioners can get through their work. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to put an end to such a state of things, and give the County Cork a Sub-Commission to itself. One of the Commissioners died three months ago and the vacancy caused has not been filled up. It seems to be the present policy not to increase the number of Commissioners but to actually reduce them. Let me point out to the right hon. Gentleman that all his efforts seem to have been directed to getting rid of the hearings in Court, which are a part of the proceedings that occupy least time. In the County Cork the Commissioners can get through sufficient cases in two or three days to keep the lay Commissioners inspecting for months. The hearing in Court does not occupy more than a quarter of an hour in each case. The right hon. Gentleman is beginning at the wrong end. He should first endeavour to quicken the inspection. His Bill would only meet the case where there is no question of law involved, and where there is no question of law involved the case only occupies 30 minutes. The right hon. Gentleman will gain very little by getting rid of that 20 minutes' hearing, and he will deprive the tenant of the satisfaction he feels in having his case dealt with by a public tribunal. On the subject of appeals, I ask the right hon. Gentleman to carefully consider whether we should not abolish altogether appeal on the question of value, and restrict it to the question of law, on which it is the most proper that both landlords and tenants should have the right of appeal. I think there is general agreement on that point, because it approaches burlesque to see these gentlemen, who know nothing about land, and who are appointed for legal and administrative purposes, hearing an appeal as to the value of a farm which they never saw, and that appeal taken from two gentlemen who are appointed because of their special knowledge about land, and who have gone over the farm on which they have given a decision. That is a matter to which I venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give his consideration.

**Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Co. Tyrone):* Sir, the Chief Secretary for Ireland has stated that the yield of all agricultural produce in 1888 was very much better than the yield in 1887. That remark, however, cannot be taken as applying to potatoes, because, compared with 1887, there was a diminution in the yield of potatoes in 1888 of over 1,000,000 tons. That was a very important factor in many of the poorest districts of Ireland. The number of Sub-Commissioners for which the vote is asked is 70. In 1888 there were 24,000 cases decided; but 6,000 of these were decided by agreement out of Court, so that the actual work of the 70 Sub-Commissioners is brought down to 18,000 cases a year, or 1,500 a month. I can understand how the 70 men only manage to get through 1,500 cases a month after what has been said as to the way in which they travelled about the country. The sooner the Chief Secretary for Ireland takes the Commission in hand the better. But there was another reason for the delay in the settlement of cases. The hon. Member for Longford has spoken of there being a good deal of human nature about the Commissioners in relation to their removability. The Sub-Commissioners are now paid by the day, and it was only human nature for them to lengthen out the job as much as they can. As long as these men are paid by the day the work of the Commission will drag on and the tenants will suffer. Then with regard to appeals, a farmer lodging an appeal is forced to the conclusion that it will be two or three years before his appeal was heard. This ought not to be. What is now done? Two experts are sent down to value the land for the purpose of fixing the rent. The appeal from them is given to three men, who know nothing about land and who send down a valuer. [Mr. T. M. HEALY and Mr. M. HEALY: No.] That makes the matter worse. A valuer used to be sent, and upon his recommendation the decision was given. But even then it was simply one expert in land against two. I, therefore, beg the right hon. Gentleman to give a position of something like permanence to the Commissioners in the Bill, which I hope will be brought forward next year. I trust, also, that the appeal will be restricted to questions of law only. In one of the Returns presented under the Ashbourne Act a sale is recorded in County Galway by the Land Investment and Settlement Company, and I wish to know what the tenants paid in the shape of years' purchase for their holdings, and to whom the Land Commission paid the money.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I think, Mr. Courtney, it is impossible to exaggerate the hardship and inconvenience to all parties, and especially to the tenants, which are caused by the delay in hearing cases under the Act of 1887, and the great cost which that delay involves. In 1887, when the last Land Act was under the consideration of this House, I ventured to propose a plan by which those difficulties might be got rid of. That proposal had the assent at that time of all the Irish Members.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir, I rise to a point of Order. Both the hon. Member for Longford and the right hon. Gentleman propose to discuss the legislative methods for dealing with the block in the Land Court. I have no objection to the discussion of those schemes, but I would like to know whether, if they are discussed, I shall be at liberty to make a full answer.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I discussed this very question last year at some length in Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The action of the Commissioners can be discussed on this Vote, and it is quite competent for hon. Members to suggest methods for diminishing the arrears still pending. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Longford did, no doubt, enter at considerable length into an examination of the Statute of 1887, in order to show that it did not get rid of the difficulty of arrears, and it is quite competent for hon. Members to discuss facilitating measures.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I proposed a method of dealing with arrears which received the full assent of Irish Members, and which, if adopted, I believe would have cleared them off, and saved the State a vast expenditure of money. My plan was this—to take holdings under £30 and to apply to them an average of the decisions of the Commissioners with respect to holdings of the same size, and provisionally to fix their rents at the same proportion without reference to valuation, allowing either party the right of appeal to the Land Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman has taken credit to himself for having made proposals to lessen the amount of the arrears, but it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman's method is based on the principle of not consulting the Irish Members on a subject with which they are intimately concerned. I feel satisfied that if he entered into consultation with the Irish Members and made a proposal in the direction I have suggested, he would find it possible to clear off the arrears. For my part, I look with some hesitation and dismay on the proposal to increase the number of Sub-Commissioners. I think there is great force in the remark of the hon. Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) that the method of pay by the day accounts for the slow progress the Sub-Commissioners make—only 1,500 cases a month.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not accurate.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: At all events, the amount of work done is not large. I entirely agree with what the Chief Secretary said as to the inexpediency of increasing the number of Sub-Commissioners, and I agree that the more you multiply their numbers the more difficult it will be to give them security of tenure. The hon. Member for Longford observed that when the Act of 1887 was passed, the Commissioners were not to increase the rent under the schedule of prices. It was never for a moment suggested that the rents should be increased, but that they should be reduced according to the fall of prices. And the hon. Member for Carnarvon proposed that the Commissioners should take into account the yield of crops as well as the prices. I certainly understood from the Debate that the Chief Secretary practically admitted that it would be within the competency of the Land Commissioners to take into account the yield as well as the prices. The hon. Member for Carnarvon withdrew his Amendment. But of this I am quite sure that if at the time of the Chief Secretary to consider, instead of increasing the number of Sub-Commissioners, some such scheme as I have suggested.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Sir, I am afraid that the plan which the right hon. Gentleman has suggested would not work well, because of the diverse conditions of the different holdings—some having been reclaimed from mere bog, and others which had been entered upon in a better condition. It would be difficult to apply to such holdings the same average of reduction. As regards the prices of 1888, I think the Chief Secretary will find, on close examination, that he is very much mistaken, and that the average prices of 1888 were worse than the average of 1887. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman contains a fallacy as remarkable in its way as anything which he has foisted on the House since he became Chief Secretary. He says that the prices ought only to be taken into account by the Commissioners. When the Commissioners originally fixed the rents, between 1882 and 1885, they took into account both prices and average yield, and surely when they come to revise the rents they are bound to adopt a similar course. The worse the year the higher the price may be; and if they only take into account the prices, they may be compelled in a year of absolute famine and starvation to raise the rents. I cannot conceive by what course of reasoning the right hon. Gentleman, who is clever enough on most points, can identify himself with an argument so transparently absurd. In the opinion of all people in Ireland who have watched the proceedings under the Land Act since the year 1881 the whole system of administration has been more or less in conflict with the spirit of the Act. What is the use of passing Acts which are supposed to be of value to the struggling rents as a settlement on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. Mr. Wrench, who has recently been appointed a Land Commissioner, was a man and agent, and belongs at the present time to a landlord club, called the Kildare Street Club, in Dublin. I am bound to say that the feeling in Ireland is that a Commission presided over by a man like Mr. Wrench, cannot be expected to be fair or impartial. This gentleman and his colleagues have the appointment of land valuers and sub-committees, and, although it is a matter of congratulation that the number of sub-commissioners has been increased to 70, we find that a large number of them are connected with the landlord interest. Looking through the list I find that one of them, Mr. Charles Hamilton, a Member of Kildare Street Club; another, Mr. Armstrong, has been hitherto employed in making valuations for landlords; another is a Galway landlord, another a Roscommon landlord, and so on through the entire list. Take the case of legal Commissioners. If they had only to decide points of law, perhaps the argument would not affect the case so strongly, but I am informed that they have an equal voice with the other commissioners in the adjustment of the rent and the sole voice in law. The legal Commissioner in the County of Cork, Mr. Lawrence Doyle, has been a strenuous advocate of the landlord party, and is equally well known as a strenuous opponent of the tenants' claims for fair rents under the Acts of 1881 and 1887. About a year ago when a large number of tenants were in Court and their solicitor was making a statement as to the value of the tenancies and the exclusive claim of the tenants to the full value of their improvements, they burst into some kind of applause in Court. The applause was very promptly rebuffed, and the legal Commissioner stood round upon them, and said he would not have his Court turned into a demonstration, and called the people who were coming before him assuitors "a pack of howling savages." I can easily understand an outburst of temper from a judicial functionary whose temper was ruffled by an act of disrespect of that kind, but the language Mr. Doyle used shows animus and the utter want of impartiality on the part of a large number of these men. The right hon.

Gentleman has found fault with my hon. Friend the Member for Longford for raising this discussion, and has said that this Committee is wholly unsuited to judge of the impartiality or otherwise of the Sub-Commissioners. But what other Court of Appeal is there in the land? If the people of Ireland have strong grounds for believing that these appointments are unfair, and that the men appointed do not act fairly between landlord and tenant, what other avenue have they for the expression of their opinions except that of their Representatives in this House? This is why we have to raise a Debate on this Vote year after year. It is not out of "pure cussedness," to use an American expression, that Members on this side of the House get up and talk about the Commissioners. It is, to say the least of it, an unpleasant thing for us to find fault with functionaries who are not directly connected with the Executive and do not fall under the same censure as Resident Magistrates or constabulary officers. But we have to point out that there is a widespread feeling in Ireland that the Sub-Commissioners are appointed almost directly in the landlords' interest, and that when they are not landlords themselves or agents, they are directly connected with the landlord interests. It has been pointed out that out of the large number who have been appointed, only eight are tenant farmers. We are told that a large number of them have a practical acquaintance with the value of land, but we are not told how. If 70 Commissioners have been appointed, I want to know why 50 or 60 per cent of them should not have been farmers? There are plenty of hard-headed practical farmers in the North of Ireland whom you might have selected if you object to men from the South and West. Could you not have got 50 farmers, say, from South Tyrone, who could not be accused of undue partiality towards the tenants of the South and West, and yet who would be sure to have a knowledge of the value of land? It would not have been too much to expect that one or two of the members of every one of these Sub-Commissions should be tenant farmers, having a practical acquaintance with the value of land and with the difficulty of making money out of it in these times. I suppose it would be a matter of extreme difficulty for anyone to arrive by any process of calculation at the average reductions that have been given by landlords in England; but with reference to the instances that have come under my own observation, I do not think I am indulging in the language of exaggeration when I say that the average reductions given in many cases in England without pressure, without Land Acts, and without agitation, murder, violence, and bloodshed, have exceeded the reductions given under the Irish Land Acts after intense agitation. We see on the Treasury Bench two or three Gentlemen who are themselves the strongest examples of the argument I have laid before the Committee, because they themselves have given to their tenants larger reductions than we have been able to get for the tenants who have made all the improvements. We have a maximum of expense and a maximum of legislation with a minimum of results; and if this question of the Land Commission has to be raised again and again on the Vote in Supply, the reason is that the Government have never risen to the height of the situation, and have never honestly and fairly administered the Act in the spirit in which the Legislature passed it. For my part, I believe that, although you may increase the number of Sub-Commissioners from 70 to 100, the land question will still be with you until you change the mode of appointment. I believe that the hard working bees, as well as the idle drones, have some right to a voice in the settlement of the value of the land, and that, until you recognise that, Parliament will have to pass Land Act after Land Act, and will still find itself choked up with arrears of the land difficulty. I am convinced that you will never settle the land difficulty in Ireland until you adopt a different method of dealing with it.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to refer only to one subject, which has been brought before the House previously, and which, I think, cannot be too often brought before it. Frequent complaints have been made to the Chief Secretary in reference to the question why the tenants have been defrauded of their rights. The Land Commission, either from defects of machinery or from some worse cause, has acted in such a way that men have had the agony and suspense of having their cases left unheard for 18 or 19 months. I have asked many questions in reference to the Olphert Estate, which was a typical case. There you had oppression on the one side and iron-handed power on the other. On the 9th of May I asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) a question in reference to the hard and cruel delay which had taken place in the adjustment of the rents of that estate. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“From the Report received by the Land Commissioners it appears that the applications to fix judicial rents from the Olphert estate, received by them before the 1st November, 1887, and at the present outstanding number not 195, as alleged in the question, but 82.”

Eighty-two of these starving tenants had, before the 1st of November, done the only thing in their power to get the rents adjusted and to get permission to live in their own homes for 18 months. No Land Commission was sent down to adjust the rents. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

“All cases received from this estate up to the 31st of December, 1887, are on the list for hearing, which will be delivered in a few days. It may be recollected that the landlord has offered 25 per cent reduction on non-judicial rents, and that any tenant against whom proceedings in ejectment are brought, who has made application to have a fair rent fixed, can apply to the Court in which such proceedings are pending to obtain a stay of execution upon such terms as the Court may direct.”

How could a tenant without the means to support himself or his family employ counsel to institute a motion in Dublin to have his case expedited or to get evictions stayed? Under the most humble process in the ordinary Quarter Sessions Courts a defence of eviction proceedings, even if successful, would cost £6. That would be the entire six years' rent of many of these people. Well, the evictions took place, and I heard of the right hon. Gentleman only a few evenings ago glorying in their success, and saying that the battering ram was the best thing to use in reference to such people. Why was not the Commission sent to the estate? In every case the arrangement was to give these tenants no judicial settlements, and to allow Olphert a free hand to dispose of them as he thought fit. This case affords an object lesson in misgovernment in Ireland, and shows that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor.

*SIR O. LEWIS (Antrim, N.): I wish to refer to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), that during the Debates on the Act of 1887 it was never suggested by anybody of position that that Act could possibly be used with the result of increasing rents. My recollection of what took place during the Debate was so different from that of the right hon. Gentleman that I have taken the trouble to refer to the report of the discussion. I find in Volume CCCCXVII. of Hansard, page 416, that no less a person than my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, whose connection with the Land Question and with the landed interest in Ireland is perfectly well-known, said on the 11th of July, in reference to a speech which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman):—

“The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that under these proposals the rents might be increased, and that that was unfair. But our object is to do justice between man and man, and if you allow the tenant to go into Court that his rent may be reduced if it is too high, why should you take from the landlord the power of having his rents increased where they are too low?”

I am not entering into the question whether it was just or prudent on that occasion to include in the provisions of the Bill an enactment which could be used in that way. I am dealing simply with the question whether the right hon. Gentleman was right in maintaining it was never contemplated by any one that rents might be increased. During the Debate from which I have quoted this very probability was used as argument on each side of the House. I merely rose to refer to this point, as I think it is a matter of the gravest importance that the Debate on this matter should not go upon wrong lines, and that we should keep to the facts of the case.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I made the statement after reading the Debates which took place in 1887, and after special reference to the speeches made by those who were responsible for the Bill—the Chief Secretary and the Irish Attorney General. I did not think it worth while to read the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty, which, after all, does not lay down principles; his observations are merely in the nature of obiter dicta.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): The hon. Baronet has, as usual, been advocating the interests of the landlords, and I believe that in the Debate to which he has referred it always was in the minds of the landlords in this House, and, indeed, in the minds of hon. Members opposite, that there should be an increase in the rents. It was intended, if possible, to turn the Land Bill into a weapon against the tenant in favour of the landlords, and well have hon. Members succeeded in doing it. In the year 1881, when the Land Law (Ireland) Act was passed, hon. Members opposite admitted that it was absolutely necessary to bring in a Bill to deal with arrears, and a similar admission was made when the 1887 Bill was before the House. But all that was done in the latter case was to provide that any reduction of the rent should be applicable to the rent accruing from the gale day next before the application was made to the Court. For instance, if the application was made before November, 1887, the rent running from May, 1887, would be affected by it. It then became the duty of the Government, in order to bring the relief to the tenants which was so much required, to appoint a sufficient number of Sub-Commissioners to administer this law which the House passed, and which the House itself intended for the relief of the Irish tenants. But what has happened? For nearly two years applications have been before the Court that are still unheard. Time after time has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary been directed to this fact—that there is not a sufficient number of Sub-Commissioners to deal with the applications of tenant farmers to have fair rents fixed. Time after time I, myself, have directed his attention to this fact, and it has also been pointed out from these Benches, that there are in Ireland landlords hard-hearted enough to enforce their powers against tenants whose applications to have a fair rent fixed are still pending. One of the first of the landlords to carry out this act of injustice towards tenants was the head of the Executive of the Government, the Lord Lieutenant himself. The unfortunate tenant tried by every means in his power to come to a settlement with Lord Londonderry; he offered to leave the matter to arbitration. But it was of no avail; the Lord Lieutenant wanted to set an example to the rest of the landlords of the country, in order to show them how to turn the Act of 1887 into an engine of persecution against the tenants. But while we were not allowed a sufficient number of Sub-Commissioners to carry out the remedial provisions of the Land Act, we were given a sufficient number of removable officials to carry out the penal enactments of the Statute, and to enforce the charges made against unfortunate tenants, who rushed back to the homes from which they had been unjustly evicted. Now, what is the remedy for this state of things? I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford that the appointment of additional Sub-Commissioners would not be a remedy. It is, to my mind, the only remedy that there is. You want a sufficient number of Courts to deal with all the cases which are awaiting settlement, and unless you have a sufficient number of Commissioners, how can the cases be disposed of? One of my hon. Friends has pointed out that in certain counties you only have one legal Commissioner to preside over three sets of Sub-Commissioners. In the North of Ireland—in County Down and County Antrim—that state of things prevails, and the legal Commissioner has to be continually travelling from one part of the county to another in order to take part in the work of the Sub-Commissioners. This, to my mind, is a most unnecessary expenditure of time and money, and it is certain that if we had more legal Commissioners the Sub-Commissioners would be able to get through a considerably greater amount of work. I do not agree with some of my hon. Friends who have suggested that the appointment of two laymen to sit with County Court Judges in order to deal with these cases would give satisfaction. My experience in the North of Ireland leads me to an entirely different conclusion. In my own county, for instance, we have a County Court Judge whose tendency is certainly in favour of the landlords, and what has been the result? Why, since the passing of the Act in 1881, not half a dozen cases have been brought before him by the tenants. In fact, they will not avail themselves of the opportunity of going before this County Court Judge. It is my opinion that the Court which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes to constitute will prove nothing more or less than a mockery. It is a Court which will not command the confidence of the tenants, and I would strongly recommend the Chief Secretary not to persevere with his proposal. There is another subject to which I wish to refer, and that is the subject of appeals. I think it is a scandal that appeals which have been pending for three or four years are still unheard. A short time ago we had a sitting of the Land Commission in my own county, and several appeals were tried without the holdings being inspected by the Commissioners. In a large number of the cases the rent was increased, but in some seven or eight cases the decisions were withheld, and it has since been decided that a Court valuer should be sent to inspect the farms. But who is the Court valuer to be? It is Mr. Babington, a land agent in the County Armagh, a gentleman who has never appeared in the Land Court unless it has been to give evidence in favour of the landlords. I should like to ask the Chief Secretary why such a man as that is appointed to this position? Under the present state of affairs, I think it would be far better if we had no appeal on the question of value. I think that the appeals should be limited to questions of law, and I go farther, and say that in order to get rid of appeals within a reasonable time there should be power to go before a Judge of Assize and get the point decided. With regard to the revision of judicial rents, I was very glad to hear my hon. Friend's references to this matter. We have never been able to lay our hands on the instructions which have been sent out to the Commissioners with regard to the basis on which the revision shall be made. We find that in the year 1887, when straw was very dear, it was dealt with as one of the articles of produce on which to ground the revision of rent; but in 1888, when it was very cheap, it was conveniently omitted from the list, and the tenant was deprived of all advantage arising from the reduction in the price of straw. Now, I should like to know on what principle the Land Commission proceeds in regard to the revision of these rents, and I think we ought to obtain this information from the Government. In conclusion, let me state that the course which has been adopted by the Chief Secretary is not one which is calculated to give satisfaction to the people of Ireland. I would strongly suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that if he means to do anything towards pacifying the country he must alter his whole course of procedure, and administer the Land Act in a very different spirit.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): I have had as much experience as any Member of this House in the matter of the Land Courts practice. I have had experience of the working of the Sub-Commissioners and of the Head Commissioners, and I have had experience of every kind, especially on the question of appeals. Now, I do not agree with the suggestion that the Head Commissioners do not listen to the evidence as to the value. On the contrary, my experience is that they consider that evidence fairly and conscientiously. Where I think the mistake has been made, is in cases where Sub-Commissioners who are best acquainted with a pastoral country are brought in to value land in a tillage country, and I am happy to say that even where these mistakes have been made they have been rectified on appeal to the Head Commissioners. The men who are chosen as Sub-Commissioners are generally large farmers—men in the occupation of large tracts of land—and they are, therefore, competent judges for large holdings, although they may be poor judges for small farms. An appeal, therefore, on the question of value is necessary. The great thing is to do justice between landlord and tenant in regard to a particular farm, and if mistakes have been made in doing that, it has been possible to get them remedied by appeal. My hon. Friend who spoke last has complained of the appointment of a gentleman as Court Valuer with whom I am well acquainted, and I must say that when I heard of the appointment being made I viewed it with pleasure, because, although Mr. Babington was a landlord's valuer, he undoubtedly succeeded a man to whom he was infinitely superior. I do not think that my hon. and learned Friend need be afraid that

Mr. Babington will do any injustice to the tenants. I know it is impossible, under the present administration, to appoint anyone to these positions who has not strong Conservative support; but I believe that, when appointed, these gentlemen do their duty well, and I think it is to be regretted that the hon. Gentleman should look upon Mr. Babington as a bête noire. The Sub-Commissioners, at any rate, are not so bad as our friends the removables under the Crimes Act, and they certainly do not deserve that unqualified condemnation which some of my hon. Friends seem inclined to shower upon them. We must view things as they are, and not as if we lived in Utopia. Another matter I wish to point out as a reason why the Sub-Commission will always have my strong support, and that is that they bring justice to the poor man's door. This is in itself sufficient, to my mind, to make allowances for the natural defects of men who are not trained lawyers and have not shone as legal lights. As to leaving decisions to the hurry and chances of the Assize, I say, "deliver us from that evil" above all things. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not accept that suggestion; that would mean that you would not have a case properly heard at all. I have had as much experience as most men on these matters, and I can say that such an arrangement would not conduce to justice between landlord and tenant, and before a case was tried it would be estimated, from the known character of the Judges, when the landlord would be treated severely, and when the tenant would be treated severely. I have only to add that I deplore the delay that has occurred everywhere, and, not the least, in my own district, and for this the Government have incurred great responsibility, having regard to the peace of the country. It is not by raising the Police Estimates they can secure that peace. Why haggle over a few thousand pounds for the expense of another Sub-Commission? Why you spend in half a year on extra police and Crimes Court officials enough to supply the entire machinery for wiping off the arrears of judicial rents. If the Chief Secretary cannot bring his mind to transfer the expenditure, let him by way of equipoise spend a pound on the Land Court for wiping out arrears for every pound spent on the Crimes Act, and he will find the arrears quickly lessen; and perhaps he will find he can decrease his Crimes Court expenditure as quickly. My object in rising was to deprecate any change of policy in the way proposed by my hon. Friend. I say you cannot have a tribunal for the hearing of these cases half as good as the present. I had experience of the working of the Act of 1870, and from the passing of that Act to 1881 I had, I suppose, as much active interest in the cases that came before the Court as any man, and I can say that it was the want of sympathy of the County Court Judges that forced the Act of 1881. The Act of 1870 failed of its effect in a great measure through the cold technicality of County Court judgments, but we have now a tribunal with some portion of sympathy with the matters they deal with. Let us not criticise this tribunal too severely. They make mistakes, as every tribunal will, but the great grievance is not due to any fault of theirs—it is due to the right hon. Gentleman and his fear of the British taxpayer. Well, the British taxpayer was played out last night. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take a more cheerful view, after seeing what the British taxpayer can be reduced to. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take courage and spend money on the Land Court.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I think, before the Question is put, we might be favoured with a reply from the Treasury Bench.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am very reluctant to add another to the many speeches I have made, but if the hon. Member thinks it necessary I will do so. I do not think it is necessary for me to survey the whole course of the Debate since I last spoke, and I think the hon. Member who has just spoken has demolished the accusations brought against the Land Court. We were told earlier that eight Sub-Commissioners only were drawn from the tenant farmer class, but the hon. Gentleman has shown that this class is very numerously represented, so on that point it is not necessary for me to speak. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford went into the scheme he propounded last year, by which an automatic system of fixing fair rents should be adopted towards small holdings. I do full justice to his motives, but I do not think he has quite apprehended the difficulties that would attend any rough-and-ready process of the kind suggested. The right hon. Gentleman also stated that the number of cases disposed of by the Court in a month is 1,500, repeating an error into which the hon. Member for South Tyrone fell. The number of cases disposed of in June last was 2,300, and I hope cases will continue to be disposed of at that rate.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I gave the numbers for 1888. A very large number of cases are disposed of out of Court.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yea, but the year 1888 shows an average that is not a real test of the speed now shown in giving decisions. For a considerable period in 1888 there were not so many Sub-Commissioners at work as there are now. The present speed is much above that of 1888. Then a great many criticisms have been passed on the arbitrary manner as hon. Members think in which Sub-Commissioners have been moved from one part of the country to another, compelling them sometimes to traverse long distances. In this respect, I believe, a great reform has been effected by the Commission in the last few months, and whereas formerly cases used to be taken in the order in which they were listed for hearing, now, some regard is had to the manner in which the holdings are distributed. The Land Commissioners have in view, as far as possible, the economising of the time of the Sub-Commissioners, and they have devoted themselves, not unsuccessfully, to administration in this respect, and I hope, even without the passage of the Bill I am anxious to have passed, a still greater amount of work can be got out of the Land Commission in proportion to the number of persons employed. That, I think, includes all the references I have to make.

MR. MAC NEILL: There was my specific charge in reference to the re-hearing of cases on the Olphert Estate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member for South Donegal has made it a matter of complaint that the Executive did not send down a Land Commission Court to fix fair rents on the Olphert Estate. I may tell the hon. Member that I have no control over the movements of the head Commissioners or Sub-Commissioners. The House has given an absolute discretion to those officials, and the Executive have no right at all to interfere. But if the hon. Member is really of opinion that any serious injury has been caused to the tenants on the Olphert Estate by the absence of a Land Court decision, he is labouring under a mistake. The landlord offered a reduction of 25 per cent on non-judicial rents, and the utmost reduction that would have been made by a Land Court would have been from 30 to 35 per cent. The difference between the voluntary and the judicial reduction would only amount to 6d. or perhaps 1s. in the year. That being so, it is a great exaggeration to represent that a serious loss has been inflicted upon the tenants. I hope the Committee will now feel that we have dealt sufficiently with this important Vote, and that we may pass to Votes of not less importance.

Mr. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): There is one question connected with the disposition of these cases to which I should like to call attention, and that is the manner in which the Commissioners are turned loose into counties altogether without regard to their local knowledge of requirements in the districts where they are called upon to adjudicate. A Sub-Commissioner is taken from Dublin and sent to fix fair rents in Donegal, and though he may be perfectly acquainted with the conditions of agriculture in the first mentioned county he may be absolutely unacquainted with the requirements of Donegal. So also to send a man from Ulster to fix fair rents in the County of Cork, where the system of agriculture differs widely from that in the North, almost amounts to a travesty of justice. I would urge that the labours of a Sub-Commissioner should be confined, as far as possible, to the province with the agricultural conditions of which he is well acquainted. A man well accustomed to the usages of Ulster may be unqualified to appreciate the requirements of Munster or Connaught. In Munster you have grass farms combined with little cultivation; in Ulster you have wholly different conditions of farming. What would be a large farm in Ulster would be a very small farm in Munster, and fair rents have to be determined on wholly different conditions of farming. There are parts of Ireland where the conditions differ more widely than they do between some parts of Ireland and England. I would urge, therefore, that Sub-Commissioners should deal as far as possible with cases where the conditions of farming are nearly identical. That will conduce more to uniformity in the fixing of fair rents upon an intelligent system, and greatly reduce the number of appeals. Then under Sub-head D I observe an increase in expenditure for collecting market prices, which cannot, I think, be excused; and there is less excuse when we find associated with this increase, an increase in the judicial rents under the Act of 1887, and the self-acting machinery for increasing or decreasing judicial rents. The increase has been in a manner never contemplated under that Act, and indicates that the system of collecting prices is imperfect. I am convinced that had this result been foreseen the clause in this Act would never have been sanctioned. Warnings were given at the time, but unheeded; and unfortunately the result on the increase of rents has surprised even the landlord party. Unfortunately, too, the only Chief Commissioner who occupies an independent position, and can give an opinion on legal authority is Mr. Justice O'Hagan. The other Commissioners holding their tenure of office from year to year are apt, as the time for renewal of office comes round, to become extreme advocates of the landlord party. I would urge on the Solicitor General the consideration of my suggestion in reference to the fixing of fair rents by Sub-Commissioners acquainted with the conditions of farming in the districts in which they adjudicate.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £4,478 be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries of the Officers and Attendants of the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other Expenses."

Mr. MACNEILL: I have but a few words to say in reference to this Vote, and I regret that it takes precedence of the more important Vote for the Chief Secretary. However, a vast sum of money is wasted on the frippery and nonsense of this gingerbread Court, and many items require examination. There is an entry of £829 0s. 8d. for the Private Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant—there is a certain economic ring about the 8d. What are the duties of this gentleman that he should require such a large remuneration? He has not occasion to write many letters, he has not occasion to correspond with “Dear Mr. Armytage.” Does he keep the Lord Lieutenant’s racing accounts? Let the Chief Secretary consider. He could keep two Resident Magistrates for this amount! Cecil Roche and Captain Segrave could go from one end of Ireland to the other and sentence us all to six months’ imprisonment for this amount. Then what do the four Aides-de-camp do for their £200 each? What are the duties of the three gentlemen in waiting who, together, receive £443? Will the Chief Secretary, the Secretary of all Secretaries, tell us what are the duties of these gentlemen? Does the Private Secretary draw up those short and foolish speeches with which from time to time Lords Lieutenant irritate the people? What are the functions of the State Steward, for which he is paid £506, or of the Comptroller with £414? Does the Gentleman Usher or the Chamberlain discharge any duty for the salaries they receive? The same question applies to the Master of the Horse and the Sergeant of the Riding Horse. Is there a riding horse in the Castle, or where does the Sergeant earn his £30 a year? Passing from these I come to the provisions made for the welfare of the soul of the Lord Lieutenant—and these amount to £789. The chaplain to Dublin Castle is allowed £335, and his reading clerk £42; organist, choristers, and chapel keeper bring up the total to £789. But I would ask do any members of the Lord Lieutenant’s household attend the ministrations of the chaplain? Do they not usually attend the services at the Hibernian Military School, or St. Patrick’s Cathedral, or elsewhere? Very interesting also are the items under the head of “Salaries and Allowances for the Office of Arms.” First we have “Ulster King of Arms,” £920. Sir Bernard Burke supplies genealogies and arms to all and sundry who require such distinction. No doubt he would, if requested, add a “battering ram” argent to the Chief Secretary’s quarterings. Various other items make up the total of this sub-head to £1,091. Now that would not be an unreasonable amount for the genuine work that Sir Bernard Burke does. He is a learned antiquarian scholar, and his services as keeper of the State Papers in the Irish Record Office are most valuable. But for the most genuine work he does in this capacity he is paid much less than for ministering to the extravaganzas at Dublin Castle, and deciding questions of precedence between a “knight banneret” and a “knight bachelor,” or who has the claim to take certain ladies in to dinner. Then there is the entry of £12 16s. for the “kettle drummer” to which official reference has been often made in this House, and who still survives all criticism, and then we come to the expenses for the Insignia of the Order of St. Patrick, £60, and it is curious to note that the emblazoning and repairing of arms invariably comes to the same amount every year. The insignia are never cleaned. They are dirty deal shields, and so on, in St. Patrick’s Cathedral. They are never brushed from year’s end to year’s end, and the cobwebs are never removed from them. Yet £60 a year is charged for attending to them. It will be little short of a gross violation of trust if we vote the sum. The Committee is asked to supply money for keeping up the paraphernalia of a gingerbread Court, and for administering to the vulgar vanity of people who have emerged from shops, and are ashamed of their origin.

Mr. BLANE (Armagh, S.): One would have thought that the Lord Lieutenant got quite enough money to pay his own servants. An examination of the list of minions who are attached to the vice-regal household shows that a number of them are in receipt of very large pensions. We are bound to believe that the pensions have been awarded to them because they are no longer of any service. Here, however, they turn up smiling, and one of them gets £150, another £250, another £240, and so on. The one who has £240 is surgeon to the Dublin Metropolitan Police Force, and everybody who is acquainted with that force knows that any farrier or blacksmith in the City could do all that is required. A great many of these appointments date back to the Lord Lieutenancy of the Duke of Abercorn, and I think that no one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks Beach) how the hungry Hamiltons in Ireland search for every office. Their maw is insatiable. They hang on to their friends in every Department, and there is no getting rid of them. These men are the boa constrictors of the State. If anyone rises in this House to protest against their proceedings, a defence is always made for them. £800 a year is spent on aide-de-camps to the Lord Lieutenant, though those who occupy the posts already draw their pay as officers in the Army. Then there is a chaplain, I suppose for the preservation of the soul of the Lord Lieutenant. I wonder whether it has never struck Lords Lieutenants with surprise that their souls should be so very expensive. I cannot imagine why the Lord Lieutenant should not pay for the servants of his household. If I had £20,000 a year from anybody I would pay my own servants. Of course we are told that the Lord Lieutenant could not keep up the necessary state unless he had this staff. I can understand that there should be a certain amount of state in the Court of the Sovereign; but surely no one expects that you should keep up splendour in the half-crown Court of Dublin. Even the Chief Secretary cannot endure to spend more than three days there at a time. The place is left to dusters and housekeepers—some of the officials have residences outside in the small suburban villas of Dublin, and they rarely put their noses into the place. To throw down £7,400 of the public money every year to be scrambled for by these people is really preposterous. As I said before, the Hamiltons, the Stewarts, the Vane Tempests, and the other families that exploit Ireland for the benefit of themselves and their followers should pay their camp-followers themselves. These camp-followers are generally a most useless and vagabond set, and would not be tolerated in any other country in the world.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid.): I hope the Committee will not fail to note that this Vote does not represent all that is asked for for the Lord Lieutenant, the total amount being not £7,400, but £38,600. I am disposed to think that a Vote of this kind is more or less necessary as long as the Lord Lieutenant is retained. We may, some of us, have no objection to the principle of the maintenance of the Lord Lieutenant, and I myself think it a very good thing that it should be maintained. I believe I am right in saying that the office of Lord Lieutenant is not a profitable one, inasmuch as the holders of it have always to expend more than they receive, but at the same time I must enter my protest against such a large number of minor useless offices, some of which are purely grotesque, being attached to the Department. I think that the office of Ulster King-at-Arms, held by Sir Bernard Burke, might very well be dispensed with. He is a great genealogist, and has published many books which have more circulation in England than in Ireland. The reward he has got for publishing these books is that of being practically quartered on the taxpayers of the country. He receives £750 as Ulster King-at-Arms and £500 a year more as Keeper of the Record Office. Both these offices are sinecures. As Keeper of the Records Sir Bernard Burke has an unrivalled opportunity of making himself useful in the collection and publication of documents dealing with the history of Ireland. With the exception of tracing the history of families he has done nothing whatever to earn his salt. I would respectfully suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary if he happens to be Chief Secretary when Sir Bernard Burke resigns or vacates his office, that he might very reasonably reduce this annual Vote by abolishing the Office of Ulster King-at-Arms. There is in the Vote an item of £40 for providing certain insignia for the Order of St. Patrick. I believe that no investiture of the Order has taken place during the last twelve months, and I do not understand what the item is for. The Vote also includes an item of £1,563 for Queen's Plates. This was originally intended for the purpose of encouraging and improving the breeding of horses, but in England it has been discovered by experience that the money so devoted does not produce any satisfactory results, and it has been devoted to other purposes. At present there is already an allowance of £5,000 annually made to the Royal Dublin Society for the encouragement of horse breeding, and it would be far better if this sum of £1,500 was also devoted to that society for a similar purpose. I should be sorry to ask the Committee to reject the sum, but I think the whole amount that comes under Sub-head D might be dispensed with; and for the purpose of protesting against the waste that occurs in this connection, I beg to move to reduce the Vote by £1,091 for the salaries and allowances of the Office of Arms.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item D, of £1,091, for Salaries, and Allowances of Office of Arms, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(A. Matthew Kenny.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman in the attack he has made on the Ulster King-at-Arms has omitted to refer to the fact that the expenditure of £1,100 is not a charge on the Treasury. At all events, he carefully kept it out of his observations. As a matter of fact the Office of Arms is almost self-supporting, the fees received being nearly sufficient to cover the expenditure of the office. The average deficit is annually only about £220 a year. Attacks have been made on various officers of the Lord Lieutenant's household. I do not think it is worth while to enter into details, but I will content myself with saying that so long as there is a Lord Lieutenant there must be a Lord Lieutenant's household. Whether there ought to be a Lord Lieutenant at all is an open question, and one upon which the hon. Member who introduced this subject appears to have a much more decided opinion in favour of the retention of the office than I myself have. As has already been stated, however, there are certain offices which, when they become vacant, it is not intended to fill up without previous consultation with the Treasury. Among these are the offices of Ulster King-at-Arms and the drummer who is the last survivor of the Viceregal band. With regard to Queen's Plates, I confess that I am not an admirer of this mode of encouraging horse breeding, and when I was Secretary for Scotland I did what I could to alter it in Scotland. As Chief Secretary for Ireland, soon after taking office, I inquired into the subject, but a very small amount of inquiry convinced me that any attempt to interfere with the Queen's Plates would raise a storm of indignation, and this I was unwilling, in regard to this subject, to undergo. I quite admit that I do not wish to add to the many controversies which I already have on my hands with regard to Irish affairs. The hon. Member holds, perhaps rightly, that the money might be better spent in encouraging horse breeding. In that opinion, however, he needs the concurrence of many of his friends, and certainly of many people in Ireland.

Mr. M. J. Kenny

MR. M. J. KENNY: I have the support of everybody except those who are personally interested in the races.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member is wrong, and that if I took the course he asks me to take a large number of gentlemen opposite would get up and denounce this new instance of alien tyranny. I hope the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press his Motion to a Division, and I hope the Committee will consent to pass the Vote, which is not for the Lord Lieutenant, but for his household, a Vote of a kind that must pass so long as Parliament determines to maintain the office.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not referred to the ecclesiastical establishment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The ecclesiastical establishment of the Lord Lieutenant comes directly under the general argument I have used. If you abolish the ecclesiastical establishment you will not effect an immediate economy, because you will have to give pensions to the present holders of offices. It has always been held that an ecclesiastical establishment is a necessary part of the Lord Lieutenant's household. In these circumstances I should no more assent to the abolition of the ecclesiastical than I should to any other part of the Viceregal state.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I should not have troubled the Committee but for the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to be his peculiar misfortune, or else it is his deliberate intention, that whenever he intervenes in Irish Debates, whether of a set character or upon the Estimates, to raise a storm or, at all events, to set a breeze ablowing, which is altogether unnecessary. Anyone who listened to my hon. Friend will agree that he spoke in a most temperate manner, and certainly there was no idea in our minds of that "acrimony and that storm of indignation" to which the right hon. Gentleman refers in connection with the Vote for Queen's Plates. We reserve our indignation for some subject more worthy of it; we reserve it, for instance, for the consideration of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman himself.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is straying beyond the limits of the Amendment before the Committee, which is to omit the item for Ulster King-at-Arms.

MR. FLYNN: I defer to your ruling, Sir, and will only refer to the item, and at once I take issue with my hon. Friend who has moved the reduction. This item is one of the last remnants of respectability allowed to remain from the Civil List of the ancient Irish nation. It is a touching tribute from a parsimonious Treasury to the instincts of a separate nation, and to the treatment that nation is entitled to at the hands of the people of this country. It is a survival of the time when Irishmen, whether they recognised the Lord-Lieutenant or not, were proud of a state of things in which there really is a Court, and something more than the tawdry flippery and trivial tinsel such as we now see in Dublin. I do not agree with my hon. Friend in his Motion for reducing the Vote. But it is needless for the Chief Secretary to talk of denunciation of tyranny; there is nothing of the kind in this discussion. I express my opinion when I say that I should regret to see the item abolished, and I hope that when the present occupier of the office has ceased to hold it his successor will hold it under circumstances of greater dignity under the authority of this or of an Irish House of Commons. Differences of opinion we have on this subject, but the right hon. Gentleman altogether transcends the importance of these differences. It is one of the functions of this Committee to criticise these items, and of this amount of £7,478 for the household of the Lord-Lieutenant there is much, if we were disposed to criticise with severe economy, to which we might take exception. The Vote for the Lord Lieutenant himself is withdrawn from criticism because it is payable out of the Consolidated Fund, but all the criticisms that we address to this particular Vote before us are not unconnected with the higher subject which we have in view, though technically we cannot deal with it. I hope my hon. Friend will not find it necessary to divide on his Amendment.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): It is quite clear that we cannot enlist our Irish friends on the side of economy, and that whatever is to be done in that direction must be done by English Members. I would contrast with this enormous expenditure, which we are called upon to provide for the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the figures that in the same connection apply to that great people on the other side of the Atlantic.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is the Motion on the item for the Ulster King-at-Arms.

MR. COSSHAM: I quite understand that, because it is part of the household expenditure which I conceive to be on an extravagant scale, and of it this item of £1,091 is a considerable part. It does not appear to me that a poor country like Ireland is justified in having all this expenditure on a Court, and if a Division is taken I shall certainly support my hon. Friend. We have the assurance that some of these offices will not be filled up when vacated by the present holders. I hope this will be carried out rigorously, and that the right hon. Gentleman will retain office long enough to give effect to his undertaking.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 101.—(Div. List, No. 334.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): There has been an outcry in some quarters for the abolition of the office of Lord Lieutenant, and it has been stated that the office has been filled in recent years by those who certainly have not endeared it to the Irish people. For my own part, I am not prepared for the abolition of the office, for as long as Ireland occupies the position she does under the Act of Union, I look upon the office of Lord Lieutenant as one of the few symbols left of our separate nationality.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not competent for the hon. Member to discuss the question of the abolition of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. GILL: I was merely making a reference in passing. I was going to refer to the changes in the personality; but I pass from that. I will only say, in relation to the present holder of the office, that the Irish people have good reason to believe that they do not get full value for its retention.

THE CHAIRMAN: The allowance to the Lord Lieutenant is specially charged upon the Consolidated Fund, and it is impossible to discuss the performance of the Lord Lieutenant upon this Vote.

MR. GILL: Under the circumstances, I do not think is worth while my proceeding any further.

MR. M. HARRIS (Galway, E.): It is a delusion and a sham to vote this money to keep up the household of the Lord Lieutenant while the homes and rooftrees of people in all parts of Ireland are being levelled to the ground by the forces under his control. Day after day we have records of these things, and certainly if I had it in my power I would sooner vote money for the support of these poor people and their homes than I would vote anything to keep up the household of the Lord Lieutenant.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed:

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I do not rise for the purpose of raising any general discussion on the policy and administration of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, but for the purpose of raising a specific question in accordance with an undertaking which I gave some days ago, namely, as to the correspondence between the Chief Secretary for Ireland and Father Costello, the newly-appointed parish priest of Woodford, and with Bishop Healy, the coadjutor Bishop of that diocese in reference to the renewed wholesale evictions by Lord Clanricarde on that property. It is now some 18 months since I dealt with the whole of this question, and still this miserable dispute continues; from time to time fresh batches of evictions have taken place in continuance of Lord Clanricarde's avowed purpose to clear his property if the tenants did not give way and abandon to their fate those already evicted. Within the last fortnight 24 families have been evicted, 15 of them on the Portumna estate, where, owing to circumstances I will presently mention, there have been no previous evictions; nine of them on the Woodford estate, and of these nine I am informed that five are widows. Adding these to previous evictions, I find that 97 families have been evicted; and upwards of 170 persons have been sent to prison for various causes under the Coercion Act, directly or indirectly connected with this dispute. Further evictions on a large scale are threatened. Upwards of 60 tenants on the Portumna estate are in a position where they may be evicted at a moment's notice; a still greater number are in the same position on the Woodford estate, and, taking the whole property, I am told on authority I cannot doubt, that 800 tenants may be evicted if agreement is not come to. Under these circumstances, I have felt it a public duty to make a final protest before the House rises and to urge on the Chief Secretary for Ireland a course which will prevent what I believe will be a crime of unparalleled magnitude—namely, the clearance and depopulation of a whole district. Some days ago, before the recent batch of evictions, I put a question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland with reference to his correspondence on this subject and asked him to produce it. The Chief Secretary for Ireland replied to me in a tone and in terms which, if I did not wish on the present occasion to eliminate any personal controversy, I should feel it my duty to characterise in the terms it deserved. The Chief Secretary said he had no intention to gratify my curiosity by submitting to me his private correspondence. Hon. Members will probably understand by this that the parish priest of Woodford and Bishop Healy have written to the Chief Secretary for Ireland in a private manner, and not intending their correspondence to be made public. This, however, is not the case. I have the assurance of both those gentlemen that their letters were of a public character, on a public matter, intended to be made public. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply, took the unusual course of making his letters private. In my experience, which extends over a good many years, I have never known a Minister, written to on a public matter, mark his letter in reply private. But I have consulted other and better authorities than myself on such matters, and I am told that it is a most unusual course for a Minister to answer public matters by a private letter and to refuse their publication. It can only be justified where the reply introduces fresh matter, which I understand was not the case in this instance. I have before me the letter of Father Costello, the parish priest of Woodford. This gentleman has only recently been appointed to that post in place of Father Coen, whose death was caused by the anxieties he underwent in consequence of this unfortunate dispute. [Mr. A. J. Balfour at this point returned to his place.] I am glad the Chief Secretary has returned, because although I quite appreciate the large amount of time he devotes to the business of the House, yet the matter I wish to bring forward is one which specially concerns himself. Father Costello is one of the most moderate men, though with deep sympathies for the tenants, and his first task on being appointed was to make an effort for the settlement of this question. He obtained authority from the tenants to act for them, and he then entered into communication with Lord Clanricarde. What occurred will best be explained by his letter to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He wrote—

“As parish priest recently appointed, I have, in the interests of justice and the public peace, endeavoured to effect a settlement of this unhappy dispute between Lord Clanricarde and his tenants. The latter authorised me to convey to his Lordship, as I did, that they were willing either to purchase their holdings at a fair valuation or agree to leave matters in dispute to arbitration or agree to any moderate terms. Instead of acceding to these terms Lord Clanricarde is preparing for wholesale evictions.”

Father Costello then entered into a narrative of recent events on the property, pointing out the number of evictions and imprisonments. He concluded by saying—

“In view of such facts and complications I request that the Government may send here an impartial Commission to hear both sides and present an accurate Report on the whole case; secondly, that all further action on the part of the Government be meanwhile suspended until the Report shall have been presented. Doing so will certainly avert social disorder, and afford reasonable but necessary protection to a notable section of Her Majesty's subjects against unrelenting extermination.”

This letter was a public one, addressed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his public capacity. The Chief Secretary for Ireland replied in a private letter. The letter, I am told, rejected the demand of the tenants and abandoned them to the tender mercies of Lord Clanricarde, whom the Government supported in his wholesale evictions with all the forces of the Coercion Act. I submit that we are entitled to have that reply or, at all events, the reasons for the action of the Government. I now come to the correspondence with Bishop Healy with reference to the Portumna district. Bishop Healy is the most conservative of all the Irish prelates on the land question. He holds the Plan of Campaign in holy horror, and he has done his utmost to prevent the Portumna tenants from throwing in their lot with the Woodford tenants. He has, however, the strongest possible opinion that Lord Clanricarde's conduct to his tenants has been unjust and cruel, and he has espoused the cause of the tenants with the utmost warmth. He has corresponded at length with Lord Clanricarde, but without obtaining any result. He has also corresponded with the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I cannot doubt that it has been owing to his remonstrances and entreaties that till quite lately the Government did not support evictions on this part of the property. Time after time Lord Clanricarde has been in a position to evict on a large scale on this part of his property, and has made all his preparations; but time after time, at the last moment, on one excuse or other, the forces of the Crown have not been lent by the Government, and I believe that there is little doubt that this was due to Bishop Healy's exertions. I make no complaint on this score against the action of the Chief Secretary. On the contrary, I applaud it; but I want to know why this policy has now been reversed, or why the evictions have now been supported. I have the authority of Bishop Healy for saying that his letters were of a public character, intended for publication, and I cannot think that the Chief Secretary should shelter himself under the plea that his replies were marked private. I have not seen the letters of the Bishop: but the tenour of them may be gathered from an address which the Bishop made to the Portumna tenants some few weeks ago, when evictions were imminent, under solemn circumstances, in the Portumna Parish Church, in which he reviewed the whole position, and stated the part he had taken. I wish that I could read the whole of that address. It would convert the most stony-hearted to a view of the injustice of the proceedings of Lord Clanricarde. The Bishop said—

"The question is whether you are to become landless or not. It is, in fact, a question of life or death to you."

The Bishop then entered into a history of the dispute. He showed how the rents had been raised in consequence of the tenants having voted contrary to the directions of Lord Clanricarde in the celebrated Galway election. He showed how, at the commencement of the dispute in 1885, he had personally urged on Lord Clanricarde's agent an abatement of rent on the ground that the tenants could not pay full rent. He showed that the agent had suggested a memorial to Lord Clanricarde; and that the memorial, signed by himself and by the Protestant rector, asked for an abatement of 25 per cent. He showed also that no answer was ever sent to this memorial, and that Mr. Joyce, the agent, was dismissed for advising abatements, and that evictions were then carried out. The Bishop then proceeds—

"Just 12 months later, in October, 1886, Messrs. O'Brien and Dillon came down and launched against Lord Clanricarde the Plan of Campaign. I had no great reason to like Lord Clanricarde. He treated me as no gentleman ever treated a Bishop. But, on the other hand, you know, for reasons it is unnecessary now to explain, I kept aloof from the Plan, and, to put it in the mildest form, I did not like it. Besides, I denounced the excesses of boycotting on more than one occasion, and every official of the Government knows well that I earnestly and constantly counselled you against outrage and exhorted you to patience and charity. . . . Then when last year Mr. Shaw Lefevre went to Loughrea I advised you to follow his counsel as that of one of our own friends, to follow his counsel, and to meet Lord Clanricarde, so to speak, half-way, and secure you the sympathy of all honest men."

He then detailed the course of negotiations with Lord Clanricarde, and that with the consent of the tenants he had made a most reasonable offer, and that after three months' silence Lord Clanricarde replied with an alternative which could not be entertained. The Bishop concluded by urging the tenants to—"Go out if you are so minded; but go out without violence to the officers of the law."

Owing, I believe, to the exertions of the Bishop with the Chief Secretary the evictions were further postponed; but lately Lord Clanricarde has again found himself in a position to resume them. Just before the evil day another exertion was made to avoid them. Father Pelly, the administrator of the parish, by the desire of the Bishop, called the Portumna tenants together, and they made another offer to Lord Clanricarde. They would pay at once a year's rent with the abatement of 20 per cent, and would pay the arrears, subject to some abatement, if time were given, and if the tenants already evicted were reinstated and costs foregone. This offer was peremptorily rejected by Mr. Tener, and the evictions already described were carried out a few days ago. The tenants followed the advice of the Bishop. They offered only a passive resistance; they opposed no force to the Sheriff; they submitted to eviction quietly; and they have joined the ever-increasing band of evicted men. Now, I submit upon this statement that the tenants have made every exertion for a reasonable settlement of the case. The question is, which of the parties was in the wrong when the dispute arose? It is now certain that if Lord Clanricarde had made a reasonable abatement at the commencement such as has now at length been wrung from him, there would have been no dispute, no evictions, and no convictions and imprisonments. It is equally certain that for two years after the commencement of the dispute Lord Clanricarde made no offer which could be expected to be accepted by the tenants. I think it is equally clear that Lord Clari-

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

Clanricarde is unwilling now to effect a settlement, through a vindictive feeling and a desire to punish his tenants for their present and past action to him. Bishop Healy, in one of his letters on the subject, stated that Lord Clanricarde had publicly, in writing, stated that he had inherited from his father a vindictive feeling against his tenants. Lord Clanricarde wrote to the Times denying, in the most absolute terms, the statement of Bishop Healy, and saying that he had never written any such letter. With some trouble I have been able to find the letter referred to by Bishop Healy, which I think hon. Members will say is one of the most extraordinary ever written by a landlord—one which sheds a most lurid light upon all Lord Clanricarde's proceedings, and fully justifies Bishop Healy's remarks. Some tenants from Woodford had written to the Freeman's Journal in 1879—that year of terrible agricultural distress to every lessee of Lord Clanricarde—for not making abatements of rent, and making a comparison between his conduct and that of his father. Lord Clanricarde replied in these terms—a letter, it will be recollected, written eight years after he had come into possession of the estate—

"Sir,—I have been informed that within the last week you have published a letter dated 'Loughrea, in which the writer, with indifferent success, attempts the easy task of drawing a comparison between my conduct and that of the late Lord Clanricarde towards the people of my Irish property. It is perfectly true my father devoted many years of his life to the interests of those on his property in Galway, but he was so deeply wounded by their ingratitude that in one of his last letters he not only strongly expressed his bitter disappointment and mortification, but even begged that I would remember it against them, the only instance of vindictiveness on his part I can remember; and I further gathered his opinion (which I share in) to have been that the people in question are incapable of gratitude and impossible to satisfy. Is it reasonable to expect that I, discouraged by the evil for good my father met with from his tenants, should care to tread in his footsteps.

"Your obedient Servant,

"CLANRICARDE."

The ingratitude complained of was, I believe, that the tenants of this property refused to vote at Lord Clanricarde's dictation in the Election of 1871, when Colonel Nolan was returned. This letter, I believe, gives the clue to the present Lord's action. He is not influenced by the ordinary feelings between landlords and tenants, nor even by the enlightened view of his own interests; he has all along been actuated by vindictive feelings, which he admits he inherits from his father; and having the tenants in his power, and supported by the Coercion Act, he is prepared to clear the estate and to depopulate the district unless the tenants will bend to him and abandon those who have already been unjustly evicted. Now I ask the Chief Secretary, under all the circumstances I have detailed, is he prepared to support this man in his vindictive action in clearing his estate? I cannot believe it. No greater crime, in my opinion, could be committed. What, then, is to be done? I could suggest many courses if there be a desire; but for the moment I believe the best and wisest course would be to follow the moderate and prudent suggestion of Father Costello, to appoint an impartial Commission to investigate the causes of the dispute, and meanwhile to suspend lending the forces of the Crown to evict. Before such a Commission I will undertake to prove every word that I have written and said on this case; and I shall be very much surprised if the appointment of it will not be an inducement to Lord Clanricarde to come to terms. I have, in conclusion, to apologise to the House for having detained them with this story at this period. I have returned to the House at great personal inconvenience, and in spite of the fact that I am paired for the remainder of the Session and cannot vote. I have done so because I have felt it a public duty to make an effort—it may be a last effort—on behalf of a people whom I believe to be cruelly used, and against a policy of extermination which Lord Clanricarde, supported by the forces of the Crown, appears to be bent on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is due to the right hon. Gentleman that I should at once reply to him, though I confess it taxes my ingenuity to find out what connection there is between the indictment of the right hon. Gentleman and the Vote for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has attacked the action of the Government with respect to the enforcement of certain debts which he regards as being harshly exacted by the creditor. What would be the condition of this House if the Home Secretary in reference to England had to answer, not merely for the legal justification of any action of the forces of the Crown in enforcing debts, but for the moral character of the creditor and the general conditions under which that debt was enforced?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman may not have heard my opening sentences. If he had he would have seen the connection. I referred to the correspondence between Father Costello and Bishop Healy and the right hon. Gentleman. On this subject I, on a previous occasion, asked the right hon. Gentleman some questions.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I heard that reference, but I ask the Committee what difference does it make? Suppose, in the case I am putting, a friend of the debtor wrote a letter to the Home Secretary, would that bring the matter under the purview of the House of Commons? Lord Clanricarde may be as wicked as the right hon. Gentleman has painted him; but if Lord Clanricarde's conscience were loaded with every sin which the imagination of casuists has been able to conceive, is that a reason for not voting the salary of the Chief Secretary? I confess my utter inability to perceive the connection between Lord Clanricarde's moral guilt and the right the holder of the office I occupy has to receive the remuneration attached to the post. It is not my business to defend Lord Clanricarde, and I do not mean to defend him—it is quite outside my business; but granted he managed his estate not merely badly but unjustly, I do not see why I am expected to give any answer on the subject at all. The right hon. Gentleman thinks he has connected his indictment with the Vote because he has been able to state that the Rev. Father Costello and the Bishop Coadjutor had correspondence with me on the subject. It appears to be thought that, because these two rev. gentlemen have written to me, therefore my reply ought to be made public; but that is an unreasonable contention. If I had supposed that view would have been taken I should merely have sent them an official acknowledgment of the receipt of their letters, according to the well-understood rule, and there would have been an end of the matter. But I have great regard for both those rev. gentlemen to whom the right hon. Gentleman has referred. I believe that both have at heart the good of the tenantry among whom they are placed, and that they were animated by a sincere desire to end this unhappy quarrel, and therefore I was most unwilling to send them a dry official acknowledgment, which the right hon. Gentleman thinks is the sort of answer I ought to have given. I sent them both private letters—

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The reason why the correspondence is asked for is that the evictions were delayed for a considerable time, and it is believed the correspondence will disclose the reasons why the evictions were delayed, and why those reasons ceased to operate.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, Sir, if that is the reason, I can afford the right hon. Gentleman immediate comfort, because on that particular point the correspondence would not afford any information. It was suggested in the letter from Father Costello, which I have not by me at the moment to quote from, that a Commission should be sent down to inquire into the relations between the landlord and the tenants on the Clanricarde estate, and that until that Commission had reported the Crown should refuse the aid of its forces in protecting the sheriff's officer. There is one objection to that course which is conclusive, and that is that it would be absolutely illegal. A Commission, unless appointed by an Act of Parliament, cannot take evidence on oath compulsorily, and it would have no more machinery for arriving at the truth than any policeman who might happen to be on the spot. Could we delay the ordinary legal process until the Commission reported? The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that we should be going far beyond our duties if we were to take any such course. Conceive the Home Secretary in England arriving at the conclusion that any particular creditor was acting, not illegally, but harshly in the exaction of a particular debt; conceive him announcing that he proposed to appoint a Commission to inquire into the conditions under which the debt was contracted and the payment of it was asked; conceive him adding that until he was satisfied by the Report of the Commission that the debt was a just one, on the broad principle of equity, that he would absolutely decline to allow the forces of the Crown to be used in order to obtain for the creditor his legal right—

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE : A main part of my case was that for four years the right hon. Gentleman had practically suspended evictions, and denied the use of the forces of the Crown on the Portumna estate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : It appears to be becoming a rule that I am to be interrupted more than any other Member. Could not the right hon. Gentleman wait until I had finished my argument? His interruption is absolutely irrelevant—foolishly irrelevant. I have stated an English parallel to the course I was asked to take; and the mere statement of it ought to convince every Member of the Committee that the course suggested, with the best of motives on the part of Father Costello, was a course the Government could not adopt. I believe there are not two members of the Irish clergy more anxious than are Bishop Healy and Father Costello to see, not only the law maintained, but these unhappy disputes settled; I believe they have done a great deal of good where they could exercise their influence, and I only wish they had imitators in every part of Ireland; and if these two gentlemen took, as I think they did, too favourable a view of the action of the tenants I would be the last to blame them for it. They rightly regard it as their business to do everything they can for their flock. Although I think that, if the Commission desired by the right hon. Gentleman reported on all the facts of the case, the result would be that blame would be thrown, not entirely on Lord Clanricarde, but that some share of it would fall upon the tenants, still I am not prepared to criticise these rev. gentlemen because they threw in their lot chiefly with the tenants. It is stated that for four years, by one expedient or another, I have prevented the forces of the Crown sometimes from being used to enforce evictions. Personally, I have not been in my present office for four years; and, speaking for my own tenure of office alone, I entirely deny that the Government have refused to sheriffs' officers the support which they have a right to demand in the Portumna district. Of course, in cases in which disturbances are anticipated, time must be allowed for inquiry and for concentrating the forces of the Crown. In cases in which sufficient notice has not been given and in which hardship would be inflicted on the troops and the police by concentrating them hastily, the Government have the right to tell the persons locally concerned that protection could not be given at the particular moment it was desired. Some discretion has always been left to the Executive Government in these cases. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely in error if he supposes that the Government have acted upon or have laid down any such indefensible proposition as that they have the right, if they happen to think any particular creditor, be he a landlord or any one else, is exacting a debt in a harsh manner, to prevent him exacting it, if it is a legal one, by refusing him or the sheriffs' officers who are carrying out the duties imposed upon them by a Court of Law the protection they have a right to require. I have said it is not my business to defend Lord Clanricarde or any other creditor in this country. I do not believe Lord Clanricarde is worse than many a creditor in this country. No doubt a man in Lord Clanricarde's position, the head of a great family in the county in which his property is situated, has duties that are not enforceable by law, but duties which would naturally be discharged by any man who fully accepted the responsibilities of his position, and which cannot be expected of every creditor in this country or in Ireland; that I will grant. Supposing Lord Clanricarde has not acted in a manner in which we had a right to hope he would act, is that a reason for not enforcing the law? Supposing Lord Clanricarde has acted as hundreds and thousands of creditors in London act every day of the week, is that a reason for refusing to him the protection that is given every day in London? It may or may not be a sufficient justification for visiting Lord Clanricarde with punishment by the pressure which I hope public opinion will always exercise through public-spirited members of the community; but it is not my business, it cannot be the business of any man connected with the responsible government of either England or Ireland, to enforce, by a violation of the actual law, his particular view, not of the legal, but of the higher moral obligation of individuals; and until it can be shown that the Government should undertake in Ireland a new and modern duty which no Executive has ever undertaken, either in England or in any civilised country, I maintain that no legitimate criticism can be passed upon the action of the Government with regard to the Clanricarde estates.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I do not rise for the purpose of following the Chief Secretary in the remarks he has just addressed to the House; no doubt they will be dealt with by those competent to deal with the matter. But, in reference to his English parallel, I cannot refrain from saying that when England is covered by a centralised police employed in extracting unjust rents for cruel landlords under the direction of Resident Magistrates in direct communication with the Home Office, then it will be time to discuss the parallel the right hon. Gentleman has suggested between England and Ireland. One of the principal duties of the Chief Secretary is to answer the complaints of the Irish Members, too often well founded, with regard to what, in many instances, appear to us on this side of the House to be harsh and illegal conduct on the part of the Irish police. Why should we not know the code of regulations which govern the conduct of the Irish police? If there is nothing illegal in the code, what object can there be in concealing the instructions? If it contains anything that is illegal, it is all the more necessary that the House should be in possession of the facts. If we had this knowledge, I certainly think it might tend to prevent many of those questions now addressed to the Chief Secretary, and we could ascertain for ourselves whether in any given instance the police acted according to rule, or whether they acted according to their own ideas. So far as I can ascertain, this secrecy about regulations does not exist elsewhere. In regard to the Naval and Military Services, the regulations are most voluminously laid down in the Queen's Regulations and other documents that govern the Services and are open to all. With the exception of the case of the Metropolitan Police, which is also a centralised body, there is practically no secrecy kept up in connection with police regulations in this country, and I have the testimony of Chief Constables in many parts of England that there is no secrecy about the Police regulations. In many cases the actual rules and Code have been forwarded in response to my inquiry. From the ex-chairman of the Birmingham Watch Committee I have the information that there is nothing secret about the rules for the Birmingham Police, and he says he does not see how there can be any advantage in secrecy; and from Oxford, Scarborough, and other places, I have similar answers to my inquiries. At Scarborough even the Minute Book of the Watch Committee can be inspected by the public. The Chief Constable at Liverpool informs me that there is no secrecy about the Liverpool Police Code, and that any citizen can obtain a copy of it. This gentleman tells me he was formerly in the Royal Irish Constabulary, and he says he could never understand why there should be any secrecy about the Irish Code. He mentions, also, that on one occasion a friend of his wanted a copy of the Code for guidance in reference to a Police Force at the Cape, but he was informed, in reply to his request for a copy, that he must make his application through the Cape Government. Before this formal action could be taken the need for the Code had passed away. What can be the reason for all this pretended secrecy? I say pretended because, as a matter of fact, it is always possible to get a copy of the Code if you will only take the trouble. I am sorry the Chief Secretary has gone away; there is another question I have to ask him in reference to the now famous battering ram. I take an interest in the machine, for I believe I was the first to make its acquaintance. I came across it by chance at Letterkenny Railway Station, and by inquiry obtained many particulars about it. We were also able to obtain some information about it by questions here in the House.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question cannot be raised under this Vote. If it is an instrument used by the police, then it should be discussed under the Police Vote.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. H. J. WILSON: I bow to your ruling, Sir, my reference was only to answers I was about to quote, given by the Chief Secretary on this subject in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle.

THE CHAIRMAN: That in no way alters the view I take, that the subject cannot be discussed under this Vote.

MR. H. J. WILSON: Then I pass from that subject to ask the right hon. Gentleman who is now in his place some questions in relation to the system adopted in Ireland of watching the movements of English Members of Parliament who visit that country. At various times, in answer to questions, the right hon. Gentleman has given various rulings on this subject, and I should like to know the rules under which the police act, for we have heard sometimes that Members have been followed because they were known sympathisers with the Nationalist Party, and at other times we have been told that Members were viewed with suspicion because they were not known to the police. We have also good cause to complain of the inaccuracy of the information which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary gives us in this House. The right hon. Gentleman seems to believe in the infallibility of his informants; he may hear the statements of hon. Members on this side of the House, but if these statements are contradicted by any of his subordinates the right hon. Gentleman at once accepts those contradictions as correct.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be always ready to accept proof of any error.

MR. H. J. WILSON: This false information must be supplied by somebody. I do not attribute his replies to his imagination. The right hon. Gentleman ought to afford us means of tracing to its source the grossly inaccurate information which he offers to the House. In the case of Mitchelstown the Chief Secretary has been obliged to admit his error; but he has not informed the country of the source of that error. Yet the right hon. Gentleman will not afford opportunity for checking his statements.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said I should be delighted to receive any proof that the statements made were erroneous.

MR. H. J. WILSON: I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman has made the matter much clearer. In conclusion, I desire to protest against the abominable system by which Ireland is governed, and which necessitates the perpetration of all kinds of iniquity by the subordinates of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MAC NEILL: I must say I could not see the analogy the right hon. Gentleman attempted to draw between his own position and that of the Home Secretary in England. The Home Secretary governs on Constitutional principles and is amenable to public opinion. The right hon. Gentleman governs Ireland in defiance of the wishes of its representatives and in defiance of every Constitutional principle. The Chief Secretary is simply the governor of Ireland and the real head of all Departments, though of some he is not the nominal head. The Irish Secretary is as despotic in Ireland as the Czar in Russia. To-night the right hon. Gentleman assumed something of his earlier manner, of the acidulated virtuous manner when he said that he would not interfere with the course of justice. The present Secretary shows a very different spirit from his predecessor, the President of the Board of Trade, who displayed a more benevolent and humane spirit than the present Chief Secretary with respect to the Clancricarde estate. I bring this charge against the present Administration, that the Crimes Act is being administered by agents of the right hon. Gentleman, not for the purpose of prosecuting crime, but as a means of destroying political opponents for partisan, selfish, and personal ends. I will divide the administration of that Act under three heads.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid it does not come under the head of this Vote.

MR. MAC NEILL: As it is under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman that prosecutions have been instituted, may I not refer to the circumstances?

THE CHAIRMAN: Not under this Vote.

MR. MAC NEILL: The position of the right hon. Gentleman is so complex that I feel some difficulty in keeping within the limits of a Vote. But I think I may be allowed to say that I have always thought it an axiom of criminal justice that the punishment should quickly follow the crime. But that is not the rule followed by the right hon. Gentleman. The punishment under the Crimes Act is sometimes suspended for four or five months, and it was so in the case of my hon. Friend the Member for N. E. Cork. My hon. Friend delivered a speech at Ballyneale on September 30; but not until four months afterwards was he prosecuted for that speech. He was not prosecuted until late in January, and meantime he had given evidence before the Special Commission.

from whom he derives his tainted knowledge. I must say this—that the most obnoxious of the Irish Magistrates are those whom the right hon. Gentleman seems most readily to single out for advancement. The right hon. Gentleman at first said that Donegal was in a state of revolution, but he afterwards stated that the revolution was confined to a single barony; but, at any rate, whatever Donegal is now, it was quiet before the right hon. Gentleman came into office, and its disturbed condition, since then, may be regarded as a curious coincidence. But if the police had to failed to carry out his original intention. He also set out to crush the Plan of Campaign, but in this, as in every one of his projects, the right hon. Gentleman has miserably failed. He says, on English platforms, that he has restored to Ireland peace, liberty, and prosperity; but what is the fact? Throughout the greater part of Ireland at this moment the right hon. Gentleman dare not allow a public meeting to be held at which his policy would be criticised. He stifles the voice of the Irish people by his battalions of soldiers and police. If he has restored peace and order in Ireland, why is it that if we wish to address our constituents we are obliged to employ strategy? As it is, none of us can go to any part of the South of Ireland to address a meeting without risking the lives of the people to whom we desire to speak. All the elements which constitute a healthy public life are suspended in Ireland. If you go to any typical town like Tralee, Cork, or Killarney, you will find a state of things which can only be paralleled in those places that are under the rule of the Czar of Russia or the Sultan of Turkey. We cannot call a meeting but the police rush forth with their bayonets and batons and smash the heads of the people, whom they disperse in all directions, afterwards preparing prosecutions against any public man who happens to have made a speech. No one who has anything to do with public affairs can travel about the country without being followed by policemen, who mount guard over every house he enters, and no newspaper can publish reports of public meetings without the publisher being subjected to prosecution, several Members of this House having been imprisoned simply for reporting in their papers speeches delivered at public meetings. The right hon. Gentleman has only succeeded in holding down the great bulk of the Irish people under the grip of an iron coercion by means of a police force and a military force more numerous and more powerful than that which is required in any other portion of the British dominions, and the moment the right hon. Gentleman relaxes that iron grip, all the elements which he boasts he has suppressed will spring up again in full strength. The truth is that the right hon. Gentleman's administration of the affairs of Ireland has been a miserable and a contemptible failure from beginning to the end. With regard to the Vandeleur estate the hon. Member for South Tyrone wrote a letter to the Times, in which he practically said that Captain Vandeleur was a fool for submitting to the demands of the tenants, and yet he has had the face to get up in this House, trusting to their forgetfulness of the facts of the case, and pretending that he did his best to induce the parties to bring about the settlement. That settlement was arrived at in spite of the hon. Gentleman, and in spite of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and all the forces at the back of the Executive. The audacity of the hon. Gentleman is only paralleled—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Will the hon. Gentleman come to the point?

MR. GILL: The Chief Secretary for Ireland has done his best to prevent the settlement on the Vandeleur estate. Private individuals, however, have managed to bring the dispute to a satisfactory close. The Very Rev. Dr. Dinan and several priests helped to bring about the settlement, and they were described in a letter by the right hon. Gentleman's chief agent (Colonel Turner) as "Old Dinan and his villainous priests." The Chief Secretary for Ireland has not dared to repudiate that language.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I knew nothing about the letter.

MR. GILL: The fact that the right hon. Gentleman has not heard of the letter makes his own attack on the priests of Clare more wanton and uncalled for. I brought Colonel Turner's letter to the notice of the Chief Secretary for Ireland a night or two ago, and the right hon. Gentleman did not repudiate the language it contained, nor did he say it was reprehensible. On the contrary, he adopted the spirit of the language by saying that there were priests in Clare who were unworthy of their cloth. I say that to plain men this means that he justifies and adopts the language of Colonel Turner. The conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in this matter is certainly not wise, looking at the way in which the Irish people venerate the clergy of their Church; and it is conduct of which he has every reason to be ashamed, and for which, if he has the spirit of a man, he would get up and apologise. Advantage ought not to be taken of a seat in this House for the purpose of levelling gratuitous insults at anybody. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman in justice to these gentlemen whom he has traduced, and in justice to this House, which ought not to be made the vehicle for gratuitous insults—I challenge him to name the priests to whom he intended to refer. Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered when I said that this House should not be made the vehicle for gratuitous insults. I beg to inform them that I do not use language against any man in this House which I would not use outside, and I venture to assert that unless the right hon. Gentleman names these priests he is guilty of conduct which I do not care to describe. I ask him not to despise or sneer at these imputations against him in regard to the manner in which he discharges his duties as Chief Secretary, and as the representative of the Government of a great empire. He has described some of the priests of Clare as men unworthy of the cloth they wear; and I again appeal to him not to lightly pass over this matter, for if he does I am sure that this assembly, which still possesses the instincts of honour which has been one of its noblest traditions, will view his conduct in the light which it deserves. The right hon. Gentleman has thrown himself against the Plan of Campaign, but he has failed to break it down. He has interfered to prevent settlements, yet private individuals have carried out settlements between landlord and tenant, despite his efforts. I should like for a few minutes to refer to the case of Lord Clanricarde, which has been so ably dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford this evening. The whole gist of the answer of the Chief Secretary to the right hon. Gentleman's charge was that he had had nothing to do with this case; that it was simply a matter between a creditor and his debtors, and that, consequently, he did not concern himself with it. But may I point out that that is not the view which his predecessor in the Irish Administration—the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bristol—took. When the right hon. Baronet was in office he also had to deal with Lord Clanricarde, and in what manner did he deal with this very difficult question? He found that

Lord Clanricarde was described by the highest Court in Ireland as a person whose name had become notoriously disgraceful throughout the Empire, and whose conduct towards his tenants could not be justified under any circumstances. He found, in fact, that justice was on the side of the tenant, and that injustice, cruelty, and oppression were ranged on the side of Lord Clanricarde. Lord Clanricarde, at that time, appealed to the Government for help in carrying out his policy of extermination and vengeance, and the right hon. Baronet, who was then Chief Secretary, did not hesitate to enter into a correspondence which was made public, and which in fact came out in the course of the trial of the libel action brought by Mr. Joyce (Lord Clanricarde's agent) against Lord Clanricarde. From that correspondence we find that the right hon. Baronet summoned Mr. Joyce to his presence, and informed him that he could not lend him the forces of the Crown to assist in the evictions, unless the claims of the tenants got a better hearing at the hands of Lord Clanricarde. Lord Clanricarde thereupon wrote to the right hon. Baronet in his usual style, abusing him for the attitude which he, as a member of the Executive, had taken up, and the right hon. Baronet, in reply, justified his action, and again refused to lend Lord Clanricarde the forces of the Crown, or in any way to facilitate the carrying out the process of the law against the tenants under the circumstances which then existed. Therefore it will be seen that the right hon. Baronet did not plead that he had no concern in this matter as the present Chief Secretary has asserted. The right hon. Baronet found it was essential, in the interests of peace and order, that Lord Clanricarde should not be backed up by the Government in his proceedings against his tenants, and consequently in an hour of mistaken zeal he did his best to exercise what he himself described as "pressure within the law." The attempt, unfortunately, proved a miserable failure. Indeed, it was one of many miserable failures which have characterised the present Irish Administration. The right hon. Baronet having failed in his exercise of "pressure within the law," the tenants were compelled to meet the exigencies of the case by establishing an organisation of their own.

and this organisation, which I contend was absolutely necessary and laudable under the circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary has done his best to crush. I declare that the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman has been a failure from first to last. I declare that in his administration of the prisons, and in his action towards public meetings, as well as in his attitude towards the Plan of Campaign, and the position which he has taken up in regard to recalcitrant landlords he has failed in every respect, and he has simply led the Government on from one disgraceful failure to another. At the present moment after all his efforts to break down and crush the Irish people, we know that combinations against the landlords have succeeded. Over and over again in this House attention has been called to the action of the right hon. Gentleman in connection with the proceedings of the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire and his syndicate in the South of Ireland. I do not think it is necessary to refresh the memories of the Committee on this subject. We have too recently seen the right hon. Gentleman using the forces of the Crown as well as the eloquence which he undoubtedly possesses in upholding the action of that syndicate against the unfortunate tenantry on the Ponsonby Estate, simply because they had succeeded with the assistance of the Plan of Campaign in holding out against the injustice which was to be perpetrated upon them. We have seen the right hon. Gentleman proceeding against these tenants as an act of vengeance and tyranny, and we have seen him helping this miserable gang of landlords, who have leagued themselves together with objects of vengeance. Can he point to a single feature of his Government which can be described as a genuine success? When he first came into power there did exist in Ireland some measure of public liberty. Members of Parliament, at any rate, were able to visit their constituencies without running the risk of getting the heads of those constituents broken by police batons, or of themselves being arrested and prosecuted. We cannot forget how the Member for North Monaghan was brutally treated by the police on a recent occasion, and yet we know that no steps have been taken to punish the assailants of that hon. Gentleman. Not only have public meetings been suppressed, not only have the people been batoned, but Irishmen have been sent to prison wholesale; and scarcely a week passes but that a Representative from Ireland is either sent to prison or is released from gaol after serving his punishment. Indeed, throughout the length and breadth of Ireland there reigns simply brute tyranny, oppression, and coercion; a condition of things which constitutes the greatest mockery of the name of British liberty.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I very much regret that the consideration of the Irish Estimates should have been delayed till this advanced period of the Session. I do not know who is to blame for it, but I know that it is very much to be deplored that only in the middle of August should we have an opportunity of examining the Irish administration as a whole. Now I am not going to inflict a speech upon this House, but I do wish to enter one or two protests on the subject of Irish administration, not with reference to the right hon. Gentleman personally, but with reference to the policy which he is carrying out and for which he is responsible. The right hon. Gentleman is often attacked with great severity for what is really not his policy but the policy of Parliament. Parliament has resolved that a certain policy shall be carried out in the administration of Ireland, and Parliament has no right, therefore, to find fault with a Minister who is honestly, capably, and courageously carrying out its policy. It is only fair and just to the right hon. Gentleman that I should say that. I may remind hon. Gentlemen of the celebrated repartee of Lord Beaconsfield when a right hon. Gentleman was attacking him on the ground of the illogical nature of the policy of his Government. Lord Beaconsfield told the right hon. Gentleman who complained that he forgot that this country was not governed by logic; it was governed by Parliament. The Chief Secretary does not, however, follow Lord Beaconsfield's precedent; he governs by logic, but he does not govern by Parliament. I have often admired the astuteness with which the Chief Secretary logically defends his position; indeed, he has a logical answer on every point on which he is attacked.

Of course, if human beings were factors in a mathematical problem it would be all very well; but they are not; they are possessed with infirmities and weaknesses, aye, and excellences, which statesmanship must deal with, and, therefore, you cannot govern a great nation logically, as the right hon. Gentleman is now trying to do. The attempt to govern Ireland logically will consequently be a failure. Now, what I want to call the attention of the Chief Secretary to is this—there are three classes of feeling existing at the present time in Ireland for which the Chief Secretary is responsible, and which are among the most deplorable facts of the present situation. The first, which I do not think will be disputed, is that there exists in Ireland a widespread dissatisfaction with the administration of justice. We are so familiar with the fact in this House that familiarity breeds not only contempt, but almost indifference; but outside the House it is plain that we have in Ireland that which exists in no other part of Her Majesty's Empire or indeed in any part of the world. The overwhelming majority of the Irish people and their 86 representatives in the House of Commons, rightly or wrongly, do not believe that justice is fairly and impartially administered. That feeling arises to a great extent from the conduct of the Executive Government. Now, an Executive Government can do many things, it can deprive the people of their political rights, dissociate them from the government of their own affairs, and oppress them with taxation; but in the long run it cannot deprive the people of justice. A man's sense of injustice is his keenest feeling, and this fact will have to be dealt with sooner or later. It will be impossible to go on governing Ireland with four-fifths of the people believing that justice is not fairly administered, and with the Executive Government, under the superintendence of the right hon. Gentleman, sanctioning, supporting, and defending the administration of justice of which the people so keenly and constantly complain. The next sentiment for which the Chief Secretary is responsible is the patent hostility to the administration of the law in every part of Ireland. This antagonism to the administration of the law does not exist in England, because the people are in sympathy with the law, and a different feeling would prevail in Ireland if the Executive Government regarded the people as much as the administrators of the law. It may be asked, how is the Chief Secretary responsible for this? Well, the Chief Secretary is responsible for the antagonistic feeling in Ireland, because he chivalrously regarded it as part of his duty to defend every man who is engaged in the administration of the law. [Cheers.] Hon. Members opposite cheer that; but they would not let a Home Secretary act in the same way. They do not look upon him as a Minister to defend the administration of the law, but to protect the liberties of the people and to hold an equal balance. The Chief Secretary ought not to take it for granted that out of 12,000 or 14,000 men engaged in the administration of the law every one is perfectly trustworthy, perfectly wise, and blameless of any irregularity—that they are invariably right and the public are invariably wrong. During the last two years in the House I do not think that I have once heard the Chief Secretary admit that the police are wrong, yet they must be wrong sometimes. Even a Queen's County Grand Jury of Tory landlords at the last Assizes proposed a Presentment censuring the police for their foolish conduct at the time of Father M'Fadden's arrest. I am not taking the events connected with that arrest and with the unfortunate murder which followed otherwise than as an illustration of how a feeling may be created in the minds of the people that whatever is said or done by the police, by the Resident Magistrates, or by the Prisons Board, it will be defended in the House of Commons. I arraign and challenge the policy which the Chief Secretary honourably, courageously, and chivalrously pursues. Every man in this large army engaged in the administration of justice is turned into a combatant in the civil war now going on in Ireland with the people on one side and the police and Executive on the other. The other point for which the Chief Secretary is responsible is that the right hon. Gentleman has sanctioned, and, I fear, upheld, a great amount of official disrespect for Parliamentary government and for the Members of this House. The men who are in command of the Constabulary and who have the administration of justice in their hands have, I am sorry to say, with the sanction of their official superiors, fallen into the belief that the correct thing for them to do is to show contempt for the House of Commons. If anyone is to be dealt with in Ireland with more contempt than another that man is a Member of Parliament. We are sometimes irritated and annoyed in this House with oppositions and proceedings which we do not like, and there is, perhaps, a great deal to justify our irritation; but it is a great blunder to weaken the respect for Parliamentary institutions in this country, even when it is done by Parliament itself. It is a serious thing when any Department of the Public Service is allowed to do this. Such is not the rule in the English Service—either in the Military or the Naval Service or in the English Constabulary. The rule is for every head of an Administrative Department to insist upon the officers under his control treating the decisions of the House, and the proceedings of the House, and the Members of the House with that respect—official respect, at all events—to which they are entitled, having regard to the place they fill in the Constitution of the Empire. It is dangerous to encourage a want of respect for Parliament and its Members—there is a menace in all these things. In England and Scotland we have been safe, members of the Civil Service caring not who comes or goes. They know that they have done their duty to the Crown and Government, and they say: "We have never mixed ourselves up with political Parties—our destinies will be as safe with one side as with the other." But do you think that if these men became political partisans, that will be their state of mind; and do you think there is no danger of introducing the American system into this country? That, to my mind, is one of the rocks ahead in the administration of Ireland. I would point that out to the Irish Government and to those Civil servants who do not seem to look many days ahead. The Civil servants pursue an unwise policy in bringing themselves into collision with one of the great Parties of this House. I do not wish to protract this Debate, or to introduce anything of a personal element into it, or anything which the right

hon. Gentleman could regard as such, but I feel it to be seriously holding that whether you there or not, if you want peace in Ireland, the people must be satisfied that justice is done. You must be satisfied with the law and support a hostility to it, as one branch of Ireland to take part in a conflict which shows antagonism in the State by has been the way of the Public Service. No doubt the people of this House, as of the constituency, but granting all armed with this moral force at his disposal, has been wiser for Ireland if he had that great Irish Drummond, as has every individual in Ireland as being equal and impartial law as any police Magistrate in the country. (Mr. W. A. M. County, Ossory) ing from the right has just sat down has made that Government was General Election site, when best declared against had they obtained they departed for substituted for the declared one of violence. My object in rising on behalf of peace is to desire to ask the Government on the 23rd of next celebration of the Larkin, and O'Brien reverse the policy, and allow fairly to express these men. The lieve that the me chester in 1867 were brave men, who tried to do their duty to their country; that they were unjustly convicted and unfairly punished. The memory of these men has been cherished with affection, and will continue to be so cherished as long as Irish hearts can beat. For 20 years the memory of these men was celebrated without opposition on the part of the authorities; but the present Chief Secretary, on entering office, changed all that. Although these meetings had been of a peaceful character, he issued proclamations against them. He did so in 1887, in the case of Limerick, where great irritation was caused, and the police exhibited a violence which was denounced even by the correspondent of the Irish Times. Last year meetings were proclaimed at New Ross, in the County of Wexford, and at Kilkenny, where, had it not been for the action of the Mayor, bloodshed would have occurred in the streets. A proclamation was also issued at Waterford, and the priests and leading inhabitants of the town assembled in the Town Hall, and advised the people not to give the police an opportunity for another Mitchelstown. A similar proclamation was issued at Cahir, and another in the town of Tralee. In the last-named town Mr. Cecil Roche published a proclamation, every word of which was a stab to the feelings of the people over whom he ruled, because he described Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien as convicts who, in due course of law, had been executed at Manchester for the murder of Sergeant Brett. Now, what I want the Committee to apprehend is that while these meetings I have mentioned were proclaimed, nothing was done to prevent meetings in Dublin, in Thomastown, and in Athlone, and it is, therefore, obvious that the policy of the Executive was not uniform. But there is something still more extraordinary behind. In all these towns where the meetings were prohibited, the people were of one mind; consequently, there would have been no breach of the law; but in the town of Dungannon, in loyal Ulster, where there is a large Orange population, the meetings were permitted, and a torchlight procession actually took place. Why was the meeting permitted there? What was the object of the Chief Secretary in permitting the torchlight procession to take place at Dungannon? Was it to provoke a breach of the peace? I cannot believe that that was the right hon. Gentleman's intention, and I should like him to explain to this House why he allowed that meeting to take place in Dungannon, where disturbances might have arisen, owing to the antagonism which prevails between Nationalists and Orangemen, when he prohibited meetings in the South of Ireland, where no such hostile feeling does exist. I do not want to appeal to the humanity of the right hon. Gentleman, I think it would be a waste of words to do that after all he has done in Ireland, and after the small amount of sympathy which he has shown for my hon. Friend (Mr. Patrick O'Brien), who was most cruelly batoned by the police the other day. I repeat that I do not appeal to the humanity of the right hon. Gentleman, but I do appeal to his feelings and ideas as a philosopher. Before the right hon. Gentleman became a distinguished statesman he was not undistinguished as a thinker and as a writer, and there is one doctrine which he has laid down in this House which seems to speak of his better days, and to point to the time when he considered carefully what were the rights of his fellow-men. The doctrine to which I refer was his declaration in this House that there was no man in the House of Commons who more carefully regarded or more respected the expression of the opinion of others than he did. Now, Sir, I say that the action of the Irish people in celebrating the death of these men by processions, and by holding meetings, is simply an expression of opinion, and there is no excuse whatever for interference on the part of the Crown. Twenty years have elapsed since these men were executed at Manchester. In that period a great change of public opinion has occurred; therefore, if the Chief Secretary really cares for freedom of speech, and for freedom of opinion in Ireland, he will allow these peaceable processions and peaceable meetings to take place in November next. He will know that they are merely an expression of opinion on the part of the Irish people. Does he suppose that by suppressing these gatherings he will change the belief of the people that the men executed were martyrs into the directly opposite belief that they were convicts deserving the punishment that they received? If he thinks that, he must be strangely ignorant of the feelings of Irishmen. Now, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to say plainly does he intend to proclaim these meetings next November, and does he desire to exasperate the people by preventing their taking place? There are a large number of Englishmen who have come to look upon these executions in a very different way from that in which they regarded them during a time of panic; and I have no doubt whatever that the time will come when the historians of the future, whether they be English or Irish, will see that it was a generous and self-sacrificing act on the part of these men which led them to their fate. And the right hon. Gentleman might as well try to turn the sun from its course as seek to reverse the verdict of history which is being formed before his eyes.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I think we may be content to leave all considerations as to the general effect of the right hon. Gentleman's administration in Ireland to the calm, authoritative, and unanswered speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. Everything he said was unquestionably true, and very little, indeed, can be added to it. I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman thought it judicious not to attempt an answer. I desire now to pass away from questions of general policy and to ask a practical question with regard to a particular Department in the office of the Chief Secretary, and with respect to a subject which peculiarly affects some of my own constituents. In the year before last an Act of Parliament was passed, entitled "An Act to amend the Fishery Acts of Ireland," and it provided that where a certain proportion of the fishermen of any particular district petitioned the Inspectors of Fisheries for the prevention of trawling, the Inspectors should be empowered to make bye-laws prohibiting trawling within the limits referred to in the petition, and if they did not grant the prayer of the petitioners within two months, then they were to forward the petition to the Lord Lieutenant stating their reasons for the refusal. The Act further provides that the Lord Lieutenant in Council should have power, on receiving the petition, to direct the prayer of the petitioners to be heard. Now, Sir, under that Act two petitions were presented; one from Galway Bay, and the other from Lough Swilly. The fishermen of Lough Swilly, in their petition, represented that their industry was being ruined by the operation of a very small number of trawlers, and that petition, as well as the petition from Galway Bay, was rejected by the Inspectors of Fisheries. There has for 70 years been free fishing in Lough Swilly. Between 1844 and 1869 trawling in Lough Swilly was prohibited, and during that period the condition of the fishermen there was satisfactory. But since 1869 trawling has been again allowed, and the fishing industry has been seriously injured. Indeed, the injury is so extensive that whereas before trawling was allowed 500 families lived there in comparative comfort now only 300 men are engaged in the industry, and they gain but a very precarious livelihood, while the mischief is done by four trawlers employing only 14 men. The Fishery Commissioners having rejected the petition, it was, in accordance with the Act, sent to the Lord Lieutenant, under whose directions an inquiry was held, and without any assignable reason the petition was rejected by the Privy Council. The unfortunate fishermen taxed themselves to the uttermost to send up members of their body to Dublin to give evidence, and they also went to the expense of feeing counsel. But their counsel was scarcely heard before the Council. Not one of their body was called as a witness, and within four or five minutes the case was disposed of.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress.

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

On the Question that Supply be fixed for Wednesday,

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Having observed that there is a general feeling in the House that Supply should be brought to a close at the end of this week, I would suggest, with a view to facilitating this object, that the Committee should proceed to take non-contentious English Votes for a couple of hours to-morrow evening after half-past 5 o'clock, an arrangement which, I think, may materially help to shorten the Session.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the suggestion, which is an exceedingly reasonable one, and I shall to-morrow propose, therefore, with the concurrence of the House, "that the House do sit after half-past 5 on Wednesday for the consideration of Supply." I understand it will not be agreeable to Irish Members to go on after 5 o'clock with the Irish Votes; but it is exceedingly probable that many English Votes may be disposed of during the two hours and a-half before 8 o'clock. As far as possible these will be non-contentious Votes. I therefore wish to give notice that to-morrow at 12 o'clock I shall move the suspension of the half-past 5 o'clock Rule, so far as Supply is concerned.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): While offering no opposition, I hope the proposal will not be regarded as a precedent in the future, and I protest against the Standing Orders being tampered with upon such short notice.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury to tell the House what Supply will be taken, so that hon. Members may have some short time to prepare.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Member will be quite prepared with a speech on any Vote we may take.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to take the Technical Education Bill on Saturday?

MR. SEXTON: I take it that any Irish Vote that may happen to be under discussion at half-past 5 to-morrow will stand over until Thursday.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Member will see that it will be desirable to conclude the discussion of a Vote which may be before the Committee at half-past 5, otherwise it will be necessary to withdraw the Vote. There should be some little elasticity allowed.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

MR. SEXTON: If an important Vote should be under discussion at half-past 5, we should prefer to go on with it.

MR. W. H. SMITH: We have every desire to meet the convenience of hon. Members from Ireland, and the business to-morrow can be made a matter of arrangement.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope that the rule for the termination of business—or what has come to be considered the rule for the termination of business under the present Government—will not be applied at half-past 5 to-morrow.

Committee to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [17th August] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS VI.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I desire to ask for an explanation in regard to the enormous number of English prison officials who have retired on the ground of ill-health. The number is put down here at 127 in one year, whilst the corresponding number for Scotland and Ireland is only some half-dozen. It is evident that this enormous number of retirements is not a normal state of things—that there must have been some extraordinary clearance of these officials, and I have a right to ask what that clearance is owing to. We were told yesterday that in every case of retirement these officials are examined by the public Medical Officer, and I want to ask whether a special officer has been sent round to the prisons to weed out these officials, or whether the duty has been left to the local gaol Medical Officers? [Cries of "Divide!"] This is a most important matter. Here we have 127 pensions, and I want to know what are the grounds on which we are asked to pay them? [Cries of "Divide!"] I have a right to go into this matter on behalf of the taxpayers of the country. I desire to know whether the Government took measures to ascertain whether or not these people were entitled to retire?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I think I shall be able to satisfy even the critical requirements of the hon. Member. I think that if I can show the hon. Member that these retirements—leaving out the question of cause for the moment—are retirements which actually affect a reduction in the total before us, the hon. Member will admit that we are better off paying the pensions than paying the full salaries. If these retirements had been made on account of abolition of office we should have had to pay higher pensions. As a matter of fact, the phrase “ill-health” in connection with prison warders is different from what it would mean in the case of other Government servants. In the first place, a prison warder has to be in very full physical vigour; he has to take charge of men not always of the most orderly or ruly character; and it is perfectly within the proper meaning of ill-health when the doctor certifies that the warder’s physical vigour and capacity are not equal to the arduous duties he has to discharge. I explained on a previous occasion that the length of service mentioned in the Estimates only refers to the time served under Government after the taking over of the prisons. The hon. Member will find that the number of warders and other officials of corresponding rank in Class I is 208 as against 243 last year, so that there is a total reduction of 35, while there is a reduction in the total strength from 1,333 last year to 1,225 this year, or a reduction of 108 men. The total number retired in the year 1888-89 was 130. The staff of the prisons in the United Kingdom represent about 2,500 men, and I believe that this is not much in excess of the average retirement. Last year it was 110. Be that as it may, these men have all been certified by medical men belonging to the State as being eligible for retirement under the ill-health clause. I believe that they have been properly retired, and I think that as their places have not been filled up the Committee has no reason to complain.

MR. T. M. HEALY: We know these men have important duties to discharge, and that it is essential that they should be maintained in a perfect state of health and physical vigour. They have occasion now and then to knock down Members of Parliament, and to cut off their moustaches; therefore I think the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy is wrong in the position he has taken up in objecting to the retirement of debilitated warders.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury states that warders retired on account of ill-health receive smaller pensions than those retired on abolition of office. That seems to me a remarkable official rule, and it seems to me that it would be far more fitting that men retired on the ground of ill-health should have higher pensions than those retired on abolition of office. Those retired on the ground of ill-health.

Resolution agreed to.

4. “That a sum, not exceeding £4,005, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, in aid of the Local Cost of Maintenance of Pauper Lunatics in Ireland.”

5. “That a sum, not exceeding £7,658, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the support of certain Hospitals and Infirmaries in Ireland.”

MR. SEXTON: The Secretary to the Treasury indicated on Saturday that the Bill the Government have prepared for future settlement of this annual grant would be immediately introduced. As it has not yet made its appearance, I beg to ask the hon. Gentleman for some statement on the subject.

MR. JACKSON: I hope to be able to give notice of the introduction of the Bill to-morrow.

Resolution agreed to.

CLASS VII.

9. "That a sum, not exceeding £12,639, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Salaries and Incidental Expenses of Temporary Commissions and Committees, including Special Inquiries."

11. "That a sum, not exceeding £2,348, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Repayment to the Civil Contingencies Fund of certain Miscellaneous Advances."

12. "That a sum, not exceeding £1,859, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, as a grant in aid to make good certain amounts required to be written off from the Assets of the Local Loans Fund"

13. "That a sum, not exceeding £4,507, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for certain Grants in respect of the Estate of Matthew O'Reilly Dease, bequeathed for the Reduction of the National Debt."

14. "That a sum, not exceeding £1,885, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for certain Advances in Aid of the Emigration and Colonisation of certain crofters and cottars of the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland, including Expenses of Administration."

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The House will remember that on Saturday afternoon I had a notice of Amendment on the Paper in reference to this Vote but withdrew it, in order to enable the Government to obtain the Vote, the understanding being that I should raise the question I desired to bring under the notice of the House on Report. I wish to draw attention to two matters—namely, the neglect of the Postmaster General to carry out any of the recommendations of the Select Committee appointed in 1887 to consider the question of Sunday postal labour, and secondly, the excessive hours of labour of the telegraph clerks of the Metropolis. The Committee of 1887 recommended, with reference to the question of the discontinuance of Sunday postal deliveries, that a system of local option should be introduced, with the proviso that where the postal delivery was discontinued there should be a window delivery. The Committee also recommended that the indoor and outdoor officials should, as far as practicable, have every alternate Sunday to themselves. These were recommendations of a very moderate character, and the second one was in accordance with the views of the Select Committee of 1871. What I complain of is that although the recommendations of the Committee were moderate, the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General has refused to act on them. In November last a question was put to the Postmaster General, and his reply covered the whole ground of the recommendations of the Committee. I will not deal with all those recommendations; but I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman one question with regard to the experiments carried out with book and newspaper packets at Bristol, Nottingham, and Wolverhampton. The right hon. Gentleman stated in his reply that the reduction of the work to the outdoor Post Office officials was counterbalanced by the additional work imposed on the indoor officials. I should like to have some further explanation on that point. He also took exception to our recommendation that window deliveries should be substituted for the present system. He stated that window delivery was dangerous and uncertain; but I would draw attention to the evidence laid before the Select Committee from the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where the system has prevailed for a long time, and where it has resulted in cutting down the labour of Post Office officials to a very considerable extent, because whereas formerly about 50 officials were required, now only 20 have to be in attendance on Sundays. I believe, too, that in only one trifling instance has there been any danger to correspondence in consequence of letters being delivered to a wrong person. Similar evidence was given with regard to towns in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman obtained the opinion of the Town Councils in eight large towns, and he stated that, on the whole, that opinion was adverse to anything like a discontinuance of Sunday postal deliveries. Now, it will be remembered that the Committee recommended that two-thirds of the ratepayers should have the power to decide the point as to whether there should be Sunday deliveries, instead of two-thirds of the receivers of correspondence, as is now the case. We contend that this question of Sunday labour is a national question, which interests everyone in the country, and on which every ratepayer has a right to express his opinion. Now, I am chiefly interested in the last recommendation of the Committee, because it was owing to my own action that it was adopted. That recommendation was that the indoor and outdoor officials should have an alternate day's rest on Sundays. I was very much struck by the reply of the right hon. Gentleman at that point. He said that the indoor officials generally did only two hours work on Sundays, and in most cases they got at least one Sunday out of every three, and he did not think it necessary to afford any further relief. Now, I absolutely contest that assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, and I find, on reference to the evidence of Sir Arthur Blackwood, that in the town of Aberdeen the indoor officials are on duty every Sunday; that in Belfast they are on duty three Sundays out of four; that in Cork the first-class officials are on duty three Sundays out of four, and the second-class on every Sunday; that in Halifax the officials are on duty seven Sundays out of eight, and that the same proportions prevail in many other towns. I venture to suggest, therefore, that this evidence does not support the reply which the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General gave to a question last November. I think it is a great hardship that the sorting clerks should have to be on duty on Sunday after Sunday. I believe, indeed, that in some cases they only get one Sunday off in every 12. We ought to bear in mind that even if a man works only two or three hours on a Sunday the day is practically broken up, and it cannot be considered a complete holiday. I am not bringing this matter forward on Sabbatarian grounds. I am putting it merely on grounds of fairness, and I think we can fairly ask the Postmaster General to advance in the direction I have indicated, and which was indicated in the recommendation of the Committee, and give these men more relief than they now have. I hope I shall hear from the right hon. Gentleman to-night that he is prepared to grant this relief. Now, I desire to touch for one moment on the question of rural messengers. Sir Arthur Blackwood, in his evidence, stated that of the 3,304 rural messengers working on Sundays, 2,242 had alternate Sundays as a day of rest, and that the remaining 1,062 were on duty every Sunday in the year. I should just like to draw the attention of the House to this question: How much would it cost to enable these 1,062 men to get a complete rest on every alternate Sunday? In the Debate last year there was a strong expression of opinion on this point by the hon. Member for Oxford University—an opinion which should carry great weight with it on the other side of the House. The hon. Gentleman said it was plainly the duty of the Secretary to the Treasury to loosen the purse strings and provide the moderate amount necessary to furnish this much desired relief. I will not quote the speech; but if hon. Members will refer to Hansard they will find that the hon. Gentleman gave the strongest possible expression of opinion on the matter. Surely out of the mighty surplus arising from Post Office administration the trifling sum of £3,000 or £4,000 could be set apart for this purpose. I therefore hope we shall have from the Postmaster General some assurance of his willingness to give way on this point. And now I wish to draw attention to some facts which have been placed in my hands by the noble Lord the Member for the Barnsley Division of Yorkshire with regard to telegraph clerks in the Metropolis, and on these facts I have to ask for some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman. It will be remembered that some years since, when Mr. Fawcett was at the head of the Department, it was pointed out that the clerks at the Central Telegraph Office suffered severely from the long hours of night labour, and as a result they were reduced from eight to seven. But I am informed that even now some of the clerks do day as well as night duty; that they work from 10 a.m. till 3 p.m., from 5 p.m. till 8 p.m., and from 8 p.m. till 7 a.m., or a total of 19 out of every 24 hours. I am informed that the telegraph clerks are performing 14 hours work a day—from 12 at noon until 2 a.m. on the following day—with only one hour during the whole of that period for their meals. I am also told that the clerks who have objected to working these hours have been called upon to give a written explanation. I should like to have some information as to the truth of these statements, and a guarantee that these excessive hours of work for these officials, if substantiated, shall be reduced. I beg to move the Motion that stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£4,752,553," in order to insert "£4,752,453."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That '£4,752,553' stand part of the Resolution."

MR. T. M. HEALY: As a point of order, I should like to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether it has not been ruled that a reduction of a Vote cannot be moved on Report stage?

*MR. SPEAKER: It has never been so ruled.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General if he will give us some information as to the issuing of warrants by the Chief Secretary in Ireland and the Home Secretary in England for the opening of the letters of Members of Parliament? I would ask whether the warrants have been directed against the correspondence of particular persons; whether they are for stated periods of time, and, if so, for what periods; what is the date of the last; and considering the admission that a certain letter addressed to me was opened by an unauthorised person, what precautions the right hon. Gentleman has taken, or intends to take, against the opening of a letter in the Post Office by a person not having legal authority?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I have given notice to the right hon. Gentleman of my intention to direct his attention to the Special Commission, and to Mr. Maberley's conduct in connection with the trial. We know from the action of the Attorney General during the Parnell Commission that, although it has been strenuously denied that such a thing has taken place, letters of Irish Members have been opened in the Post Office, for the Attorney General was able to produce one addressed by Dr. Kenny to Mr. O'Kelly. The Attorney General could only have obtained possession of the letter surreptitiously. I make no comment on the Attorney General's action as a lawyer in using a document which could only be obtained burglariously. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not hesitate to make use of the letters improperly obtained; but that, of course, is merely a question of good taste. We know that this practice of opening letters of ours has been constantly going on, and I think it most desirable we should have a clear understanding of what is taking place in the matter. For my own part, I have always made it a rule, not only since I entered public life, but before, not to put anything in a letter which I would not care to have published at Charing Cross. Therefore, I do not in the least object to the Postmaster General having my correspondence opened before him, provided he forwards it on to me afterwards without unnecessary delay. Unfortunately, however, that course has not been pursued, because letters, and letters even containing cheques for large amounts, addressed to me, have been unwarrantably detained at the Post Office. This has not occurred for some time, but still it has taken place, and only lately I have seen letters addressed to other hon. Members which have been opened before delivery. There is a gentleman in sub-command of the General Post Office in Dublin, named Maberly, and the moment the Parnell Commission began its sittings, Maberly put himself in communication with Mr. Soames. This established what we have had always contended—namely, that this was a Government inquiry, or, as the Home Secretary puts it, a great State trial. Members of the Government have spoken with two voices in this matter. While the Home Secretary has described the Parnell Commission as a great State trial, other Members of the Government have taken an entirely different line, and have said it is not a great State trial, but a private inquiry conducted by a private newspaper against private individuals. I do not know on what ground the Postmaster General is going to defend Mr. Maberly's conduct, but this I do say that the Times could never have got at the contents of any letter in the Dead Letter Office in Dublin if the arrangements of that office had been kept absolutely secret from Mr. Soames by the gentlemen connected with the Department. If the Government were placing all their resources at the disposal of the Times, and thoroughly glorified in the transaction, I should not attach the least blame to Mr. Maberly for going to Mr. Soames and giving him all the information at his disposal. That would be an intelligible stand to take; but when the Government allege that they have given the Times no aid at all, and when they say that the Attorney General who conducted the case for the Times was not the Attorney General in that case but Sir R. Webster acting as a private barrister, and that Mr. Soames was there as a private solicitor, I want to know how they obtained their information from the Dead Letter Office. Speaking roughly, Mr. Maberly is a gentleman who is known in Ireland as of the Orange persuasion, and has replaced all his Catholic officials by Protestants. In this case the Government, or rather Mr. Soames—I really do not know which, for they are like the trinity in unity—served Mr. Maberly with a subpoena duces tecum to produce certain letters from that office, and the documents which he had to bring with him must have been specified. How could Mr. Soames have known of Mr. Maberly's existence or of the evidence which he could give and the documents which he could produce from the Dead Letter Office except from Mr. Maberly himself? But though Mr. Maberly was in attendance at the Court, he was never called, although no doubt his documents were examined by the Attorney General—or, I ought to say, by Sir Richard Webster, because, of course, he was not Her Majesty's Attorney General. Dr. Jekyll was then Mr. Hyde. Mr. Soames was supplied with all the information which it was in the power of Mr. Maberly to produce. Dead letters are dealt with in a particular way if no owner is found after a certain period; and why, then, were these particular letters kept so long? In the ordinary course they would have been destroyed. I would ask the Postmaster General if these were State documents, and were to be used for State purposes, why were they not sent to Dublin Castle or the Kildare Street Club? I ask for information on this point. I ask what is the rule with regard to dead letters and their destruction? I must say that all the assurances which the right hon. Gentleman may give will not satisfy the Irish Members as to the non-existence of the practice of tampering with our letters in the Dublin Post Office. I do not complain of their examining our letters for certain purposes. When they have a whole population against them as they have in Ireland, and when they believe that whole population to be murderers, as they say they do in the case of Ireland, they must take some precautions. I do not object to their getting up and saying, "We will open the letters of the whole 86 of you." That would be an intelligible and justifiable attitude to take up. In one of the Invincible cases, I forget which, it was the opening of letters which enabled the Government to get upon the track of the men connected with the crime. That, I say, would be an intelligible position to take up. But what I hate in the business is that the Government say they do not do this, and that they say—"We are a pure Government; we remember Sir Charles Graham, and do not do this sort of thing." They are ashamed to acknowledge in the face of Europe what they are doing, and they endeavour to obtain the advantages of the methods of foreign despotism with the appearance of liberal and enlightened administration. It is known for a fact that packets of letters were constantly taken to the Castle by an official, were steamed and opened, and read in the presence of the Lord Lieutenant (Lord Londonderry), and afterwards forwarded, or not, as the Government thought best. Now, what is the rule with regard to Ireland? I presume that the Lord Lieutenant has power to issue warrants, and that he does issue them. So notorious is the practice, that when in the case of the famous Mr. Cornwall, the Secretary of the Dublin Post Office, the gentleman who retired on the ground of ill health, and whose pension has lately been voted, when we subjected him to inquisition in the French scandal, he said—

"The only acquaintance I had with French was when he came to me and got certain letters; and sometimes I would give him a letter because he never came to me without a warrant; " and yet at that time Mr. Fawcett was assuring us that nothing of the kind was going on. In the same way the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General will get up and say he is not aware of any such practice. I do not suppose that his subordinates come and tell the right hon. Gentleman; but I would ask him, will he take steps to ascertain from those in the Dublin Post Office whether this sort of thing is being done? Let the Postmaster General call them before him and have no hanky-panky about it; but say, "I want to know what is the practice; I want to see the steamkettle by which this is done." He might also visit the mail boats, which are mightily convenient and accommodating places for this sort of thing, it being notorious that letters are opened and examined on board those boats, and that numbers of the detective staff have travelled in them for the purpose of identifying the handwriting of certain persons; while in cases where they did not know it themselves, they have taken other persons with them for the same purpose. I could name a person who was at one time a Member of Parliament, who travelled with detectives from Dublin for the purpose of identifying the handwriting of Members of this House; and there can be no doubt that Sir Richard Webster got the letter of Dr. O'Kelly by some similar kind of metempsychosis. The Attorney General is sitting next the Postmaster General, who may, perhaps, consult his friend on the subject. What we say is this: Here is the system going on now as it has been going on for years. I should not object to its going on if the Government would only say, "We require it to be done and will continue to do it," because in that case the public would act accordingly. As far as we are concerned, it is well-known that where any letters of ours are urgent and require secrecy, we never entrust them to the British postman, and the fact that the Post Office is not trusted is one which the Postmaster General ought to take notice of and be anxious to remedy. I protest also against the way in which the Catholics are treated in Dublin. The Dublin Post Office is a nest of Orangemen and Freemasons—gentlemen who band themselves together for the purpose of preventing the Catholics from getting promotion, and who are, in reality, an association for boycotting Catholics. Under all these circumstances I do think the right hon. Gentleman, if he has the time, ought, during the holidays, to pay the Dublin Post Office a visit in order that he may overhaul these people and find out what is really going on.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the remarks that have been made by hon. Members opposite, I may say that I have made inquiries, as well as experiments, as to the subject introduced by the hon. Member for East Northampton; but, after inquiries, I have found that work would be rather increased than diminished if his suggestion were carried out. Careful consideration has also been given to the subject of the delivery of letters on Sundays with a view to the possibility of its being discontinued. The Department put themselves in communication with the eight largest towns in England, and asked the Town Councils to give their opinions as to the practicability or desirability of introducing that change. Six, including Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham, declared against making any such change in the postal arrangements. Bristol did not express an opinion, and Nottingham was in favour of the change; but even in Nottingham the majority was not sufficient to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee. The hon. Member suggested that we might try the system of window deliveries. After consulting the persons most experienced in the large towns of this country, the Department were forced to the conclusion that it was not adapted to populous places in this country. The danger of letters getting into wrong hands and the great pressure are certainly to be avoided in the interests of the public. In some places there would be danger of the post offices being mobbed. This country is not like Scotland or Newcastle, where the people are not accustomed to have their letters delivered on Sundays. The principle shall, however, be recognised in less populous places. As regards giving postmen alternate Sundays off, a good deal has been done, and some thousands of pounds spent. I can assure the hon. Member that my attention has been called to the question of reducing the pressure of labour inside post offices as well as outside. As to the hours of work by telegraph clerks in the Metropolis, the hon. Member did not give notice of his intention to bring that subject forward, and consequently I am not prepared to meet him at this moment. I am afraid, however, it is a fact that some of the clerks, especially in the central office, work for a longer time than is desirable; but the work is generally overtime work, performed by volunteers for additional wages. But I promise to look into the matter. As regards the serious charges against the administration of the Post Office in Ireland, I can supplement the statement which I made on Saturday by saying that the warrants issued by the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland by the Home Secretary for England and Scotland, authorising the opening of the letters of particular persons, are not expressly limited in regard to their duration. A warrant given to intercept the correspondence of any particular individual continues to run until it is cancelled. But there is not at this moment in England or in Ireland any existing warrant. I believe there has been no warrant existing in Ireland since I have been in office, and in the same period there has been only one warrant in England, and that had reference to an ordinary criminal case. As regards Mr. Maberly, neither I nor the Department have any knowledge of any communication between that gentleman and the representatives of the Times. The Post Office have sanctioned no transaction whatever between Mr. Maberly and the Times and they have no knowledge of any such transaction.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the right hon. Gentleman ask Mr. Maberly how the Times got the book?

*MR. RAIKES: I asked Mr. Maberly with regard to the question put to me the other day by the hon. and learned Member whether he took or produced any letters, and Mr. Maberly assured me that he did not. I am unable to see how Mr. Maberly could produce any letters unless he purloined them. I am told that this official is an Orangeman. That may be so. But I am also told that Mr. Maberly has driven every Catholic out of his office. I can only say with regard to the question put to me that Mr. Maberly's superior officer has not been removed from office. This gentleman has been temporarily employed in another branch of the Post office, and I have directed that he should be re-transferred to the position he previously held. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman or any one else seriously believes there is any intention on the part of the Government to dispense with the services or to disparage the services of Catholic servants of the State. These gentlemen are among the most trusted of Her Majesty's servants, and I should be extremely sorry if any one for a moment supposes that the Government wish to dispense with their services. I will make inquiries with regard to the missing cheque referred to by the hon. Member for Longford if the hon. Member will supply me with particulars. I am not aware that any dead letters have been kept from the natural process of destruction for one moment longer than they ought to have been in consequence of any proceedings in connection with the Times. If I find there is any foundation for the statement that dead letters have been kept beyond their proper time I shall be happy to offer the hon. Member the best explanation I can. Then the statement has been made by the hon. Member that letters have been taken in packets before Lord Londonderry during his Viceroyalty and opened in his presence. That is a serious statement, and the hon. Member has made it on his responsibility as a Member of Parliament. It imputes to the Lord Lieutenant conduct of a very serious character; and I think it will be my duty to ask Lord Londonderry whether there is any foundation for such a statement. The hon. Member has made the statement on his own responsibility.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And I fully believe it.

*MR. RAIKES: I understand that he fully believes in its accuracy, and I suppose he is in a position to produce evidence in support of it. Of course it is not for me to positively deny a statement as to which I have no evidence whatever; but I perhaps may be forgiven if I say that it appears to me that the hon. Member must have been grossly deceived in making such an allegation. I cannot suppose it possible that the Lord Lieutenant could have been a party to transactions of this sort, which are so entirely irregular and, I presume, illegal. I will, however, make it my business to ascertain from the Lord Lieutenant whether there is anything which can give a colour to such a charge. With regard to Mr. Cornwall, that gentleman received no pension and had never applied for one. I will make inquiries as to whether the Post Office bags have been violated on board the Irish steamers. Of course, if anything of the kind had been done, it would constitute a grave crime; and I should be the first person to put the law in force if I found any person had in any way violated the sanctity of the post. If any person in England or Ireland opens a letter without having the proper authority to do so, he would be committing a grave crime, for which he might be severely punished. And I should be wanting in my duty if I did not take steps to punish any such offender. It may be the case that a letter addressed even to a Member of Parliament may be the subject of a criminal transaction. I know nothing of Mr. O'Kelly's letter; but if any person opened a letter addressed to that hon. Member, or to any other hon. Member, or, in fact, to any subject of the Queen in Ireland or England without a proper warrant from the Secretary of State in the one instance, or the Lord Lieutenant in the other, he would be committing a great crime against the laws of the land, for which he might be very severely punished. I certainly should be wanting in my duty if, under such circumstances, I did not take steps to punish the offender if evidence was forthcoming to enable me to act in the matter.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I wish to say that last year, on Report of a Vote, I brought to the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman a rather singular case, in which three Catholic telegraphists, because they were suspected of communicating information from their office in Tralee, were removed, and three Protestant Freemason Orangemen being put in their place. This is the first time I have ever ventured to raise the question as between Catholics and Protestants, and I now do it simply in order to enlighten the Postmaster General, and to enable him to act in this case. I have been in a National School and have been reared with Protestants. I have lived amongst them all my life, and have never found any cause of quarrel with them, and I hope I never may. Still, the curious anomaly which I have referred to has taken place, and the Postmaster General seems to be utterly oblivious of the fact that the question of the religion of these telegraphists was raised. In the town of Tralee, Protestants are only one in ten, and yet in the Post Office there are now no Catholics. It is surely a hard thing to say that because you merely suspect people of misusing their information, you shall replace all the Catholics in the Post Office by Protestants. I recognise the kindly spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General has spoken to my hon. Friend. He spoke to me in a similar strain last year, but he has done nothing. It seems to me that the Post Office as well as the police officials in the part of Ireland to which I refer, are completely in the hands of Cecil Roche and Colonel Turner. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to grasp the facts of this case, and will ascertain why the three Catholic telegraphists to whose case I draw attention were removed from Tralee. I do not make any apology for reviving this question, and asking the right hon. Gentleman why nothing was done to carry out his promise. I do not want to see any change made in the rules and internal arrangements of Irish Telegraph Offices except such as are fair and equitable. I do not wish to have friends in the Post Office who can tell me secrets. I do not wish to see such an ugly and disagreeable system at the Post Office as that would involve; but, at the same time, I think the Government are setting a bad precedent in allowing clerks of one religious persuasion to be withdrawn in order to make room for others of another religious persuasion. I would ask the Postmaster General to apply his mind to this case in the spirit in which he has applied it to the case mentioned by my hon. Friend (Mr. T. M. Healy).

*MR. RAIKES: I can only speak again by the indulgence of the House. I have some recollection of the case to which the hon. Member refers, though it is not so vivid as it was 12 months ago. This much I remember, that the telegraph clerks were not removed from the Post Office because they were Catholics, but because they had been persistently getting into what was considered rather disorderly company.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: They were replaced by Protestants.

*MR. RAIKES: But they remained in the service, and there is no reason why they should not rise to high positions. All I can say is that they were not transferred because they were Catholics. They were transferred because it was represented to me that they had got into disorderly company. I was not aware before that the three clerks who replaced those who were transferred were Protestants, but I may mention that one of them has himself got into disorderly company in the North, and he has been removed to the South in the hope that he may do better there. I can only assure the hon. Gentleman that the question of religion does not influence my action in regard to the transfer of officials.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: I wish to explain, Mr. Speaker, that last year I did not gather from the Postmaster General that there was any allegation of misconduct against these men. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will admit that this is the first time that the allegation has been made against them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I desire the House to take note of the fact that the Postmaster General has not answered me upon the specific point I raised, and I will therefore ask the House and the country to draw their own deductions from that. I asked, it will be remembered, how Mr. Soames got the information which appeared in the subpoena served upon Mr. Maberly. He replied that he was not able to give the House that information. I asked, in the second place, how Mr. Soames got the information which enabled the Attorney General to read to the Special Commission letters written by two Members of this House. Again, he was unable to tell me what I wanted to know; and I hope, therefore, that the country generally will appreciate at its full value the ignorance professed by the right hon. Gentleman.

Resolution agreed to.

16. "That a sum, not exceeding £484,406, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the Expense of the Post Office Packet Service."

Resolution agreed to.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY)
(No. 2) BILL. (No. 367).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 5.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I wish to move the omission of Sub-section 4 of this clause. I do not intend to make a speech. All I will do is to say that it seems to me rather early in the day for the London County Council to wish a purchase a large site for new offices. I think the matter might stand over another year, and I very much doubt whether it would be well to allow them to enter upon this expenditure, seeing that the rates have already gone up 4d., if not 6d., in the £1. I beg to move the omission of this sub-section.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 32, to leave out Sub-section 4.—(Mr. Bartley.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 4 stand part of the Clause."

MR. JACKSON: I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection to this clause. It may become necessary, and it certainly is desirable, that power should be given to the County Council to make inquiry as to a suitable site. The clause contains ample safeguards, I think, against an improper expenditure being embarked upon. All it will enable the County Council to do is practically to inquire into the matter.

*MR. BARTLEY: There is no possible difficulty in the London County Council inquiring into the question of sites. I do not object to their doing that. But the clause enables them to acquire a site, and that would involve the expenditure of a large sum of the ratepayers' money. I, therefore, think it my duty to press the Amendment.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 30.—(Div. List, No. 335.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): In regard to this clause I should like to point out that power is only given to raise £313,000 for the purposes of the Thames Valley Tunnel Act. I think that is an exceedingly small sum, bearing in mind that the whole of East London is anxiously looking for the completion of this work, and I should, therefore, be glad if any Member of the Government can give the Committee information as to what it is proposed to do in regard to it.

*MR. BARTLEY: In Sub-section 8 I think there must be a misprint, for it says that the London County Council shall have power to borrow for the purposes of the Metropolis Streets Improvement Act £1,000, provided that the amount does not exceed £4,300,000. What does that mean?

MR. JACKSON: It means what it says, Sir. It means that another thousand pounds may be borrowed provided that the aggregate borrowings under the Act do not exceed the sum stated. With regard to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Bow, I may point out that the sum asked for is that which it is estimated will be spent in the course of the current twelve months, and it was thought unnecessary to ask for power to raise more than that.

Clause 6, and remaining Clauses, agreed to.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I wish to move a new clause, the object of which is to enable the London County Council to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses which may be incurred by them up to the 31st December, 1890, in an inquiry to be instituted with respect to the water supply of the County of London. My reason for moving this clause is a very simple one, and I need not detain the House long in explaining it. It is, the Committee will remember, the clause which, at the instigation of the London County Council, the Government placed in the original Bill introduced this year, but it was subsequently omitted because of the number of Amendments placed upon the Paper in opposition to it by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I am told it has been stated that there was opposition to the clause from this side of the House also; but I cannot ascertain that this is the case, and I must say that were the statement confirmed, I should express my feelings as to the objectionable conduct pursued by hon. Gentlemen on this side equally as strongly as I have expressed them in regard to the conduct of hon. Members opposite. Now, this clause does not give the County Council for London power to purchase the water supply; it simply gives them power, within a little over 12 months, to make an inquiry into the whole question of the water supply, which is one of the most serious things with which we have to contend. I am quite convinced that the people of London will not allow simple monopolists to retain the control of their water supply for a long time to come. I should like to inform the Committee who were the gentlemen who opposed the original clause. So far as I can ascertain, they were all, more or less, directly interested in the various Water Companies supplying London.

One is the son of the Governor of the New River Company; a second is the brother of a director of another Company, and so it is in every case; and these Amendments were thus put forward, not in the interests or the welfare of the people of London, but because hon. Gentlemen were afraid that the proposed inquiry would disclose such a state of affairs as would induce the people of London to require their Representatives to deal forthwith with this great question. I think the importance of introducing this clause cannot be better illustrated than by reminding the Committee that in the year 1878, when the Metropolitan Board of Works spent a sum of £6,611 in connection with Bills introduced into Parliament on the question of the Water Supply of London, they were surcharged the amount by the Auditor in auditing their accounts for that year. In conclusion, I wish to say that we who support this clause are quite willing to agree to the insertion of a sum of money—say £5,000—as a limit of the expenditure to be incurred under it.

New Clause (Expenses of inquiry as to water supply).—(Mr. James Rowlands),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. J. B. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I represent a Metropolitan constituency. I agree with my hon. Friend opposite that this question is one of immense importance to London, and I regret that the Government should have thought it right to omit this particular clause. If my hon. Friend will agree to the insertion of a limit of £5,000 in his clause I shall be very happy to support him. I think that Londoners cannot much longer submit to the present state of affairs with regard to their water supply. They must obtain control over it; and if the London County Council will use such means as this clause will place at their disposal, they will be doing a great deal towards the work which the public will, sooner or later, call upon them to undertake.

LEASEHOLDERS (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 179.)

As amended, considered.

**MR. P. A. CHANCE* (Kilkenny, S.): The object of the clause which I have to propose is to prevent the further exclusion from the benefits of the Land Act of leaseholders whose leases are not really renewable. In some cases leaseholders hold under-tenants for life, who are not certain of their power to lease, and, consequently, covenants are introduced, that if the leases granted be bad, fresh leases within the lessors' power will be granted. These leases are not really renewable leases, although they are technically so.

Clause (Covenants for renewal).—(Mr. Chance),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I hope the hon. and learned Member will not press this Amendment. The Government cannot accept the clause, for this reason. The Bill as it stands in no degree extends the class of leaseholders admitted to the benefits of the Act of 1887; it merely removes a flaw in the title of a limited number of cases. The hon. Member's proposal would, however, bring in an altogether new class, and the Government are not prepared to agree to that being done.

**MR. CHANCE*: I do not admit that that is so. If the Government will not accept the clause I will withdraw it, for I will not take the responsibility of wrecking the Bill. I leave the public to judge of the conduct of the Government. I beg leave to withdraw the Motion and clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PHIL), Warwick and Leamington

Rules and Order of Debate

The One o'clock Rule Aug. 6, 663

The Question before the House being the Suspension of Standing Orders, a Private Bill may be considered Aug. 8, 747

Upon consideration of a Bill, it is not competent for an hon. Member to widen its scope by increasing the amount provided for in the Measure Aug. 8, 749

It is irregular to raise a Point of Order after the business has commenced, and after the occasion on which the Point of Order arose. The Speaker declines to constitute himself a Court of Appeal from the decisions of the Chairman of Committees. If when half-past five is reached an Amendment to a Question is then being decided by a Division, the time of the interruption of business is thrown forward. When the first Question on the Amendment is decided, the main Question is proposed, and if objection is taken thereto it is quite in order to move the Closure pursuant to the new Standing Order Aug. 8, 802

If the words "I object" reach the Speaker's ears, it is not necessary for him to know whence they proceed Aug. 9, 993

The Instruction to Committee does not open up a Second Reading Debate; only the specific question concerned in the instruction is introduced Aug. 12, 1041, 1043, 1047

If the Chairman of Committees is of opinion that the Clause cannot be inserted in Committee, the Bill can be Re-Committed for the purpose of inserting it Aug. 12, 1070

Appeals cannot be made to the Speaker on Points of Order arising in Grand Committees, there being no such appeal from the decision of a duly constituted Chairman of a Grand Committee. It cannot be admitted as a general rule that Amendments hostile to a Bill may not be admitted. Proceedings in Grand Committee are so far in lieu of Proceedings in Committee of the Whole House that there is no stage of Committee of the Whole House in the case of a Bill which has been referred to a Grand Committee. The matter is not one of Privilege, but at most one of Order. Differences between Rules applicable to proceedings in Committee of the Whole House, and those applicable to proceedings in a Grand Committee Aug. 14, 1226

In order that a Bill which has been before a Standing Committee may be considered by a Committee of the Whole House, it is necessary, when the Committee present their Report, to make a Motion to suspend the Standing Order Aug. 14, 1227

It is for the Chairman of Committees to decide when the House is in Committee whether, an Instruction having been refused by the House, Amendments which might contravene that Instruction as such can be moved, notwithstanding the refusal of the House to grant the Instruction at an earlier stage Aug. 15, 1360

The practice of the House has unquestionably been, when a Bill has been transformed by the introduction of Amendments in Committee, that a new Bill should be introduced, leave given to introduce it, and the Second Reading stage should be gone through when the general principles of the Measure as distinguished from its component Clauses can be affirmed Aug. 16, 1488

It is not possible for an hon. Gentleman to discuss the merits or demerits of a Bill on a Motion for the discharge of the Order Aug. 16, 1493

The House having exempted a Bill from the Twelve O'clock Rule, it is unreasonable to put a Motion for Adjournment at a few minutes after 12 Aug. 19, 1733

It is not in Order, when a scheme is before the House, and an Address to the Crown is moved against such scheme, to move an Amendment that that particular scheme be referred to a Select Committee Aug. 20, 1741
